The devotional article, "Paul and God's Purpose" by William Mealand (pp.29-32) explains, ". . . to many of God's people larger thoughts have come, and a deeper comprehension of the magnitude of God's purpose. They see, as never before, how wonderful a God is theirs, and how great the Son of His love" (pp.29,30).

In J. W. Williams' writing, "Figures of Speech" (pp.33-48) it is acknowledged at the outset that "One of the greatest difficulties we meet in correctly understanding the Scriptures is that of distinguishing between literal and figurative language" (p.33). However, through diverse examples of figurative usage, the author not only sheds much light on the discernment of figures of speech, but does so in a way that is edifying and full of encouragement.

THE FIRST paragraph of Romans, as it presently appears in our work on a new edition of the CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT (CVNT) is given above. It introduces the theme for the entire letter, God's Evangel, which Paul longed to share. So also do we, more and more, as we grow in realization of its riches and glory.

GENITIVE PHRASES

There are an unusual number of important genitive phrases in the opening seven verses. They can be picked out from the CONCORDANT GREEK TEXT where one thing is said to be of another thing, but this is not always the pattern followed in the Version (*e.g.*the phrase "the Son of Him" would be awkward in English, so the more familiar wording, "His Son," is used with a raised dot before "Son" to indicate the definite article). The following is a list of genitive phrases in these opening verses of Romans:

slave of Christ Jesus
evangel of God
the prophets of Him the Son of Him seed (of) David[1]
Son of God spirit of holiness resurrection of dead (one)s the Lord of us obedience of faith the Name of Him called (one)s of Jesus Christ beloved of God

There are two types of genitive phrases here, those with "the" before the first noun, and those without the definite article. When the definite article is present we are to give special attention to the first noun as a definite thing: definite prophets of God, a definite Son of God, a definite Name of the Lord, etc., while still giving full value to the second noun or pronoun. But when "the" is absent, while it may still be true that a definite thing is in view, that is not of foremost consideration. Rather, when there is no definite article, the second noun or group of nouns is given special stress: slave of Christ Jesus, evangel of God, obedience of faith, etc.

SLAVE OF CHRIST JESUS

Paul had the highest and most honorable position of service that any human being could have in his day. He was a "slave of Christ Jesus." This was a slavery, not of fear but of love and privilege. Then, at a slightly lower level, but still higher than anyone today, he was a "called apostle," And

1. The name "David" is not written in Greek as a genitive, but was understood this way in a passage like this.

in third place, in relation to the apostles who were called before him, he was "severed for God's evangel."

SEVERED

Using the severing of the umbilical cord in birth as a figure of his distinctive call and commission to evangelize Christ among the nations, Paul writes in Galatians 1:15 that God severs him from his mother's womb. This was a cutting off from his fleshly relationship with the nation of Israel, which included his early avoidance of Jerusalem and of submission to those who were apostles before him (Gal.1:16,17). Then, even after he appears with "those of repute" in Jerusalem, and going from Jerusalem with Barnabas and John Mark to Antioch, we read that the Lord said, through the holy spirit, "Sever, by all means, to Me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them" (Acts 13:2). What is most surprising is that this severance is not just from his racial connection with Israel, but from Christ's chosen apostles, who were centered in Jerusalem. He (along with Barnabas) was cut off from the work of dispensing that was directed by Peter and the twelve.

EVANGEL OF GOD

The genitive phrase, evangel of God, in verse 1, does not have a definite article in Greek, but in the previous editions of the CV we have added one in lightface type: "(the) evangel of God." This was for proper English idiom. But in order to convey the special emphasis the Greek gives to the word "God" we now render this genitive phrase by means of what is generally called the "possessive case," or more correctly, the "Saxon genitive": God's evangel, This also has the advantage of not requiring the insertion of the definite article in lightface type.

In this there is perhaps a disadvantage in that we have changed the word order of the Greek. No translation is perfect in every detail. But in this case there is the overriding advantage of giving emphasis to the fact that the evangel is characterized by God, a message which centers our attention on Him and not on the human (as does the law).

THAT WHICH IS OF GOD

The same emphasis on God is to be noted in verse 5 in the genitive phrase, Son of God, and in verse 7 in the words, beloved of God. By rendering the three phrases alike, with Saxon genitives, we may discern a trilogy of truth for our joy and thankfulness of heart: God's evangel concerning God's Son is being sent to God's beloved in the book of Romans.

At the end of Romans, and several more times in his epistles, Paul uses the full phrase, "the evangel of [the] God" (Rom.15:16), which is the distinct evangel of the One God with all the details which Paul has enunciated throughout the book. But here in the first verse of Romans (and nowhere else) only one detail is given. It is of God; it is God's evangel.

God's evangel is referred to as "the evangel of the Son of Him [i.e., God]" in verse 9. These are not two different evangels, but two different ways of pointing to the fact that this evangel has to do with the One most precious to God, His own Son, as well expressed in Romans 8:3. Where the flesh can do nothing in dealing with sin, God sends His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh and concerning sin (as the antitype of the sin offering), and by this means condemns sin in the flesh.

GOD'S PROPHETS

Paul was severed from the other apostles to bring God's evangel concerning His Son to us of the nations. But the message Paul brings is not severed from God's word through His prophets of old, for it has its roots in them (Rom.1:2; 3:22). Yet even in drawing attention to these roots, our apostle points to them invariably with new significance. For much of what he sets before us here goes far beyond what had been said before. Always we will be greatly blessed if we listen carefully to this WELL-MESSAGE, as Paul writes it down, for it is in this message that God speaks directly to us.

SEED OF DAVID

The reference to Christ coming of the seed of David connects God's evangel with His promise given through Nathan the prophet of a future kingdom (2 Sam.7:12-16). It will be authenticated for the eon. Most of that passage refers directly to Solomon, but its full manifestation can only be realized in the Greater Seed of David, of Whom Paul speaks.

As Paul reacted to current events in his day (which he knew were bound to occur), so do we often look about ourselves with great sorrow and unintermittent pain at the political and social developments among our own peoples (cf Rom.9:1-5). Yet God's evangel which promises that the obtaining of the superabundance of grace and the gratuity in righteousness leads to reigning in life through the One, Jesus Christ (Rom.5:17), directs our hearts well beyond the eon God spoke of through Nathan, and even ultimately to a time when all mankind are constituted righteous (Rom. 5:19). In the meantime we are expectant of God's celestial kingdom under the One Who will reign until all enemies are put under His feet.

Accordingly, we see in 1 Corinthians 15:20-28 the way in which God's evangel concerning His Son enlarges the significance of His position as David's Seed:

[20] Yet now Christ has been roused[c] [o]from among the dead, the Firstfruit of those who are [c]reposing[c]. [21] For since in fact through a human comes death, through a Human also comes the resurrection of the dead. [22] For even as, in Adam, all are dying, thus also, in Christ, shall all be [l]vivified. [23] Yet each in his own class: the Firstfruit, Christ; thereupon those who are Christ's in His presence; [24] thereafter the consummation, whenever He may be giving up the kingdom to His God and Father, whenever He should nullify [e]all sovereignty and [e]all authority and power. [25] For He [l]must be reigning until [w] He should place all His enemies under His feet. [26] The last enemy is being abolished[c]: death. [27] For He subjects all under His feet. Now whenever He may say that all is [c]subject[c], it is evident that it is outside of Him Who subjects all to Him. [28] Now whenever all may be subjected to Him, then the Son Himself also shall be [l]subjected to Him Who subjects all to Him, that God may be All in all.

The aorist subjunctives, "should nullify" and "should place," join the aorist verb, "subjects," as simple, factual certainties. They are operations of God through Christ Jesus, our Lord, in His kingship, operations which accord with the words of Nathan, but are exceedingly more glorious because they are expressly built on God's evangel concerning His Son.

DESIGNATED GOD'S SON

God's evangel concerns God's Son. That is fundamental. It is true that the evangel does concern us as to its effects. But it wholly concerns God's Son as to what it announces: Christ dies for our sins; He was entombed; He has been roused (1 Cor.15:3,4).

The genitive phrase, "Son of Him" in Romans 1:3 becomes more exact in Romans 1:4, where (literally translated) He is designated "Son of God . . . out of resurrection of dead-(one)s." This has often been taken to say that Jesus Christ our Lord is designated Son of God by means of His own resurrection from the dead. And while genitive terms may sometimes best be understood as conveying a sense of from rather than of, and God's rousing of Christ from the dead is an essential element of the evangel (cf Rom.4:25; 6:4; 7:4; 1 Cor.15:4,20), the parallel with Christ coming, according to flesh, of David's seed, which has reference to His future reign, supports the normal use of the genitive here. Nevertheless, both Christ's rousing from among the dead and our future resurrection appear as details in God's evangel concerning His Son in Romans 6:4,5, as follows:

. . . even as Christ is roused [o]from among the dead through the glory of the Father, thus we´ also should walk in newness of life. [5] For if we have become planted together in the likeness of His [·]death, [bt]nevertheless we shall be of the resurrection also.

The aorist subjunctive verb "we should walk," having as its basis the glory of the Father, and the future tense verb, "we shall be," having as its basis God's planting of us in the likeness of Christ's death, are parallel certainties. Christ is designated God's Son by the resurrection of dead (one)s, which is, like most consequences of Christ's death and life from the dead, a matter of faith and expectation. It is as we read in Romans 8:22-25:

[22] For we are [°]aware that the entire creation is groaning together and travailing together until [·]now. [23] Yet not only so, but we [s]ourselves also who [l]have the firstfruit of the spirit, we´ [s]ourselves also are groaning in ourselves, awaiting[°] the sonship, the deliverance of our [·]body. [24] For to [·]expectation are we saved. Now expectation, being observed[°], is not expectation, for what anyone is observing, [a]why is he expecting it also? [25] Now if we are expecting what we are not observing, we are awaiting[°] it [th]with endurance.

FAITH'S OBEDIENCE

When he was Saul of Tarsus, the one who becomes Paul, a slave of Christ Jesus, a called apostle, severed for God's evangel, was greatly absorbed with the law and with what, in his mind, he had to do in order to assure himself of a place in the kingdom. But (here I use English aorist verbs) the time comes when he obtains grace and apostleship for bringing God's evangel concerning His Son to people among all the nations for obedience of faith. This unique genitive phrase occurs only twice in Scripture, once here at the beginning of Romans (1:5) and again at the end of the letter (16:26). In the early editions of the CV it was translated in Greek word order with the definite article added in lightface type: "(the) obedience of faith." But our more recent editions use the single, hyphenated term: "faith-obedience," which places the emphasis appropriately on the word faith. Now, so that we can show there are two words involved here, and for consistency's sake as well, we use the Saxon genitive and render the phrase: "faith's obedience."

It would be even better if we could say, "faith's submissive-hearing," and perhaps that, or a similar expression, will be acceptable in time. Until then we need to train our minds to recognize that these words, obey and obedient, when used in the New Testament, do not in themselves convey a sense of doing, but of careful listening. They correspond best to the Hebrew expression, usually rendered "hearken." When what is heard is instruction of law, the attentive listening is to be followed by attentive doing. But when what is being heard is God's evangel, which instructs us as to what God has done through His Son, Jesus Christ, then the obedience, or submissive hearing, holds fast to that message of grace, a message, which as we soon hear in Romans 1:16 is God's power for salvation. Spiritual invigoration for our doing arises from our faithful listening to God's WELL-MESSAGE to us.

Romans chapters six through eight are especially rich in showing us the relationship of faith's obedience to our present lives. For Paul himself it was an enslavement of his mind to what he was believing, which he called (using a forceful figure of speech which almost goes beyond the ability of our "western" ears to follow): God's law (Rom. 7:25). Yet in the context, it can only be, as with us, an enslavement of attentive listening to that type of teaching to which we are given over (Rom.6:17), that is, to the evangel of grace.

FOR HIS NAME'S SAKE

In accord with our practice in the CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, we capitalize the word Name when it is used in reference to Deity. We have not done so in previous editions, and we do not claim that the original sense intended by Paul could not be conveyed without this capitalization. Yet we believe it may be helpful for us to remind ourselves in this way that the word "Name" is indeed used in Scripture as though it were the divine Name itself, and that God's Son is graced with the Name that is above every name, so that every knee shall bow in the Name of Jesus, and every tongue will acclaim that Jesus Christ is Lord.

CALLED AND BELOVED AND SET APART

God's evangel concerning God's Son is proclaimed by Paul in Romans. And it is sent, not only to first century believers in Rome, but to us now in the twenty-first century, who also are "called of Jesus Christ" and also are "God's beloved" and also are "called saints." Most appropriately, Paul inserts his opening words of greetings at this point:

"Grace to you and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ." D.H.H.

SIMPLE FACTS

A MAJOR CHANGE in the revised CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT (CVNT) is that all verbs and verb forms generally classified as aorists will be rendered as the present CLNT renders "first aorists." This means the Version will use what is generally understood as a "simple present verb" more often than before. We discussed this in some detail in our most recent issue of Unsearchable Riches (Fourth Quarter, 2015).

Most of us have come to appreciate such wordings as: "For thus God loves the world . . ." (John 3:16), and even: "Now whom He [God] designates beforehand, these He calls also, and whom He calls, these He justifies also; now whom He justifies, these He glorifies also" (Rom.8:30). And we have come to rejoice in the sense of timeless facts which these "present tense" verbs convey. But this is more difficult when an aorist verb is used for what clearly is an action known to have occurred in the past with no particular timelessness being involved.

What we need to understand is that the principal feature conveyed by aorists is not the timelessness of the action (though they often convey that sense), but the simple fact, the truth of the action. Other verbs also express, or are intended to express facts. But the point is that when an aorist is used the full force of the verb is directed to the action as fact, no matter what the time of the action may be.

When, in his letter to the Galatians, Paul wishes to distinguish his ministry from that of the twelve, he recounts his striking avoidance of Jerusalem and any sign of subjection to "those of repute," writing with a predominance of aorist verbs. In so doing he speaks in a language of simple declaration, and every verb is backed up by his protest that in God's sight he is not lying. In rendering both first and second aorist verbs by English simple present verbs the CVNT attempts to reflect this tone of simple factuality (Gal.1:15-20):

15 Now when it delights ·God, ·Who severs me °from my mother's womb and calls me through His ·grace, 16 to unveil His ·Son in me that I may be evangelizing° Him among the nations, I do not immediately submit° it to flesh and blood, 17 neither come I up io-to Jerusalem to-d those ·who are apostles before me, but I come away into Arabia, and I return again io-to Damascus.

18 Thereupon, after three years, I come up io-to Jerusalem to relate my story to Cephas, and I stay td-with him fifteen days. 19 Yet I become acquainted with no-t one different from the apostles, except James, the brother of the Lord. (20 Now what I am writing to you, ˡlo°! in ·God's sight, I say that I am not lying°.)

Paul does not attempt to hide the facts, surprising as they may be. Indeed he dwells on them, and supports them by using aorist verbs. His apostolic and evangelistic work is to be distinguished from that of the twelve.

ALL SIN, GOD SPARES NOT, CHRIST DIES

Often God's evangel comes before us in Romans in the language of simple facts, apart from their relationship to time, that is, by means of aorist verbs. We have gotten used to the CV renderings of the first aorist verbs, "spares not" and "gives Him up" in Romans 8:32. We go over such passages in our minds often and are strengthened by this use of the simple present form for these verbs. We know these acts of God occurred in the past, but Paul is not leading us to dwell on that here—only on the actions themselves. They are facts, and in this case they have a timeless quality.

Romans 1:18-3:20 exposes the acts of human irreverence and unrighteousness which so passionately call for God's evangel concerning His Son. Then this evangel is proclaimed in two verses (Rom.3:21,22) against a one-verse summation of that long indictment (Rom.3:23):

21 Yet now, apart from law, God's righteousness is °manifest° (being attested° by the law and the prophets), 22 yet God's righteousness through Jesus Christ's faith io-for all, and on all ·who are believing, for there is no-t distinction, 23 for all sin and are wanting° of the glory of ·God.

God's righteousness, now made manifest through Jesus Christ's faith, is set against the simple, indisputable fact that all sin and its effect (which continues) that all are wanting of the glory of God. The verb "sin" is a second aorist, while "are wanting" is a present progressive verb. Our previous use of the past tense for the second aorist verb was not entirely satisfactory: "all sinned." The AV rendering, "all have sinned," may seem better, but that is because of familiarity. Paul is not speaking of something confined to the past or brought to completion, but of a fact that afflicts us all day by day.

He repeats this in Romans 5:12 in tracing the fact of human sin to Adam through the introduction of death:

12 Therefore, even as through one human ·sin enters into the world, and through ·sin ·death, and thus ·death passes through into all ⁼mankind, on which all sin—

All human beings sin. But God gives (a first aorist verb) His only-begotten Son (John 3:16). The fact is that we sin. Now what does God do about it? Using an aorist participle, Paul directs attention to God, sending His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh, and concerning sin, He condemns sin in the flesh (Rom.8:3).

God's evangel concerning His Son takes full account of the fact that all sin. In response to this fact, God's evangel concerning His Son announces the astounding fact that God spares not His own Son, but gives Him up for us all. This is the most startling of all the evangelical facts, which is repeated throughout the heart of Romans for our faith: Christ dies.

ROMANS 5:6-8

6 For Christ, while we [l]are still infirm, still in accord with the era, for the sake of the irreverent, dies. 7 For hardly for the sake of a just man will anyone be dying[c]: for, for the sake of a [·]good man, perhaps [a]someone may even be daring to die, 8 yet [·]God is commending this [·]love of [sf]His [io]to us, seeing that, while we [l]are still sinners, Christ dies for our sakes.

ROMANS 6:10

10 for in [w]that He dies, He dies to [·]Sin once for all time, yet in [w]that He is living, He is living to [·]God.

OTHER EVANGELICAL FACTS

The evangel does not end with the death of Christ. It is absolutely necessary that Christ die, but, thanks be to God, His evangel concerning His Son, tells us that God rouses the Lord (1 Cor.6:14), in which there is the assurance of rousing for us.

The evangelical facts of Christ's emptying of Himself and humbling of Himself to the death of the cross, followed by His exaltation are expressed in Philippians 2:7-12 by a series of aorist verbs:

Christ Jesus empties Himself.

He humbles Himself unto death.

God highly exalts Him and graces Him with a Name that is above every name.

JUSTIFICATION

One of the contrasting features of Paul's evangel, which cut it off from that which was proclaimed by Peter and the other apostles, and which marks it as a new departure in God's ways, unique and to be distinguished from that which was heralded before, was justification. The fact that, in Paul's message, the believer was justified, and that irrevocably, is a fundamental and revolutionary change in the way God is dealing with sin. Previously He had passed over the penalties of sins in His forbearance, but now He justifies sinners. This amazing fact seems to grip but few. That God can justify that which has wrecked His creation, that He can change the character of these disruptive acts, is a miracle that only God can accomplish.

This must be apprehended in order to grasp the superiorities of Paul's evangel. That his message is an advance over what was proclaimed by our Lord and the twelve, and by Paul himself during a part of his ministry, is apparent to those who realize its distinctiveness. Repentance and baptism in water for the pardon of sins and the gratuity of the holy spirit are to be contrasted with faith and justification and the homing of God's spirit within the believer. What is essential to man's obedience becomes less onerous and exacting, and what is given by God is vastly superior. Repentance and baptism emphasize human activities, steps to be taken, things to be done. Man must change his mind regarding his sins, and he must be immersed in water. On the surface his own actions are predominant. He must alter his attitude toward his former aims. What he had previously thought to be right, he must now perceive to be sin.

His whole manner of life had been wrong, for it had not been directed toward God. Of this he needed to repent.

In faith, however, the emphasis is on God. He is the One Who has acted, and He has spoken regarding His actions, and what He says is true. Faith acquiesces in what God does. It is believing God. It looks away from human disabilities, and does not become absorbed with sins, but concentrates attention on God and His Word. "Let God be true, yet every man a liar!" are faith's words. Our feelings, our thoughts, our actions are probably wrong, but God's Word is meticulously exact and should be fervently believed.

GOING FROM FLESH TO SPIRIT

We see in Paul's evangel a withdrawal from the flesh and an emphasis on spirit. The essentially spiritual activity of believing God is linked with a baptism which is not apparent to the senses, but which is experienced in the spirit of the one believing, and this results in a justifying sentence. This in its turn has no physical foundation at present, but is enjoyed in spirit. It awaits its realization in the future day, when we shall be displayed flawless in His presence, unassailable, though many might wish to charge us with sin.

We do not justify our sins. The injuries we wittingly or unwittingly do to our fellow humans we dare not claim to be right. We cannot do evil that good may come. We cannot justify our conduct. But God is able. This is realized in spirit and is the only solid foundation of true happiness. In Paul's evangel the flesh is receding into the background. It finds its true place—crucified. The flesh, and that which pertains to it, meets its inglorious end on the cross, that shameful, dishonorable, degrading and accursed stake. This is the heart of Paul's evangel, not so that of the Circumcision.

BEING JUSTIFIED GRATUITOUSLY

Justification, the marvelous gift of God, so graciously granted to those who believe Him, is to be carefully distinguished from pardon. The two terms have different meanings and separate associations. It is true that each is linked with sin, each has to do with misdemeanor, with failure. Pardon, however, is temporary in character and hinges on subsequent good behavior. A persistence in sin after pardon would not necessarily bring forth fresh supplies of mercy. Pardon presupposes a repentant spirit and a changed disposition, leading to good works. The act or acts which were pardoned still retain their original character, they are still misdemeanors. It is as if the record has been erased, but future grants of mercy cannot be guaranteed. There is some uncertainty and doubt, for it depends in measure on subsequent good conduct.

Pardon is connected with the executive authority, the king or governor. He is lenient regarding past offenses, is merciful and willing to show grace. In the loose but expressive terms of idiom it is as if the authority were saying, "Let bygones be bygones. Shake hands and forget. Clean the slate of the past and start afresh." Firmly allied with this tolerant attitude is the tacit agreement that future conduct must show an appreciation of the favor accorded, as any future lapse might not meet the same clemency. This consideration of the term pardon we have transferred to our common understanding of the word and its associations, and such a meaning is clearly inherent in its usual scriptural usage also.

Notice that in Luke 1:77,78 pardon of sins is associated with the merciful compassions of God, and compare this with justification which is founded in His grace, a deeper and more God-like characteristic. In Luke 4:18 pardon is heralded to captives, and the oppressed receive its benefits, figures which accord with its kingdom character. Its instability may be seen in Matthew 18:21-35, where our Lord utters the parable of the wicked slave whose lord had remitted to him vast debts which he was unable to pay. The slave, not appreciating the mercy shown, oppresses one of his own fellow slaves for an insignificant debt. His failure to show such mercy as he had himself received caused the pardon to be withdrawn and the wicked slave was forced to pay all that he owed. Our Lord ends by saying: "Thus shall My heavenly Father also be doing to you, if each one should not be pardoning his brother from your hearts."

These scriptures are true in their context, but should be cut off from Paul's marvelous unfoldings, where grace transcendent and unadulterated without aught of works is displayed.

THE ESSENTIAL PLACE OF EVIL AND SIN

In Paul's evangel is revealed a righteousness of God: No longer is God passing over the penalty of sins. No longer is forbearance necessary. No longer is sin covered up. The temporary expedient of pardon is replaced by something permanent, enduring. In Christ Jesus God has dealt with sin once and for all time. The sins of humanity, nay of all God's myriads of creatures, were dealt with at the cross. In Christ Jesus is deliverance for all. The sufferings of God's Anointed are of such intrinsic value that God is able, through them, to justify all sin. This is the marvel revealed in Paul's evangel.

How can it be said that God was righteous in cursing His Beloved? Did He do right in forsaking Him on the accursed stake? He gave His Son over to malignant men and malicious spirit foes, and did not move in His defense. It was God Who wielded the knife that slew this Sacrifice. It is important to view the death of Christ from the Godward aspect, as too great an emphasis on what man did will cloud our minds to the vast issues involved. God was the prime mover in every detail surrounding the death of Christ. Satan, men and messengers were His agents in that dreadful tragedy. We do not minimize the fearful sin of those who had a hand in it, but we wish to stress the part God played in these events. Peter throws a flood of light on the sufferings of Christ when writing: "The precious blood of Christ, as of a flawless and unspotted Lamb, foreknown, indeed, before the disruption of the world" (1 Peter 1:19,20). Before that great cataclysmic upheaval which rent the primeval creation of God, spoiling and ruining its perfection and leaving it waste and sterile, empty and unproductive, useless to God and His creatures, before this had occurred, Christ was known as the flawless and unspotted Lamb. Even when all was still perfect, the sufferings of His Christ were part of God's eonian plan. Christ, too, in those distant days, knew of His agony and what the Father had willed for Him. But the first act of the eonian tragedy had not yet been staged. Satan had not yet been created to oppose and destroy. The first of the wicked eons had still to begin. Yet all was foreknown by God. We cannot, we must not relieve God of the responsibility of anything that has occurred since creation began in Christ. Evil and sin are not intruders invading the universe contrary to the intention of God. They are an essential ingredient of God's eonian plan and have been introduced by our loving, wise God to form the basis of His eonian operations. They are essential and fundamental to a full-orbed revelation of God.

Apart from sin the revelation of God would be incomplete. It is the mistakes, the injustices, the irreverence and the offenses that supply the material with which God works during the eons. Before the eons these were absent, and after they have run their course, there will be no necessity for such, for their work will have been done. In order to understand the tremendous problems which life provides we must realize that all that occurs during the eons is in accord with the intention of God and is being used by Him to achieve the end He had in view ere the eons began, which end was to become All in all His creatures. Everything contributes to this grand goal.

THE JUSTIFICATION OF SIN

This understanding of the eonian tragedy is necessary in order to apprehend how God can justify sin. The damage and destruction, the suffering and shame can be justified because God Himself introduced into His creation the conditions which produced these results, but with an end in view which would fully justify the means. The three great pillars of truth which support and establish the great doctrine of justification are:

(1) All is out of God.
(2) All blessing is a result of the sufferings, death, and resurrection of His Son.
(3) All is for God. He will be All in All.

Who can compute the terrible toll of sufferings which has resulted from Adam's original sin? The history of the past two eons is darkened with despair, burdened with misery, and weighted with woe. What a deluge of disasters has proceeded from the disobedient act of one man! Its issue is seen in millions on millions of humans doomed from birth to sin. Suffering and misery have been the close companions of many for most of their days. None of us is capable of assessing the terrible destruction wrought in God's creation through sin. What measure of quantity shall we give to the sufferings of one human? Multiply this by the numbers born since Adam and what a soul-shattering sum of misery and woe is there represented! Yet all this our great God, Who is love, intended. Let this grip our hearts, for it is vital.

Who can measure the extent of the sufferings of Christ? To such a subject we must approach with reverent and adoring spirit, but it behooves us to give it our earnest consideration, for His sufferings form the basis of the salvation of all.

He had been the Father's beloved from the beginning. He was the only Son of God, fondled and favored. God had showered on Him all His affection and graced Him with all His gifts. He was unique in God's creation, having the glory of God and the spirit of God without measure. He was the Creator of all, for through Him the visible and the invisible universe was created. None but God was before Him in time, and no other was His equal in status. He was supreme. Before His humiliation He could view the entire universe as His handiwork, His achievement, created for His Father and Himself. It was His by right of creation and by right of gift, for for Him all was created. This exalted One was He Who suffered as a result of sin. He it was Who was smitten by the hands of His God, Who offered Him up a sacrifice to display the depths of His love.

ACCORDING TO GOD'S INTENTION

The sufferings of Christ are the answer to this tremendous question: Can God be just and a Justifier of the sinner? What miracle is wrought so that these acts of ours, which hurt and harm our fellow humans and offend our loving God, can be justified? How is a sinner acquitted by the court of heaven? The cross of Christ provides the answer. But wherein lies the potency of His sufferings? How does the blood of Christ alter the character of our actions? For this is what is required. It is no legal fiction that has been performed, whereby wrong is termed right. A sin must be transformed into an action that satisfies the requirements of a God Who is Light.

The answer is bound up with the tremendous truth that all is out of God. God it was Who inflicted on man the tragedy of the eons. There was no question of choice by man in the matter. He was created by God with a view to his becoming involved in evil and sin. God is supreme and does with His creatures as He wills. He molds them to the pattern He intends, and we, the molded, cannot protest, "Why does He make me thus?" He who knows not the love and purpose of God might argue, "Why does He then blame, if all accords with His intention?" (cf Rom.9:19). But who are we to put such a question to our Creator? He is Supreme and is free to do with His creatures as He wills.

But does God stand aloof from the eonian tragedy, watching as a spectator His vast designs being worked out in His creatures, but unaffected Himself thereby? No, for He, the Lord inherent in all His works, is vitally involved in the dread result of sin, and affected more deeply than His creatures. Sin has ruined His handiwork, spoiled His creation, and has deprived Him of love and worship and glory which is His by right as the Source of all. We ourselves have some minute appreciation of the havoc wrought by sin, and feel each day the pains and penalties of sin's curse. Is this not a feeble replica of what God, the Source of all, must feel in the midst of His ruined achievements? Does He not react to the tragedy of the eons? Does His heart not ache? Are not the sufferings of humanity echoed in the heart of the Father? He, no doubt, suffers with His creation throughout the course of the eons. But sin's most bitter blow was dealt when it pierced His heart, depriving Him of His Beloved. Let us not think of our God as a hard, impersonal Deity, above and apart from eonian suffering, but a compassionate Father.

God has introduced sin into the universe with a view to the working out of His intention of ultimately becoming All in all. In order to attain this objective it is essential for all His creatures to be thoroughly convinced that God Himself is the sum of all their desires, the fulfillment of all their hopes, and the consummation of life's experiences. It is essential that they know failure and distress, humiliation and pain, in order that when God reveals Himself to them, they will unhesitatingly and spontaneously worship and adore Him as their loving Father and Source of all bliss. God Himself introduced sin into the universe through the agency of Satan, and at the cross He Himself became most intimately concerned with the dread results of sin's curse. For His Son, His Beloved, was made sin for the sake of humanity. Sin which had wrecked and ruined His handiwork achieved its most frightful end when it killed His Son. What a dread catastrophe was this! Creation itself had been devastated by sin. Now He through Whom all began, and in Whom all has its cohesion, hung on a stake, derided by men, opposed by Satan, and deserted by His God. Thus evil and sin brought forth its most bitter fruit, and degraded the only begotten Son of God, so that He hung with the robbers and malefactors, among the outcasts of human society.

But this was in God's plan for His creation. Yet in it all God remained righteous. All His actions were unimpeachable. Although He introduced sin through the agency of His creatures, yet He did not sin in so doing. For it was no mistake, no failure of His. It was in accord with His intention, and it will be justified by the beneficial results obtained through its agency. As in the cross of Christ, which was man's most dreadful misdeed, yet God's righteous act, so in all else. God is justified in all He does. For His final intention to glorify Himself and bless His creatures is the dominating purpose which adds luster to all His eonian operations. In the brilliant glory of His ultimate the most somber and gloomy features of earth's history are transformed into a brilliant display of His power and wisdom and love.

THE JUSTIFICATION OF GOD

In the blood of Christ, sin is justified because through His sufferings God is able to uncover the deep reserves of love that otherwise would have remained hidden within His heart. It was essential for Him to offer His Son as a Sacrifice as it was the only way of displaying His love. The humiliation, shame, suffering, and death of Christ, the beloved Son of God, is God's method of displaying to the myriads of His creatures the vastness of His affection. Is this not a clear justification of sin? Let us express it clearly, thus:

God intended to reveal His love.

His affections could only be unveiled through the sacrifice of His Son.

Sacrifice could only be occasioned by some dire need.

The need for a Sacrifice was provided by a sin-wrecked universe.

The Sacrifice was first provided, and then the conditions that called for the Sacrifice were introduced. He first determined to reveal His grace and then supplied the circumstances that tested to the utmost limits the deep resources of His love and which revealed the immeasurable dimensions of His affection. The sufferings of Christ were the only method by which all this could be effected. It was essential therefore that they should occur. His sacrifice was determined by God before the disruption. Without it creation would have remained ignorant of the love of God. The divine order is the explanation of justification: the Sacrifice was provided first, sin came after. The crucifixion of the Son of God was in its final analysis an act of God. Man was offering up for God the Sacrifice Whose sweet savor would endure throughout the eons and beyond. Man's sin and degradation culminated in the sufferings of Christ, yet form the essential basis of God's glory and man's blessing. The sins of humanity from Adam onward partook of the same character as the supreme sin. Man at heart is irreverent, a detester of God, refusing to acknowledge Him, and failing to glorify Him as God. None seek out God, but all avoid Him. But this depravity, this ruinous behavior, that disrupts society and hurts and harms God, is justified, because only through it God is enabled to reveal the recesses of His heart through His indescribable gratuity. Justification is firmly founded in the grace of God.

God is just in justifying the sinner, but is He just in inflicting His Son with the indignities, the shame, the suffering and the death of the cross? How does God justify such treatment of His Son? His deserts were otherwise and He was suffering for the sake of others. Can this be justified? Yes, for the fruit of glory that Christ will garner as a result of His sufferings will be His reward for all He endured. Because of His obedience in leaving the heights of heaven and humbling Himself, even to the death of the cross, God highly exalts Him, and graces Him with a name which is over every name, the name of Jesus, to which every knee will bow in adoring worship. This is His reward. Before His humiliation He had been sovereign in the universe, and now He is so once again, yet with a vital difference. Now He is Saviour, Deliverer, Reconciler. Through His sufferings He wins the affections and gets the unforced adoration of the myriads of God's creatures, and all this is God's doing. Will He not then justify His Father for all that He put on Him at Golgotha? During the final eons every creature in the heavens and on the earth and under the earth will have learned of the sufferings of the Christ, and of the depths of the Father's love revealed in them, and every knee will bow to Him Who died, acclaiming Him Lord, for the glory of God the Father. Very feebly we can enter into the joy, the satisfaction, the thankfulness that will be His as He views the vast potentials of love and adoration that will be pulsing within the heart of each of the myriads of the Father's happy family.

Thus will all ultimately be justified. No other way would have done. God's matchless wisdom, serving in the cause of His love, has produced a method of salvation that calls forth the adoring wonder of our hearts. What a God we have! We worship before Him with Paul's words within our hearts: "O, the depth of the riches and the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How inscrutable are His judgments, and untraceable His ways! For, who knew the mind of the Lord? or, who became His adviser? or, who gives to Him first, and it will be repaid him? Seeing that out of Him and through Him and for Him is all: to Him be the glory for the eons! Amen!"

WE ARE FOR GOD

It is not casting any disagreeable reflections on the Almighty to say He determined all things for good. Indeed, it is glorious to learn not only that there is one God, the Father, out of Whom all is, but that we are "for Him": "There is one God, the Father, out of Whom all is, and we for Him" (1 Cor.8:6a). Why are we here? For what purpose do we exist? The answer is, "for God"; that is, for God Himself, even as for His purpose in which we have a place. Just think of it: God actually has a purpose for each one of us, that we should exist rather than not exist and that His goal concerning us should be realized. Each one of us, then, is important to God; and, lest His purpose concerning any one of us should fail, He has ordered the universe in such a way that all is out of Him and through Him; all, in the end, being for Him as well.

PAUL AND GOD'S PURPOSE

IT IS NOT without significance that God's purpose concerning His vast creation should be associated with Paul. The very character of Paul's life seems to mark him out for the unfolding of God's rare design. The gifts bestowed on him, together with the unique ordering of his life and experience, wonderfully prepared him as the revealer of such lofty truth.

From his remarkable conversion on the Damascus road he was set apart for an entirely new and wider ministry, one most blessedly unfettered and free. And, in accord with this, Christ appeared to him, from time to time, imparting to him truths deeper and deeper, until, with enlarged vision, the apostle completed God's enlightening revelation through the Word of His grace.

How many will have thanked God for this wondrous knowledge, time alone will tell. It is of God, by His spirit, through His interpreter, the choice instrument of the Christ of God. Therefore, in the words of another:

"We limit not the truth of God
To our poor reach of mind,
By notions of our day and sect,
Crude, partial and confined.
No, let a new, a greater thought,
Within our hearts be stirred,
For God has still more light and truth
To break forth from His Word."

Thus, to many of God's people larger thoughts have come, and a deeper comprehension of the magnitude of God's purpose. They see, as never before, how wonderful a God is theirs, and how great the Son of His love. They perceive the grandeur of His object, that no one be left outside the blessedness of His great salvation.

It is for all to realize. Maybe not now, yet, in the attainment of God's objective, certainly. For, as Paul puts it, "we rely on the living God, Who is the Saviour of all mankind, especially of those who believe." We who now believe, therefore, derive an added pleasure and joy in believing that when God's goal is reached, He will be the God and Saviour of all, in a real, far-reaching way. And who will be instrumental in such a climax, if not the Christ of God? Who but He could so rule and reign, subduing all hearts by the perfection of His kingly sway?

Since in Him, through Him, and for Him, are all things, such a climax and conclusion is just what we should expect. In such a magnificent way, God truly and royally rewards Him. Note how Paul reverts to this enthralling triumph of God's grace.

After the apostle has referred to Christ as "the Image of the invisible God, Firstborn of every creature," he continues. "For in Him is all created, that in the heavens and that on the earth, the visible and the invisible, whether thrones, or lordships, or sovereignties, or authorities, all is created through Him and for Him, and He is before all, and all has its cohesion in Him . . . for in Him the entire complement delights to dwell, and through Him to reconcile all to Him (making peace through the blood of His cross) through Him, whether those on the earth or those in the heavens" (Col.1:16-20).

Could language be more comprehensive? Note the all embracive word all, so typical of the apostle Paul, who thought in great terms. For the individual assuredly, yet also collectively, in words of rare intimacy. But these are but the stepping stones to a great beyond. All are to be brought into the light and knowledge of God. And let us always remember that God Himself will see to that. It is not altogether left to the endeavor of the church, as many think. It is far beyond that.

Now, there is a fine illustrative incident in Paul's career which well sets forth the operative power of the Father of glory in beneficent harmony with that of the Son. The shipwreck of Paul and of those with him, on the way to Rome, is an instructive story of God's way of salvation. It is good to read the whole account, but we quote outstanding parts. Paul, standing in the midst of those on board the storm-tossed bark, thus addresses them:

"And now I am exhorting you to be cheerful, for not one soul from among you will be cast away . . . . For there stood beside me this night a messenger, of God, Whose I am, to Whom I am offering divine service also, saying, 'Fear not, Paul! Before Caesar you must stand. And lo! graciously has God granted you all those who are sailing with you.' Wherefore, be cheerful, men, for I am believing God that thus it will be, even in the manner which has been spoken to me" (Acts 27:22-25).

Paul then entreated all to partake of nourishment, saying, "For this belongs to this salvation of yours, for not a hair from the head of one of you shall perish." So, we further read, "and thus all came safely through on the land."

Now, calm and beautiful as the Mediterranean can be, there are times when it is subject to a tempestuous wind called Euroclydon. And the transition is often easy and rapid. How like our life! Yet, amid it all, it is evident that reverent dependence upon God is the most becoming attitude of mind for the sons of Adam, liable as they are to shipwreck of faith, as well as of happiness, amid the quicksands of life. But all life, all experience, and all hope centers in the Son of God. Even so, the ship's company could not be lost, because God had given them to Paul. Certainly there was human endeavor, but it was all in the oversight and guardianship of God.

Paul was a choice instrument in the saving of two hundred and seventy-six souls in the vessel. But who can say what will satisfy the heart of Christ if numbers are in question? Surely, no less than all for whom He died. Thus Paul writes, "[God] wills that all mankind be saved. For there is one God, and one Mediator of God and mankind, a Man, Christ Jesus, Who is giving Himself a correspondent Ransom for all (the testimony in its own eras) (1 Timothy 2:4-6).

And again he writes, "for for this are we toiling and being reproached), that we rely on the living God, Who is the Saviour of all mankind, especially of believers. These things be charging and teaching" (1 Timothy 4:10-11).

Can we not then leave it at that, resting in the greatness and glory of His attractive drawing power? For He it is Who brings to completion God's purpose of grace, "the purpose of the eons, which He makes in Christ Jesus, our Lord." And since this is a purpose transcending all human thought, it follows that it must be one of surpassing grandeur. It leaves nothing to be desired.

In the wideness of its range God is given glory from the whole of creation. A permanent, abiding glory, for does it not crown with moving eloquence the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice?

Honor therefore accrues to Paul for unfolding so noble a conception of God, revealing as he does the preciousness and high quality of reconciliation. A lovely term this, for reconciliation describes the condition of accord where previous estrangement has existed. And when its ministry has accomplished its beneficent purpose, God's evangel of grace will have come into its own.

FIGURES OF SPEECH

ONE of the greatest difficulties we meet in correctly understanding the Scriptures is that of distinguishing between literal and figurative language. This difficulty is evident in the fact that the Great Teacher answered the question of His disciples as to why He taught in parables by saying that it was to hide the secrets of the kingdom from Israel at large and at the same time reveal them to the disciples for whom they were intended; for even they did not understand His figurative language until He interpreted the parables to them privately.

The difficulty is further manifest in such incidents as that in which He alluded to the doctrine of the Pharisees and the Sadducees as "leaven," and the disciples thought they should have brought their own bread with them to that place.

One value of figurative language is that so much can be revealed in so few words; but the brevity is the reason of the difficulty in understanding the figure. Many interpretations of parables, all divergent, have been made by authors of volume after volume on the subject.

Picture-writing and the art of painting show more yet than figurative language in condensed space, and such expression of thought is still more difficult to understand than such literary forms as parable and allegory, but a clay tablet, a mountain-side or a piece of canvas is not as expensive as the present cost of print.

The Great Teacher was the greatest adept ever to use figurative language, but His apostle to us is not far behind Him. Paul uses figures in most of his epistles. In Romans 7 he uses a very difficult figure of bondage under law, illustrating it by a combined figure of wedlock and of slavery. In the Corinthian epistles he uses such difficult ones as combined farming and house-building (1 Cor.3), and the seed sown in the soil to illustrate resurrection (chap.15). In 2 Corinthians 5 he uses a combined figure for a tent used for clothing. In Galatians 4 he uses the allegory we study. In Ephesians the believer is an armor-clad soldier. In Philippians we are garrisoned about with God's peace that fights all worries away. In Colossians we are assured that we are delivered from the realm of the king named "Darkness" and naturalized into the dominion of God's dear Son. He told the Thessalonians that they were no longer "children" of that night-Darkness, but children of the day, and therefore they were never to be figuratively asleep, but always watching for the Lord to come. Timothy, Titus and Onesimus were his "sons."

Such a wealth of figurative language is enticing. It challenges the wits to wrestle with the cryptic language and intrigues the spiritual appetite to feast on hidden manna that will make the spiritual man strong in the Lord for His service.

So we set ourselves to unravel the allegory in Galatians 4:19-5:4.

SLAVERY AND SONSHIP

Inspiration designates the story about Hagar and Sarah an "allegory." An allegory is distinguished from a parable by being more complete in the significance of every item of the story than a parable is. An allegory is generally fictitious, such as Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," but this one is an interpretation of real life-occurrences. A fable is not only fictitious, but unreal, as Jotham's story of the trees choosing a king (Judges 9:8). A type is an adumbration, or shadowy outline, of something future, corresponding only in prominent features to the real event.

In the broadest sense of the term, parable (Heb. mashal, Grk. parabole) includes all these figurative forms, for the word parabole means cast beside and so denotes any literary construction (or even any action) set beside a thought in an illustrative way, and is so used in Scripture, as any reader can see for himself by consulting a concordance or lexicon of the original languages.

Some of the marvels of inspiration may be seen in the use of seemingly trivial incidents to foreshadow events of tremendous importance, such as Abraham's slaves staying behind at the foot of Mount Moriah at the offering of Isaac, and thus prefiguring the three disciples in Gethsemane. And Ishmael's mocking baby Isaac portrays in this allegory the persecution and martyrdom of Paul and his associates by those represented by Ishmael. We shall comment on that in this study, but the case of Abraham's slaves must wait its turn.

In studying this allegory we should first of all understand that it is but a section of the argument to which the whole epistle is devoted—justification, that is, righteousness (5:6). Were the believers justified by works, or by grace through faith? Does God choose people for salvation because they previously earned it, or because He loves them first, and they lovingly work because of that? Are we saved because we have worked, or do we work because He has saved us?

Paul calls the Galatians his "children" (4:19), as he also implied that he was the begetting father of the Corinthians (1 Cor.4:15) and of Timothy, Titus and Onesimus. There is a great truth in that, pertaining to the comparative rank of an evangelist in the ecclesia as compared with other officials.

Here in 4:19, however, he boldly uses an arresting figure, implying he was the spiritual mother of these Galatian believers, just as a mother-to-be anxiously watches for the first sign of independent life in her unborn child, to show his solicitude that these Galatian saints should manifest their quickening out of their old deadness in sin into spiritual life in Christ by developing in grace, instead of trying to make themselves grow by their own foetal works under law. Knowing their double-mindedness, he said, "I am perplexed about you," and he wished he could be present with them and speak in different fashion from what he had when he first gave them the good news of justification in grace without any "and" after it, or any mixture of their own works with it. But, being absent, he did the next best thing, and wrote this epistle to them.

Consider his shrewdness as a teacher. In verse 21 he says, in effect, "Since you want to be under law, let's make believe you are, and see how you come out." He proceeds by the allegory to show them that they will come out "at the small end of the horn," as we say, by losing their heritage as sons, comparable to Isaac, and be cast out of the inheritance, comparable to Ishmael. This is the main point in the allegory. We shall notice it in its place.

In this shrewdness he imitated the Great Teacher, who assumed with the Pharisees that they, the ninety-nine sheep, were where the song puts them, "safely in the shelter of the fold." The author of that hymn (mis-)interprets the parable to teach that it applies to the church, though the Teacher "left the ninety-nine in the wilderness," and went to seek the only sheep in His audience that wanted to be saved. The others, thinking themselves safe in the fold, drove the Shepherd away and killed Him, so they could stay where they were. And human beings call animals "dumb!"

The Father showed His wisdom, too, in giving Israel the king they wanted, to teach them how people come out when they love folly. It was probably the only way they could (I was going to say "would") learn. There is nothing like husks to teach a runaway boy the way back to the Father, as the companion parable showed.

So Paul took the Galatians to the law they yearned for, by citing the law in Genesis 21 and showing them things in it they had never seen. Probably none of us could have seen it if it were not shown to us. And we think we know so much!

People who want to put us under the fourth commandment say that "under the law" in Romans 6:14, "you are not under the law, but under grace," does not mean under the law, but under the condemnation and penalty of it by disobeying it. They might "get away with it" there, but what about here? Who would "desire to be under the law" in that sense, and be stoned to death? Worse yet, who would want to put our Saviour "under the law" (verse 4) in that sense? How then could we have any Saviour at all? If we want to add to the inspired words, let us add the true idea, under (the jurisdiction of) the law. That is the evident sense, for immediately after Paul speaks of these saints being under the law, he asks why they do not "hear the law," for the law does have a right to claim heed to what it says from those under its jurisdiction. And here, in Genesis 21, there was no ten-commandment law, but our God was plotting out an allegory of what was to be.

In studying figures it is the wisest course first of all to see if there is an inspired interpretation, for if we trust our own ability we can easily wander astray, since parables and other figures are difficult to understand. One half of the reason why the Son spoke the parables in Matthew 13, was to hide the secrets from Israel at large, the other half of the reason being to reveal them to the disciples to whom they belonged, by interpreting them.

We do have Paul's inspired interpretation of this allegory. It begins by saying that these two women (Hagar and Sarah) are two covenants, then he continues by explaining eight of the ten items of the allegory. We will list them in parallel columns, placing the items of the allegory in the left-hand column and the items of the interpretation at the right, with item corresponding to item, with asterisks before the items Paul interprets, to show that we are not using guess-work on them. These eight interpreted items will thus furnish a safe guide to interpret the other two, Abraham representing God, and the promises about Ishmael made to Hagar in the wilderness of Beer-sheba representing the future destiny of Israel. We have divine authority for placing Abraham in the allegory to represent God (Rom.4:17), but the last item is but the author's suggestion and may be taken for whatever, if anything, it is worth.

If we were together in class, I would ask you to say which of the two women we should list first in the allegory, but since we cannot do that in print (since you can "peek" at the list even now, before you read down to it), I will just assert that even though we might reason from the pre-eminence of Sarah in the family and the fact that she was Abraham's wife before Hagar became physically united to him at Sarah's suggestion, and say that Sarah should therefore be listed first, it is not safe to reason in the face of revelation that calls merely for faith; for Paul says "The first, which is Hagar." So she comes in the list immediately after Abraham.

The reason for this is because God (represented by Abraham) had a relation to Israel under the law covenant (represented by Hagar) before He will yet have a relation to her (whom He wedded, nationally, at Sinai) when He brings her to Himself under another covenant represented by Sarah. And as Abraham was married to Sarah (a barren wife) before he had any children by her, so God made this other covenant with Israel (Gen.12) before it produced results of justification of the nation, so they first had to try the experiment, of works under the later Hagarcovenant, to learn the folly of trying to help God out of a supposed difficulty as Sarah did. Christendom is still trying to help Him out of "the problem of evil" by needless apologies and apologetics instead of accepting in simple faith what He says about His relation to evil.

The interpretation of the allegory not only places Hagar as representing the law covenant, but also as being (figuratively) "Jerusalem that now (in Paul's time) is," for Jerusalem was the city of authority in apostolic times. It was the leaders there who remonstrated to Peter about preaching to Cornelius. And when certain men "from Judea" followed Paul to Antioch and told the believers from among the nations that they must be circumcised and keep the law or they could not be saved (Acts 15:1,24), it was at Jerusalem that the controversy was decided.

That controversy, as here in this Galatian epistle (5:2,6), centered on circumcision, merely because that was the badge of subjection to the law, the slave-brand, so to speak. In our time it is sabbath-keeping.

The only way Israel and mankind in general can learn the futility of self-salvation by works is by failure in the attempt by experience, so Hagar must have her fling at helping God before Abraham and Sarah produced Isaac in faith. And even then God had to wait till Abraham was ninety-nine years old and therefore as helpless as barren Sarah, before He quickened the bodies of them both to be parents, bringing Isaac into the world out of their deadness of parenthood as a representation of bringing the Greater Isaac from the dead because of our justifying (Rom.4:25). So only when we become "without strength" (Rom.5:6) can the blood be applied. A person full of good blood of his own spurns transfusion.

Since Hagar represented old Jerusalem as well as the old covenant, we write "Jerusalem" in parenthesis after her name. We do the same with Sarah, since she also represented another covenant and Jerusalem, the one "which is above." If you do not "peek" at the itemized list below before we get to it, you might be thinking that the Jerusalem that is "above" is the new Jerusalem that is to "come down from God out of heaven." Take a hint by the fact that, as the two women are two Jerusalems corresponding to two covenants, the one Jerusalem is above the other in the same sense that Sarah (illustrating the superior covenant) was above Hagar, though she may not have been taller or lived upstairs. A tent has no upstairs.

Was Ishmael a slave or a son? He was both. He was Abraham's son by begettal, but socially he was a slave too. The allegory contemplates him only as a slave. In the days of the old south if a plantation owner had children by a "mammy," the law made them slaves. Ishmael was a slave because his mother was. When the prodigal returned home in humiliation he renounced his sonship and begged to be only a hired man.

Abraham grieved when he had to choose between Sarah and Hagar in the case of Ishmael. God settled the dilemma by telling the good old patriarchal husband to obey his wife, the only such case in all the Book. And it was so because God was writing out the plot of this allegory in the matter.

God is Your Father: who is your mother? Don't feel too humiliated if you can't answer. I couldn't till last summer, and worse yet, I thought all the time another covenant was my mother. If you don't know your mother it's about time for the introduction. We'll get to it presently.

This whole controversy was a conflict between tradition and new truth. Tradition may be true, since it means only what is handed down. In this case it was the error of self-righteousness. Peter's faith was strained to the breaking-point when his heart was enlarged enough to love Cornelius, the foreigner, and it took a direct divine revelation to make the enlargement. It was the same when the eleven took him to task about it. What would we probably have done if a new teacher should come among us and say "I know your Scriptures say so-and-so, but I say unto you . . ."? Even His miracles did not convince those too blind to see their significance and too stubborn to admit His sinlessness.

The slavery implied in the allegory is sin. Our Saviour spoke of it in this sense (John 8:31-36). So did Paul, extensively (Rom.6 to 8). The aptness of the figure consists in the fact that slavery generally exists only by force, especially by the authority of law, and that the motive that holds a slave in subjection is fear, as shown by the fact that slaves ran away (1 Sam.25:10) when hope of escape was stronger than fear of the increased hardship in punishment if they were caught. The fear that held slaves in law-slavery in this allegory was, in its extreme form, that of being stoned to death.

Paul's description of the inward struggle of those who would do good but found no way to perform it (Rom.7) is very striking in its slave-concept, for the person who would do otherwise, if he could, is a slave to a force greater than his will. He calls that power "sin that dwells in me." Wherever the law had jurisdiction, there was sin perforce, because nobody ever did or can fulfill the divine law but One. So He said, "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keeps the law?" Paul also proved both Jew and Gentile to be under sin (Rom.3:9). There are people yet who think they can fulfill the law perfectly and that they are doing it. When they say that, they prove their boast false, for boasting itself is prohibited by the Scriptures, and that they are sinning when they so speak by even the law itself, for instance, Deuteronomy 8:7-17. To say "We do not boast" is to boast. We do not boast. Therefore we do not say, "We do not boast."

As long as a person does not express what may be a truth by voicing it in the minor premise, it remains true and all is well, but the instant he opens his mouth and speaks that truth it becomes an untruth and the syllogism wrecks itself.

So all those under law are inevitably slaves, as certainly as the fact that Sarah's effort to help God produce the promised son could never result otherwise than that the child to be born must be a slave from his first breath. This shows how impossible it is to become just and righteous by self-effort, whether that effort be to keep the divine law or personal resolutions or having "confidence in yourself" or any other of the fond prescriptions offered by philosophers, theologians, reformers or any other fleshly-wise hopers.

Another fact about slavery should be clearly understood. That is that the slave had no heritage whatever in the master's property (Gal.4:3-7). All that Hagar carried away when she and Ishmael left was enough bread and water to last a few hours.

The converse fact is that sons are heirs, as this sixth verse declares, also Romans 8:17 and Galalatians 3:26-29. Paul shrewdly sets these two facts before the Galatians, as much as to say "Now you see how you come out by making believe we are under the law."

At the council in Jerusalem, called to consider the controversy involved in this allegory, Peter asked the believers from among the Pharisees why they wanted to fasten a yoke on the necks of the new disciples that neither present Israel nor their fathers were able to bear, with an appeal to the believers to stand fast in their freedom as sons and refuse to become burdened with the "yoke of slavery." To say nothing of the impossible burden of trying to fulfill perfectly a perfect law, even such ceremonial requirements as sabbath-keeping do place a heavy burden on those who work among others who do not observe the seventh day. When the neighbors want to join together in some work in which all must share, the sabbath-keepers cannot conscientiously help.

Now as to discovering our mother: She is revealed to us in verses 26 and 31, and identified as the covenant represented by Sarah, for she was the "free woman" cited in verse 31, called "Jerusalem" in verse 26. For as Hagar corresponded to Jerusalem of Paul's time, so Sarah must correspond to some contrasted Jerusalem. So she represented the "Jerusalem (covenant) which is above." Therefore, in whatever sense Sarah was "above," Hagar would be lower in the sense in which our mother-covenant is above the law. It is easy to see how Sarah was above Hagar—in authority. Thus our mother-covenant has greater authority and power than law. Law condemns (2 Cor.3:9). Anyone can condemn, but to transform into uprightness is much greater. So our mother must do the opposite, that is, justify. That fits the whole allegory, for the subject of it is justification. Then we must find the covenant that justifies us and put it in its place in the right-hand column opposite "Sarah (Jerusalem above)" which we put in the left-hand column.

Our mother is not difficult to find. She is right close in the context of the allegory (Gal.3:8), where justification by faith is said to be the blessing contained in the covenant with Abraham in Genesis 12. It is called a "covenant" in Acts 3:25,26, where Peter's inspired interpretation of the blessing, instead of being called justification, is expressed in corresponding words of being turned away from iniquities. So we have now found our mother. This blessing of justification is the "promise referred to in verse 28, where our mother is implied by saying we are "children." Since we are children of promise and children of a covenant which promised the blessing of justification, this promise of justification is evidently the "promise" referred to in this 28th verse. We find it previously in 3:29, where we are told that if we are Abraham's seed because we are in Christ who is Abraham's Seed, we are heirs of the promise, because children are heirs.

Literally, justification cannot be called a covenant, because a covenant is an agreement between parties by which each assures to the other the performance of something called a "consideration." In justification nothing is done, or can be done by the one justified to bring about his justification. It is "not of works," as would be implied by calling it a covenant. So it is a covenant only in the figurative sense that such events as the rainbow was, that is, a one-sided covenant, a promise in which God binds Himself to its fulfillment in the strongest way possible, to assure those to whom He makes promises that He will perform them.

In this allegory of the justifying covenant Paul quotes Isaiah 54 as pertaining to it. For just as Sarah (representing the justifying covenant) was "desolate" (barren) of children (Israel as a nation) a long time while married to Abraham, even though Hagar had a son meanwhile, so this justifying covenant, represented by Sarah, was first barren; it had no national Israel justified till long after the nation was under law, represented by Hagar.

Now you see why we could not say the "Jerusalem which is above" is the New Jerusalem that is necessarily "above" since it comes down from God out of heaven, for she is "the Lambkin's wife" and therefore not our mother. It does not do to mix figures. What may be true in one may be false in another. Our Lord is both a "Lamb" and a "Lion" under different conditions. And again, "seed" in the parable of sowing is the Word, while in the next parable, the tares, it is "the children of the kingdom."

Likewise, we can see why it would not have done to say the "new covenant" is our mother, which would seem very plausible, for the new covenant is to be nationally with Israel, not the Body, though we get (individually) what Israel will get nationally, that is, pardon (Eph.1:7; Col.1:14), as we are told that Paul ministered "a" new covenant of pardon, to us (2 Cor.3:6), though not "the" New Covenant.

Since we are children of a covenant made 430 Years before the law covenant, we are not related to Hagar, since she was not related to Sarah. Let us disown her for all time.

Let it be emphasized with all possible force that we receive real righteousness through justification, not a sham of simply calling us righteous by divine declaration without any expectation that the reckoned is ever to become real. Our righteousness is a perfect one, and is infinitely superior to self-righteousness. In view of this we are exhorted to live soberly, righteously and devoutly "in this present era," not wait for it "beyond the veil." Paul tells Titus to instruct believers to be careful to maintain good works. lt is in the "mortal body" that sin is not to reign (Rom.6:12).

ISAAC OFFERED IN FIGURE

Isaac was raised from death figuratively (Heb.11:19), and there is evidently a representation in this figure in the twenty-second chapter of Genesis showing our Lord's sacrificial death and glorious resurrection (Heb.11:17-19).

The Greek word for "figure" in the AV here is parabolê, which is elsewhere translated "parable" as here in the CV. This shows, that parables generically include actions performed, as well as words spoken, to illustrate truth by a casting beside, which is the literal meaning of parabolê; for the offering of Isaac consisted mostly of dramatic action, with very little being said during the performance.

The same significance of parabolê may be seen in Hebrews 9:9, where the whole dramatic symbolism of the tabernacle-service is designated a parabolê in the Greek (CV "parable"), for there also all was action, without any words to form the parable.

We write out this dramatic parabolism about Isaac in the double-column form, as follows:

Abraham	God
Isaac	God's Son
"Offer him"	(*)The crucifixion of Christ
3 days'journey	Christ's 3 days in the tomb
2 slaves	3 disciples
"Abide here"	"Watch and pray"
"The lad and I"	Jesus praying to the Father
"Worship"	His threefold prayer in Gethsemane
"Will come again to you"	He found them asleep
Wood laid on Isaac	He carrying His cross
Fire	Crucifixion sufferings
"Lay not thy hand"	*Resurrection of Christ

As before, the asterisk signifies the inspired interpretation of the figure, and the remainder is merely the author's.

The first asterisk is put in parenthesis because the death of Isaac representing our Lord's crucifixion is not so interpreted by inspiration, but only implied by Isaac's resurrection "in a parable" since there could be no literal resurrection without a previous death.

If the other listed items are correct, as manifestly evident and necessary accompaniments of the figure, they form a remarkable pre-picture of Gethsemane and Golgotha, and this record in Genesis would be part of "all the Scriptures" in which the risen Christ showed His sufferings to the amazed disciples on the way to Emmaus.

There are two aberrations in the light of truth coming through this figure: two slaves to represent three disciples, and Isaac carrying the wood during the three days when he was figuratively dead, for our Saviour carried His cross before His three days in death. However, in a dim foreshadowing such as this, such aberrations are no more serious than imperfect refraction in physical phenomena and it is remarkable that the events in Gethsemane should have been foreshown in seemingly trivial incidents two thousand years before they occurred.

Then, too, there was a three-day period at the end of our Saviour's life, just before His crucifixion (Luke 13:32-34) and at the close of it He did, like Isaac, carry the wood for His sacrifice. Nevertheless, Isaac carried the wood during the three days while he was figuratively dead, as shown by the fact that his figurative resurrection occurred when the messenger said to Abraham, "Lay not thine hand upon the lad," which would require Isaac's figurative death at the first verse, when the words "offer him" were spoken.

How heavy must have been the heart of that father in those three days, not only with paternal grief, but with the worse assault on his faith; for how could the blessing of the world through the promised Seed come if the line of descent should end with Isaac dead in sacrifice? When a saint is brought face to face with a seeming failure of God's Word, all seems to fall away from beneath the feet.

The father of the faithful saw two alternatives as ways out of his trial, both of which would resolve his doubt: God would either supply an animal for sacrifice (Gen.22:8,13), or else immediately restore Isaac to life (Heb.11:19). Both alternatives came true, though not both in fact, for only the first was true in fact and the second in figure.

The prophecies which reveal the restoration of Israel to the land and blessing under the rule of Messiah deal with many events, covering a considerable period of time in great detail. As the coming of Christ consisted of many events, as His birth, His flight to Egypt, His life in Nazareth, His ministry, His "triumphal" entry, His suffering, crucifixion, death and resurrection, all foretold beforehand, so the various phases of the nation's return to Jehovah is not one single event, the coming of Christ, but a long series, which must be kept distinct, if we wish to avoid being deceived by those that are now taking place.

Through this resurrection of the Coming One figured in the person of his son, Abraham saw that Coming One by faith (John 8:56). He received the benefit of the Saviour's death and resurrection by viewing it prospectively, as we do retrospectively. The benefit was worth all the painful price it cost. Praise God, it always is. It was so with Job, with the shame of the Samaritan woman at the well, with the man born blind, and with Lazarus and his distressed sisters. It will be so with the church and with the whole groaning creation. As Abraham descended from mount Moriah, how much stronger must he have been, not only in faith, but also in spiritual understanding through experience!

When, in telling the patriarch to slay his son, God reminded Abraham of his love for Isaac, He was not unfeelingly harrowing the old saint's emotions and making the trial as difficult as possible. He was but building this figure to show how "God so loved the world."

One great truth emerges grandly into view in all such Scriptures as this one: Christ is so fully in them that "His name is called The Word of God." The Father was hanging His Son's portrait on all the walls along the passage-ways of time, not only that the elect might not miss "the Way," but that the mouths of the non-elect may not open in a syllable of boasting complaint at the great white throne, but become utterly subject to God's wonderful and sovereign grace.

How marvelous are His ways!

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

UNSEARCHABLE RICHES, SECOND QUARTER 2016
BEING THE SECOND NUMBER OF VOLUME ONE HUNDRED SEVEN

EDITORIAL

ONE HUNDRED years ago, in the August 1916 issue of Unsearchable Riches, A. E. Knoch commented on Romans 1:17 as follows:

"The faith of Christ is brought before us in the otherwise enigmatical statement 'from faith to faith' (Rom.1:17). Literally this is 'out of faith into faith.' There are two faiths in view. The latter is our faith; the former is Christ's. Justification is founded on His faith: it is conferred on our faith. Abraham was constituted righteous for his faith: Christ makes all men righteous because of His faith. Hence we find the statement (which is so often referred to us who believe) 'the Just One shall live by His faith.' This refers to One only, not many or all, however aptly it may be 'applied' to them. He kept alive by His faith, and because of its surpassing perfection, it is the foundation of all other faith"

The article in which this quotation is taken is reprinted in the present issue, starting on page 51. Entitled, "The Son of Abraham," it recounts the glories of Christ as Abraham's Seed, Whose faith is the source of all blessings. The remarks quoted above appear on page 59.

Later (in 1938), Brother Knoch repeated this understanding of Romans 1:17 in an article entitled "Jesus Christ's Faith," although he was less definite on the application of Habakkuk 2:4 to Christ. This study is also reprinted here, but in condensed form, starting on page 61.

Through the years we have given increasing attention to the important subject of the faith of Jesus Christ. Two excellent articles on this theme are reprinted in this issue. The first, from his series on Galatians is James Coram's study entitled "Through the Faith of Christ," starting on page 64. Here Christ's faith is convincingly assigned its right place over and against human works of law. Then starting on page 90, with the similar title, "The Faith of Jesus Christ," Phil Scranton helps us see something of the personal struggle and suffering which Christ's faith involved.

This latter contribution and William Mealand's meditation which concludes our magazine reflect more of what is involved in the words "for [our] faith" in Romans 1:17 than the other articles. Indeed, what a great blessing and privilege we have in faith.

But turning back to Brother Knoch's early comments on Romans 1:17 and the critical place of the faith of Jesus Christ, I wish to acknowledge my own indebtedness to him, in preparing my studies in this issue.[1] There may well be a double reference in the citation from Habakkuk 2:4, but surely the first and primary application is to Christ. Our faith is worth nothing apart from His faith. Our faith is in His faith. Hence it seems correct to me that the CV print the words "Just (One)" with initial capital letters in order to convey the dominant sense of the passage. The "first application" of the citation from Habakkuk in Romans 1:17 clearly should be to Christ. And its application to the individual believer who is just in the sense that justification has been reckoned to him or her upon believing, not on the basis of works of law, should be indicated in a footnote.

In the matter of faith, Christ is first (cp Col.1:19).

D.H.H.

1. I also wish to acknowledge the contribution of several current theologians who have taken decidedly untraditional positions similar to our own regarding Christ's faith. Among these are Richard B. Hays, in his book, The Faith of Jesus Christ (second edition, Eerdmans, 2002), and Douglas A. Campbell, in his large volume entitled, The Deliverance of God (Eerdmans, 2009).

THE SON OF ABRAHAM

THE TITLE Son of Abraham is burdened with blessing for all the nations of the earth, as well as the title to the land of promise. Only once is our Lord distinguished by this dignity. The opening words of Matthew describe Him as the Son of David and the Son of Abraham. In the genealogy which follows David is called "the king." His royal prerogatives are the ruling factor in Matthew's account, yet His secondary title, Son of Abraham is also acknowledged when the centurion's servant (8:5-13) and the daughter of the woman of Canaan (15:22-28) remind us that, through Abraham, all the nations of the earth are to be blessed. And it is in recognition of this title that the commission goes forth, at the close of Matthew's account, which includes all nations in its scope (28:18-20).

To apprehend the truth conveyed in this blessed title we must retire to a period anterior to the time of David, where the kingdom has its source; we must leave the law to the time of Moses; and, for the most precious part of the truth, we must go back to Abraham even before the institution of the rite of circumcision. The promises were made to Abraham four hundred and thirty years before the law was given (Gal.3:17); and he was accounted just before the sign of circumcision set its seal upon his flesh (Rom.4:10,11). Consequently it is possible, in Christ, to be of Abraham's seed, even though uncircumcised and unsubjected to the law (Gal.3:7,29).

THE STARS, AND THE SOIL GRAINS

Abram was charged to get out of his country, and from his kindred and from His father's house (Gen.12:1). But, when he left Charan, Lot went with him, contrary to the command (Gen.12:4,5). Faith fails further when he goes down into Egypt to escape the famine (Gen.12:10). At his return trouble begins to brew because he had not left his kindred. Faith asserts itself, and he gives Lot the choice of the land. Thereupon Yahweh assures him that the land is his and his seed's for the eon and that his seed shall be as the "dust of the earth," or, rather, the soil grains of the land.

Lot may choose the richest for himself, but God will see that it is sure to Abraham's seed and thus reward the magnanimity of His friend. This promise is repeated to Jacob (Gen.28:14); and Balaam, seeking to curse Israel, is constrained to bless them with the exclamation, "Who can count the dust [soil-drift] of Jacob" (Num.23:10)? Solomon sets his seal to the fulfillment of this promise when he reminds Yahweh that He had made him king over a people "like the soil of the land in multitude" (2 Chron.1:9 AV).

In all these passages the words "dust of the earth" really refers to the soil of the land of Israel. It is a most apt figure, indeed, for in another and more literal sense the descendants of Jacob in the land were that very soil in corporate form. Was not this the thought in the Baptist's mind, when he declared "God is able out of these stones to raise up children to Abraham?" The stones decompose and form soil. The soil is incorporated into the plants which form fodder for cattle. And these, in turn, nourish and sustain the sons of Jacob, who are the seed of Abram. Among those who are included in this class we may count King David, and must not fail to include his greater Son, Who, as to the flesh, was David's seed (Rom.1:3), and Abram's too [even as the One Seed, Gal.3:16].

The context and the circumstances which attend this promise seem to limit this figure to that part of Abram's descendants who lived in the land, rather than on the whole earth.

Abram's faith, now that he is restored to full communion with God, ascends still higher. When Lot's selfishness costs him all that he has, including himself, Abram rescues him from the confederate kings. He meets Melchizedek, pays him tithes and learns that his God is Owner of the heavens and earth. As a consequence of having so rich a God he refuses to take so much of the spoils as a sandal lacing, lest any one (except God) should say "It is I who made Abram rich" (Gen.14:23). Then it is that Yahweh speaks to him and rewards him with the words "I am your Shield, your exceeding great Reward" (Gen.15:1). From this sublime peak of faith it is that God shows him what his recompense will be. "Now Look up toward the heavens and count off the stars, if you can number them . . . . Thus shall become your seed" (Gen.15:5).

Only one who has enjoyed the starlit nights of a country like the land of promise can realize the almost infinite number of stars which light the azure vault above from the torch-like Sirius to the filmy veil of the milky way stretching across the heavens. And only one attuned to the exquisite imagery of oriental speech can respond to the high feelings with which it invests the starry host. Scripture is far from silent on this sublime theme. The stars, we read, are made to rule the night (Psa.136:9). Joseph dreamed that the eleven stars made obeisance to him. And, when we find Israel in her royal glory, she is crowned with twelve stars (Rev.12:1). Is it not clear from this that the star seed are not the ordinary descendants of Abram, such as were figured by the soil, but saints—for the saints shall rule the world (1 Cor.6:2)—not only the saints in Israel's crown who are of the circumcision, who are born from above (John 3:3 not "again"), but all the saints; all who, like Abram, believe God and are accounted righteous (Rom.4:16-25)? That this star seed is not a figure confined to the saints whose destiny is heaven will be seen when we note how often Israel is thus described (Exodus 32:13; Deut.1:10; 10:22; 28:62; 1 Chron.27:23; Neh.9:23). When Israel is apostate as in the opening chapters of the Apocalypse, Yahweh speaks to them through messengers who are represented as seven stars (Rev.1:16,20, etc). These suffer during the time of trouble, when the "little horn" casts them to the ground and stamps upon them (Dan.8:10). And in the resurrection those who turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for the eons of the eons (Dan.12:3).

Outshining all the rest of this starry host is the Son of Abraham, for

A star will position itself from Jacob
And a scepter will arise from Israel. (Num.24:17)

He is the one bright particular Star Who will herald the dawn of the day of Yahweh. He is the Resplendent Morning Star (Rev.22:16) Whose early beams are the harbingers of a glorious day.

And shall we not read the story of the wise men in this light? It is told in the very book which opens with the mention of Abraham's Son. They recognized His star in the east and they knew that the Seed of Abraham, Who had been promised so long ago, was about to come and rule as was His right (Matt.2:1-10).

The promise of the star seed was made before the rite of circumcision had been given. It was further enforced by the ratification of the covenant on the part of Yahweh. As was the custom of the time, Abram prepared the covenant victims and was prepared to pass between the portions in token of his agreement to perform his part. But what part had he to perform? Nothing was to be left to him. All was to be left to God's grace. So he is put to sleep, and thus the symbols of God's presence pass between the victims in token of God's unconditional and irrevocable determination to fulfill the contract quite apart from Abram's efforts altogether (Gen.15:7-21).

THE SAND SEED

That Abram did not fully appreciate this is seen when he lends a hand and genders the unpromised, unrecognized son of the slave girl. Ishmael, however, at Abraham's sore request, is granted a measure of blessing. He is to become a great nation. But in Isaac, not Ishmael, must his seed be called. Isaac is not the fruit of the flesh. He is the first of the star seed. After Abraham had offered him upon the altar and had received him back in symbolic resurrection, the promise of the seed is renewed. His seed was to be as the stars of heaven, with the significant addition: and as the sand which is upon the seashore. Is not this a recognition of his purely physical progeny by Ishmael and his other children? All of these were circumcised in their flesh, so that all of the circumcised nations who sprang from Abraham are the fulfillment of this promise. That those who believe are not in view seems clear when we note the contrast between Jacob and Israel.

Jacob, the supplanter, will be multiplied as the sand of the sea (Gen.32:12) but Israel, the man of faith, shall be multiplied as the stars of heaven (Ex.32:13). Significant it is that this phrase is applied to Israel's enemies. The confederacy of Jabin, King of Hazor, was "multitudinous as the sand on the sea shore" (Joshua 11:4). The Philistines gathered themselves together to fight with Israel "numerous as the sand on the seashore" (1 Sam.13:5). Hushai counselled Absalom, when he revolted, to gather all Israel "as numerous as the sand by the sea" (2 Sam.17:11) in order to fight King David. The stars would never join his treacherous host but would cleave to Yahweh's anointed. Israel's last enemies, after the thousand years, are described by this figure. The number of Gog and Magog is "as the sand of the sea" (Rev.20:8). Perhaps this is the key to the position of the serpent as he (not John) stands upon the sands of the sea (Rev.13:1).

Our Lord uses this figure to describe the nation of Israel in His day. They were building on sand. They were depending on the physical descent from Abraham. They boasted, We have Abraham for our father! Yet all the while they were seeking to kill the true Son of Abraham! They depended on the law, which, like the seed of Abraham by Hagar, gendered to bondage. Hagar was a slave girl and Ishmael was born into slavery. So are all the rest of Abraham's seed who are bound under law and do not know the liberty which comes through the Son of Abraham's faith.

That the sands do not suggest the believers today is certain when we consider Isaiah's cry concerning the nation: "Though the number of the sons of Israel be as the sands of the sea" only "a residue shall be saved" (Rom.9:27).

When we remember that the divine figure for the nations is the sea and Israel the solid soil, the figure of the sea shore sand is seen to represent the physical seed of Abraham. It is an intermediate, half way place, always subject to the surging of the sea, unstable and unfruitful. Thus was Israel as a nation. Only a remnant among them rose to the dignity of believing God and becoming spiritual sons of Abraham. And those of this remnant were, usually, the poor, the despised, the outcast. Perhaps the most degraded of all, in the popular mind, were the tax gatherers, who farmed the taxes for the Romans.

"Let him be to you even as the man of the nations and tribute collector" (Matt.18:17) shows how low this class had fallen in the estimate of the people. The publicans were deemed no better than aliens. Matthew was one of these. Zaccheus was a chief tax collector, and therefore most unpopular. His low stature figures this. His position in the wild fig tree (sycamore) shows his elevation at the hands of Israel's oppressor, Rome. Israel was the true fig tree. Rome was the unpalatable, wild variety.

But in spite of Zaccheus' physical and social lack, he had the one thing needful. He had faith. This constituted him a true son of Abraham. Indeed he is the only one who is specifically named as such (Luke 19:9). What a contrast between this ostracized traitor of Jericho and the great priest in the temple at Jerusalem! Yet their spiritual distance is still greater, for the priest is a son of Satan, the tribute collector a son of Abraham.

Lazarus and the rich man (Luke 16) afford another notable contrast between the seed of Abraham by faith and that of his flesh. Both Lazarus and the rich man are acknowledged by Abraham, yet they are accorded places quite the opposite in death. Taking this death in the figurative sense which we ascribe to the prodigal in this very connection (Luke 15:24) and interpreting the double death dealing with the national demise of Israel, we find that now, during Israel's defection there are two classes. One, represented by the rich man, is the nation at large, suffering in the flame of persecution, which has followed them in all their weary wanderings. But a few—a remnant the apostle calls them—believe God and find refuge in Abraham's bosom. The comfort they enjoy is that of faith. These are the ones to whom the epistle to the Hebrews was written. While the kingdom is deferred, they, like the faithful of old, die in faith, not receiving the promises. They rest in Abraham's bosom.

Returning to the original promise to Abraham that his seed should be as the stars of heaven, we read the important addition: "And he believed on Elohim, and He reckoned it to him for righteousness."

Abraham believed God. That was all he did. So, today, he who believes God may enjoy the same blessing that came to Abraham. But it is well to note that belief was not a constant trait of Abraham. Peer though he is of all the faithful except One, he failed (as all do) in his strongest point. Not so his greater Son.

Abram fled into Egypt to escape the famine, but Christ refused to make bread out of the stones to satisfy a fast of forty days (Matt.4:3,4). Abraham tempted God in the case of Hagar, but Christ refused to cast Himself down, saying "You shall not be putting on trial the Lord your God" (Matt.4:7). Abraham failed again at Gerar, but His Seed would not worship aught but God, in spite of a much greater temptation. Abraham's faith was great but his Son's faith was far greater.

The translators of our versions did not believe in Christ's faith, judging by the way they manipulated the passages which point it out. His preeminence in this regard is the special burden of the twelfth of Hebrews. There He is called the Inaugurator and Perfecter, or chief leader, of faith. The grand array of the faithful of the past are headed by His example. But none of them were perfect or mature in faith. Not so He. Faith finds in Him its only perfect Specimen.

The aptness of His example is lost in our translations. It is not "for" or in view of the joy set before Him that He endured the cross, but in place of the joy lying before Him, that He endures impalement, disparaging shame. The word is ANTI, as when we read that Herod ruled in the stead of his father (Matt.2:22). The proclamation of the kingdom was made by Him in all good faith. Had it been accepted the joy of reigning over His people and ruling the whole earth would have been His. Instead of this, His faith in God enables Him to endure His rejection and crucifixion. His reward now is that He has sat down at the right hand of God's throne. The joy of earth's throne is His only by faith in God's word.

How helpful this for the Hebrews! They were in much the same position. When the kingdom was again proclaimed, after His ascension, they expected the joy of reigning with Him. But, just as in His case, the kingdom fails to materialize. Instead of the joy they anticipated, they endured much affliction and persecution. Hence He is given them for an Inaugurator. Let them follow His example. He is the One, too, Who is the Maturer of faith. Only by following Him will their faith come to fruition.

The faith of Christ is brought before us in the otherwise enigmatical statement "from faith to faith" (Rom.1:17, AV). Literally this is "out of faith into faith." There are two faiths in view. The latter is our faith; the former is Christ's. Justification is founded on His faith: it is conferred on our faith. Abraham was reckoned righteous by his faith: Christ makes all men righteous because of His faith. Hence we find the citation of Habakkuk 2:4 in Romans 1:17, "the Just One by faith shall be living." This refers to One only, not many or all, however aptly it may be "applied" to them. He kept alive by His faith, and because of its surpassing perfection, it is the foundation of all other faith.

Just as it was in Abram's case, faith and righteousness are inseparably linked together. Not only that righteousness will be ascribed to us as it was to Abraham when we, too, believe God, but the faith of Jesus Christ is always put as the basis out of which this blessing flows. For those who have not considered this aspect of Christ's work, we commend the earnest study of the following passages:

Romans	3:22	a righteousness of God through Jesus Christ's faith for all who are believing
Romans	3:26	for Him to be just and the Justifier of the one who is (out) of the faith of Jesus
Galatians	2:16	a man is not justified by (out of) works of law, except alone through the faith of Christ Jesus
	16	that we may be justified by (out of) the faith of Christ

Galatians 3:22 that the promise [righteousness], out of Jesus Christ's faith, may be given to those who are believing

Philippians 3:9 not having my righteousness which is out of law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is from God for faith.

Note that in each case the blessing is that of being justified and in every instance the faith which He exercised is the ground upon which it is based.

This glory of His as the Inaugurator and Perfecter of Faith has long been eclipsed by unscriptural and gratuitous attempts to gild His glories. But it is our wisdom to abide by what is written, for much which seems to dignify His character is but a human caricature when viewed in His light.

Abraham had one son, whom he loved (Gen.22:2). So, too, there is One Who alone can claim, in His Own right, to be called the Son of Abraham. He is the Seed in whom all the nations of the earth shall be blessed. His faith is the foundation upon which God will finally justify all mankind (Rom.5:18). Then His blessedness will be more than the man of whom David sings,

Happy the human to whom Yahweh is not reckoning depravity (Psa.32:2)

For He will be the Blesser.

GUNTER ZATZSCH

We are sorry to report the loss of a dear friend of many years, Gunter Zatzsch. He was born in Dresden, Germany and emigrated to Canada after the war in the 1950's. He will be greatly missed by his friends at the Concordant bible study in Kitchener, Ontario and by all who knew him. Gunter was 86.

JESUS CHRIST'S FAITH

FAITH is generally supposed to be restricted to the saints, and quite out of the question in connection with Christ, notwithstanding the fact that He is hailed as the Inaugurator and Perfecter of faith (Heb.12:2). I do not remember ever reading of Jesus Christ's faith until I began to read my Greek text. Then it impressed me very much in my studies of the third of Romans. Nevertheless I was rather diffident in regard to it and said little until I was forced to translate this phrase in the version. Then the question arose, Am I mistaken as to the force of the genitive here? It does not seem possible that it denotes the faith of others in Him.

Nevertheless, a survey of various modern English translations of such passages as Romans 3:22,26; Galatians 2:16,20; Ephesians 3:12 and Philippians 3:9 made it evident that this is the usual understanding. But, as the in itself also occurs frequently, as Romans 6:11 "living in Christ Jesus," Romans 6:23 "eonian life in Christ Jesus," Romans 8:1 "those who are in Christ Jesus," Romans 8:2 "life in Christ Jesus," and Romans 8:29 "love of God in Christ Jesus," it seems unwise to insert it unnecessarily, especially as this is not the dative case to which in is confined. That our faith is in Him is a different thought from that expressed by the possessive case. That this truth concerning Jesus Christ's faith was lost early is seen from the fact that, while the earlier manuscripts still have it in Romans 3:22, Alexandrinus, written about the fifth century, has altered to in Christ Jesus, reversing the title as well, in order to correspond to the connective.

OUT OF FAITH, INTO FAITH

In connection with our survey we also looked in various versions at the phrase, rendered "from faith to faith," in the AV of Romans 1:17. It shows how cloudy the matter is. We have from faith to faith, by faith unto faith, depending on faith and tending to produce faith, by faith and for faith, and by faith in order to faith. Does not this show clearly that there is something in the background of these translations which makes this simple series of words an enigma to them? It is to be regretted that English will not bear into faith, for then the rendering of the CONCORDANT VERSION could at least be literal, and might, in time, be perfectly intelligible. Now the only clear explanation seems to be out of [Christ's] faith for [our] faith.

If we seek to explain the other renderings it seems to be impossible to get solid ground under our feet, for they almost all differ, yet which is to be preferred? None of them is covered by the quotation "the just by faith shall be living." It is only as we take it of Christ in the first place, the Just One because of His faith (though He did not need to be justified from sin by faith), the source of the revelation of God's righteousness, and make our faith the object (as the grammar of the Greek), that we can understand that, in both cases, a just one is living by faith. Indeed, the word just is in the singular here, as it is in Habakkuk 2:4, so that its first application may be to Christ Himself.

THROUGH FAITH OF JESUS CHRIST

The third of Romans, especially the paragraph from verses 21 to 28, is of the highest importance to the understanding of justification. It is for (into) all and on all who are believing through faith of Jesus Christ. Either it is His faith, that is, it belongs to Him (which is the usual sense of the genitive), or it comes from Him, though this would ordinarily demand more definite expression, by means of a connective, as from or out of. Examples of the genitive of in Romans up to this point are as follows: 1:1 slave of Christ Jesus, 1:6 the called of Jesus Christ, 1:7 grace . . . and peace from [apo] Jesus Christ, 1:8 thanking through [dia] Jesus Christ, 2:16. From these we see that the slaves and called ones who belonged to Christ are simply denoted by of, but when such things as faith (or peace) come to us from or through Him, the relation is defined by a connective.

"Jesus" is our Lord's personal name, so it is difficult to understand anything else than the personal faith of the Man of Sorrows when we read of the "faith of Jesus" (Rom.3:26). Hence it is difficult to see why so many translators simply change it to in. The American Revisers seem to have recognized that it was not satisfactory, by their margin, at Romans 3:22 and 3:26. The simple sense seems to be that the Man Jesus had faith in God. In Galatians we have an echo of the passages in Romans. Here at Galatians 2:16 and 3:22 the American Standard (Revision), however, has reversed its attitude, and inserted in without putting "of" in the margin, where the Authorized Version was correct.

THE BASIS OF JUSTIFICATION

The confusion which exists among translators should convince us that some false notion is back of it, and should open our minds to the fact that our Lord, as a Man, had confidence in God (Matt.27:43), hence is the Inaugurator and Perfecter of faith, by far the greatest Example of the faith in the annals of mankind. And His faith is the basis of justification just as our faith is the channel through which it is received and enjoyed.

A. E. Knoch

The preceding article is abridged from the original study, published in Unsearchable Riches vol.29, pp.375-382.

"THROUGH THE FAITH OF CHRIST"

We, who by nature are Jews, and not sinners of the nations, having perceived that a man is not being justified by works of law, except alone through the faith of Christ Jesus, we also believe in Christ Jesus that we may be justified by the faith of Christ and not by works of law, seeing that by works of law shall no flesh at all be justified. (Gal.2:15,16)

As Paul herein explains to the Galatians, those who are truly enlightened believers in Christ—even if "by nature" they are Jews (and so inherently zealous for the law; cp Acts 21:20)—recognize that a man is not being justified by works of law, but through the faith of Christ Jesus.

Those who know the truth, even if they, like Paul, should be Jews from birth, and from their youth fully mindful of all that the law has to say as to the central place of seeking justification by works (cp Rom.2:13; 10:3), realize that, nonetheless, a man is not being justified by works of law—no matter how zealous he may be in his quest for attaining such a goal.

Yet as those who have been enlightened to perceive the evangel, Paul explains that "we" not only become aware of how justification does not occur, but of how it does occur as well. We perceive, says Paul, that it is through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus (Rom.3:24), which is to say that it is through the faith of Christ Jesus.

Such ones, then, may "also" believe "into Christ Jesus"—thus to restate the case more positively and boldly—that (1) they may be justified by the faith of Christ; and (2) not by works of law, seeing that, according as it is written, "no living one at all can be righteous before [God]" (cit. Psa. 143:2; cp Rom.3:20).

Of course, this declaration that no living one at all can be righteous before God, is a relative statement made in relation to law. That is, no living one at all can be righteous before God by works of law. But, by the faith of Christ, we may be justified! This is the evangel; and this, Paul would have us know.

That justification is by the faith of Christ, is the answer to the age-old question, ". . . how can a mortal be righteous before El?" (Job 9:2). It is one thing to be righteous before men, but quite another to be righteous before God. It is one thing to be classed as "just" comparatively speaking, in contrast to those who are abjectly defiled; but it is quite another to be just before God, and thus to be declared righteous by God Himself.

In this respect, the words of Job's friend, Eliphaz the Temanite, are true enough: "What is a mortal that he should be cleared, or that one born of a woman should be justified? If even on His holy ones, He puts no reliance, and the heavens are not purged in His eyes, how much less man, who is abhorrent and spoiled, who is drinking iniquity like water" (Job 15:14-16).

Noble men often have sought righteousness before God on a basis of their own deeds; and, since compared to their fellows, at least they have approached more closely to the ideal, it is the custom among men to term such ones "righteous." But even such exceptional personages have fallen far short of the ideal. They too must be included among the "all" who not only have sinned but who have also been found wanting of the glory of God (Rom.3:23), which alone is the standard of true righteousness.

Though God has indeed graced such commendable ones with an uncommon measure of virtue, still, it is a virtue that is neither comprehensive nor constant. Even the noble, then, are themselves extensively corrupted; and, even as the rest hopelessly lost apart from a Saviour. They too, on a basis of "works of law," can never be just "before God."

"NOT BY WORKS OF LAW"

The 1976 edition of the Concordant Version, in Galatians 2:16, renders the phrase which in the paragraph above I present as "but (through the faith of Christ Jesus)," as "except alone (through the faith of Christ Jesus)" (2:16). This was an attempt to clarify the 1930 edition of the CV which read, "except it be through . . ." even as the 1966 CV which was translated, "if it should not be through . . . ."

The problem here is that if the phrase in question, which follows the words "a man is not being justified by works of law," is taken as an exception under the circumstance of which a man is being justified by works of law, the truth is lost and the context itself is contradicted.

An attempt was made to circumvent this by the addition of the lightface "alone." Yet the undiscerning reader, upon noting that "alone" was added by the translator, may declare that he is not obliged to accept any such "additions." Such a one may then conclude—albeit contrary to the entire tenor of the passage—that Paul's thought is that while ordinarily a man is not being justified by works of law, when these, however, are coupled with faith in Christ, a man is being justified by works of law!

Since the Greek is IF-EVER NO (ean mê), our translators endeavored to reflect this fact in the English, while still providing a readable translation. Yet their renderings remained obscure, at least to the ordinary reader. We have noted that "but" (as in, "but for the grace of God, there go I") can serve well for this Greek phrase; in fact the Authorized Version renders ei mê (IF-NO) thus 53 times. We now propose to do the same for IF-EVER-NO in this passage, with a superior prefix "ex" (for "except") preceding in small type. Thus, in a future edition, the verse would simply read:

". . . a human is not being justified[c] [o]by works of law, [ex]but through the faith of Christ Jesus."

Though because of the idiosyncrasies of idiom, the sense of this text may be difficult to convey when rendered more strictly, in principle, the thought here accords with that of 1 Corinthians 12:3, where we read, "No one is able to say, 'Lord is Jesus.' except by holy spirit." That is, "No one is able to say 'Lord is Jesus.' Except by holy spirit, (this cannot be done)." Similarly, then, "A man is not being justified by works of law. Except through the faith of Christ Jesus, (this cannot be done)."

JUSTIFYING THE IRREVERENT

To be "justified"' is to be declared righteous; and, it is God Himself Who is our Justifier (Rom.8:33). Through the benefits afforded to us through the faith of Christ even now, God declares us righteous.

We are justified both in a vindicatory sense, as well as in an anticipatory sense. In the vindicatory sense, through the work of Christ, God is able to "justify" us in the sense of "show sufficient reason why" such sinners even as ourselves not only should exist but should also be saved. It is because it is only through sin, and the deliverance therefrom, that God's love and grace through the blood of Christ may be made known. God has need of irreverent sinners, to glorify His own Name in their salvation (Rom.4:5).

In the anticipatory sense, God justifies us through Christ thus, even now, calling what is not as if it were, because, in that day, the day of Christ's glorious advent we will then actually be constituted just. Then, we will be conformed to the image of His Son (Rom.8:29). In the day of our vivification, we will enjoy immortality and incorruption, even as great power and glory (1 Cor.15:42,43). We are awaiting a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, Who will transfigure the body of our humiliation, to conform it to the body of His glory (Phil.3:20,21). Surely, then, in an anticipatory sense as well, it should not surprise that, even today, God already declares us righteous.

Yet this is only so, "through the faith of Christ Jesus" (Gal.2:16). In Christ "we have boldness and access, with confidence, through His faith" (Eph.3:12). Accordingly, like Paul, we wish "to be found in Him, not having [our] righteousness, which is of law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is from God for faith" (Phil.3:9).

Paul intimately associates "the faith of Christ Jesus," with "the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus" (Rom.3:22,24). He uses both of these phrases in identifying the means through which our justification is effected. It is through Christ's own faith, then, which became His faith*fulness,* that our justification is achieved. Our Lord's trust in God concerning the cross, which led to His faithful obedience unto death, is the sole instrumentality of our justification.

LIVING UNTO GOD

Now if, while seeking to be justified in Christ, we ourselves also were found sinners, is Christ, consequently, a dispenser of sin? May it not be coming to that! For if I am building again these things which I demolish, I am commending myself as a transgressor. (Gal.2:17,18)

Though a trivial act in itself, Cephas' refusal to eat with those of the nations (2:12), was fraught with serious consequences. Thus he affirmed that the uncircumcised believers were "common and unclean" (cp Acts 10:28; 11:3), and set up again the barrier of law. If we should put ourselves under law, by claiming that this is what Christ would have us do, we imply that, effectually, He is the dispenser of sin.

This is because, if He indeed would now have us take up the very agency through which Sin revives, gets an incentive, and produces in us all manner of coveting (cf Rom.7:8-10), it is impossible to disassociate Him from our failures. Such, through works of law, was the nature of the old covenant under which God displayed man's failure in all its horror. Such is not the nature of the Pauline evangel, which is, so to say, "a new covenant" indeed (cp 2 Cor.3:6).

If Paul were to once again establish a policy of law-righteousness, which he had previously discarded (cp Phil.3:7), in so doing he would be "commending" himself as a transgressor. That is, thus he would be providing himself with the very means by which he would now have the "standing" of a transgressor. Where no law is, there is no transgression (Rom.4:15). Yet under law, sinners become transgressors. Paul refused to put himself in any such jeopardy ever again.

Submitting to public pressures (as Cephas did, and as the Galatians were doing) in a way that suggests we think the law has some force in justification is a sin and may give the impression that justification in Christ encourages such sinful hypocrisy. Yet the Galatians were making law-justification (Rom.2:13) an acceptable thing, at least in relation to circumcision, and so were rebuilding what they had demolished. Were they actually "under law" (in relation to Paul's evangel), their taking up with the law would have been a transgression! (There is perhaps some irony here.)

Under grace we have a "right" to do anything: "All is allowed me" (1 Cor.8:9; 10:23). But Paul was very jealous of the evangel and was sensitive to the effects our behavior will have on others. The saving grace of God trains us to act in accord with what we believe, that is out of love and with the glory of God always in view.

This can only be done by the saving power of the evangel itself. This is the message of Galatians 5:25, how it is that "living in spirit, in spirit, we may be observing the elements [of the law] also." The essential meaning of the law (love for God and then for our fellow humans) is observed by those who are "living in spirit" (which means living in accord with the evangel; cf Gal.3:5).

For I, through law, died to law, that I should be living to God. With Christ have I been crucified, yet I am living; no longer I, but living in me is Christ. Now that which I am now living in flesh, I am living in faith that is of the Son of God, Who loves me, and gives Himself up for me. (Gal.2:19,20)

"We have endeavored to transcribe this marvelous compendium of the faith as nearly as possible as it is in the Original, for even the order of the words is exquisite. The sentence opens and closes with Christ, and a negative I occupies its center. It may be shown graphically thus:

'WITH CHRIST
HAVE I BEEN CRUCIFIED,
YET I AM LIVING—
NO LONGER I,
BUT LIVING IN ME IS CHRIST.'"[1]

FAITH'S LAW OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

God has ordained a law for us! It is not a law of works; it is instead, "faith's law; for we are reckoning a man to be justified by faith apart from works of law" (Rom.3:28). This law states that: "through Jesus Christ's faith . . . [we are] being justified gratuitously in [God's] grace, through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus" (Rom.3:22,24). It is through this law of faith that we have died to all law concerned with sin and death. Christ died for our sins! Our sins have been died for, "that we should be living to God." Our living to God depends upon our having died to condemnatory law. Hence, as Paul declares, "With Christ have I been crucified." Yet the wonder of it is that though it is true that in this respect we have "died," it is as a result of this very death, together with Christ, that in our spirits we now are living! So in saying "I" am living, Paul must add that it is "no longer I, but living in me is Christ."

It was not the power of the flesh, which is weakness, which was vitalizing Paul, but the power of Christ's spirit in him. As he said, "that [life] which I am now living in flesh, I am living in faith that is of the Son of God, Who loves me, and gives Himself up for me" (Gal.2:20b).

I am not repudiating the grace of God. . . . (Gal.2:21a)

To "repudiate" something is to reject its validity, or to refuse to acknowledge it. It is to have "no place" for it, which is the meaning of the elements of the Greek word we translate "repudiate" (atheteo, UN-PLACE).

The apostle Paul, decidedly, was not repudiating the grace of God; he was rather exalting it, and giving it its rightful place.

. . . for if righteousness is through law, consequently Christ died gratuitously. (Gal2:21b)

The Galatians, however, in seeking justification through law instead of through the faith of Christ were repudiating the grace of God. "For if," as they fondly imagined, "righteousness is through law, consequently Christ died gratuitously" (2:21). A gratuitous act is an uncalled for or unwarranted act such as that of the hatred of the Jews for Jesus, whereby, in hating Him, since He had done nothing but good, they necessarily hated Him gratuitously (John 15:25).

The Galatians' repudiation of the grace of God was their main mistake; indeed, it was the essence of their apostasy. Their error did not simply consist, since they were not called to be proselytes of Judaism, in attempting to put themselves under law (Gal.4:21). The believers of the Circumcision, though under law, were in the true grace of God (cp 1 Peter 1:10; 5:10,12), which all who were faithful to that calling freely acknowledged. The presence of law need not entail the repudiation of grace. Under the Circumcision evangel, while those who are chosen (i.e., "the elect") must qualify for entrance into the terrestrial kingdom by the performance of lawful deeds (cp Matt.7: 21-23), it is to the grace of God alone that they may ascribe the faithfulness of their service (cp Rom.1:5,6; Isa.26:12).

Let us note well that the Galatians' chief wrong was just one thing: their repudiation of the grace of God. They had been transferred from the evangel of the grace of Christ, to a different "evangel" (Gal.1:6), which, according to truth, was no evangel at all.

Everywhere in Scripture, especially within the Pauline epistles, "grace" is of the nature of a favor, or gracious gift. It is not granted "out of works," or in return for "services rendered" (cp Rom.4:4; 11:6). It is the very antithesis of a reward or compensation. We cannot qualify ourselves for it, nor disqualify ourselves from it. It not only knows nothing of "requirements," but precludes that very notion.

Having presented one's understanding of the nature of the evangel, it will hardly suffice merely to use the word "grace," as a summary term thereof, if one's understanding of the nature of the evangel itself, is not of the nature of grace. To do so would be as illegitimate as to describe a thorn and yet call it a rose.

If righteousness were through law, there would have been "no just cause" for Christ to have died. Then His death would have been both uncalled for and unwarranted. But since His death was not a gratuitous event it follows that righteousness is not through law and that the Galatians and all their imitators are not correct in seeking it on that basis.

May it be our privilege and portion, not to be imitators of the "foolish Galatians" (3:1), but of the apostle Paul, the apostle of the nations (Rom.11:13). J.R.C.

NOT ASHAMED

PAUL was not ashamed of the evangel even though, from the human standpoint it has all the characteristics of weakness and stupidity (cf 1 Cor.1:18-31). It is founded on the painful and shameful crucifixion of the Son of God, and yet it is identified as God's power for salvation to those who are believing it (Rom.1:16). Furthermore it claims that God's righteousness is revealed in it and His love commended when it says that He sends His own Son to die for the sake of irreverent, human beings, while they are still sinners, none of whom will ever be justified in God's sight by works of law (Rom.3:1-23; 5:6-8; 7:13-20; 8:3,32).

Even when the prophet Isaiah speaks of the coming of the One Who is to be exalted he speaks of Him as ruined in appearance, and says (can this be so?) that Yahweh Himself desires to crush Him and causes Him to be wounded (Isa. 52:13,14; 53:10). Elsewhere, the psalmist becomes a type of Jesus Christ, God's Son, being crucified as the lowest of criminals, when he cries out concerning his own troubles: "My El! My El! Why have You forsaken me?" (Psa.22:1; cp Matt.27:46). But perhaps most damaging of all to our human pride is the fact that the evangel is, and must be, a message of unqualified grace, of pure favor, all of God, all of grace. "For in grace, through faith [the faith of Christ Jesus], are you saved, and this is not out of you it is God's [sacrificial] present" (Eph.2:8; cp 3:11,12).

Nevertheless, along with Paul we say, "Now may it not be mine to be boasting, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world" (Gal.6:14). And together with Paul also each of us say, "Not ashamed am I of the evangel." The crucifixion and resurrection of God's Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, is the most important and consequential event in all the universe since the creation of the heavens and the earth.

God's evangel is His word to us that He has done (not simply made possible) that which is impossible to be done by any other way and yet must be done if our existence is to have any value and meaning.

So it was that Paul was eager to bring this evangel:

ROMANS 1:14-17

14 To both Greeks and barbarians, to both wise and foolish, a debtor am I. 15 Thus [t]this eagerness [ac]of mine to bring the evangel[c] to you also, [w]who are in Rome. 16 For not [l]ashamed[c] am I of the evangel, for it is God's power [io]for salvation to everyone [w]who is believing—to the Jew first, and to the Greek as well. 17 For in it God's righteousness is being revealed[c], out of faith [io]for faith, according as it is [c]written[c]: Now the Just One [o]by faith shall be living[c].

GREEKS AND BARBARIANS

It is in view of the fact that sin entered into the world through Adam and thus passes through into all mankind, Greeks and barbarians, wise and foolish, not exempting Jews, so that not one is righteous, not even one, that Paul now puts into writing what he has been heralding. There is no difference between Saul, the Pharisee, and the cultured Greek and the crude barbarian when it comes to the experience of missing the mark of righteousness set by God. Yet there is this difference that Saul thought there should be a difference. This was because in relation to the law as he was trained in it he was becoming blameless (Phil.3:6). And because of this foolishness of pride Saul was multiplying his sinfulness so that he was the foremost of sinners (1 Tim.1:16). Yet he is shown mercy beyond any sinner, and obtains both grace and apostleship: grace to hear and accept and come to know God's evangel concerning His Son, and apostleship to announce it to fellow sinners, to the Jew first indeed, but most specifically and without shame to the Greek, that is, the non-Jew, as well.

It was because Christ died for sinners, that is, for all mankind, that Christ died for Saul. It is not because Saul was a Hebrew of Hebrews that Christ died for him. It was because he was a sinner like everyone else. Furthermore, it was not because he was zealous for the law that Saul was apprehended by the Lord on the road to Damascus and entrusted with God's evangel concerning His Son. It was because he was a sinner, yet not simply a sinner, but a self-righteous one who was going farther and farther away from the standards of righteousness set in the law. Thus he was a fit pattern for all the other sinners who would come to believe.

So it was that now, enriched by grace unexcelled, first as Paul the believer, and then as the apostle to the nations, he was a debtor to Greeks and barbarians, wise and foolish.

He knew firsthand how powerful and good and desperately needed God's evangel is. Consequently, he knew his indebtedness and felt genuine eagerness to share its spiritual grace to those fellow sinners of every sort who had not heard it and even to those who had heard and received it, but did not comprehend its gratuity. Such is its glory that its grace and power cannot be exhausted (cf Rom.5:20).

POWER FOR SALVATION

God's evangel is God's power for salvation to those who are believing it. It is power for salvation because it is a message of death(!), death of the old, and of life out of death. Sin must be condemned and the old humanity must be crucified. The sinner must be done away with, and yet the person God created must be saved. And the only way this could be done is in the One in Whom all were created (Col.1:16). God's evangel, then, must most intimately concern His Son. If He dies, all die (2 Cor.5:14). And then they can be, and indeed will be vivified in Him (1 Cor.15:22).

The cross is the power of God, and the word of the cross is power to us, in spirit, even now as we are believing (cp Rom.8:1-17; 1 Cor.1:18-2:5; Eph.1:13,14).

RIGHTEOUSNESS, FAITH AND LIFE

In Romans 1:4, Paul parenthetically inserts God's evangel concerning His Son with regard to its future results. Christ will reign, as David's Seed, and He will resurrect the dead, indisputably designating Him to be God's Son. But now in Romans 1:17 the apostle points to the bedrock of the evangel, that finished work of Jesus Christ, our Lord, which is the basis and means for the glories to come.

But he does so in the briefest of terms, while still directing our hearts to the great themes of the evangel. Romans 1:17a condenses the evangel as it appears in Romans 3:21-8:39 into ten incisive Greek words, which are then given support in Romans 1:17b by a citation of eight equally incisive Greek words drawn from Habakkuk 2:4.

God's evangel as it is worded in Romans 1:17 joins the theme of faith with that of righteousness, and it joins both faith and righteousness with the theme of life. These are related first to God, then to Christ, and then, in third place, to the believer. The evangel reveals God's righteousness as the righteous Justifier [the One righteously making sinners righteous], by means of the faith of Jesus Christ, Who is the Just One [or, Righteous One], Who lived in faith's obedience unto the death of the cross, and is now living to God. This was certainly the way He lived when He was in the likeness of sin's flesh, sent by God concerning sin (Rom.8:3). And it was this faith and obedience (UNDERHEARing) to the death of the cross that was the channel to His life, roused from among the dead, which He is living now, living to God Who highly exalts Him with the Name that is above every name (cf Rom.3:21,22; 6:10; Phil.2:6-11). Finally, in relation to us, this message is for our faith, for us who are sinners, yet who have been chosen in Christ before the disruption of the world, and who are now believing, apart from sight, so that righteousness may be reckoned to us. Consequently we stand, even now, justified in God's sight and shall be living to Him as Christ is living to Him (Rom.4:5,22-5:11; 6:4-11), and may be blessed even now by the earnest of the spirit which accompanies our believing (2 Cor.1:22; 5:5; Eph.1:13,14).

Romans 1:17 followed by 1:18-3:20 is paralleled in a remarkable way by Romans 3:21,22, followed by 3:23. In both cases Paul brings God's evangel to us, that is, God's evangel concerning His Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. And in both cases he relates what he says to the holy scriptures of old.

In the evangel God's righteousness is being revealed (Rom.1:17). God's righteousness is now made manifest [apart from law, yet attested by the law and the prophets] (Rom.3:21).

God's righteousness is being revealed out of faith (Rom.1:17). God's righteousness is manifest through Jesus Christ's faith (Rom.3:22).

God's righteousness is being revealed out of faith, for faith [according as it is written: Now the Just One, out of faith shall be living] (Rom.1:17). God's righteousness is manifest through Jesus Christ's faith for all (for all will ultimately acclaim in full conviction the Lordship of Jesus Christ), and on all who are believing now, apart from sight.

The message of God's righteousness, being revealed out of [Jesus Christ's] faith, for [our] faith, is most welcome because of God's indignation on all the irreverence and unrighteousness of human beings, not one of whom is righteous (Rom.1:17-3:20). The message of God's righteousness, manifest through Jesus Christ's faith, for all, and on all who are believing, is a most welcome message because all sin and are wanting of the glory of God (Rom.3:21-23).

GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS

God is righteous. And this, which was upheld throughout scripture, is now unveiled, brought out in a way that it cannot be questioned. By the genitive phrase, righteousness of God, Paul is not speaking directly of a righteousness from God, as so many have thought and still insist. No matter how true it is that righteousness comes from God in His work of justification, the evangel itself makes it evident that God is righteous in this work of justification ("righteous-ification"), which leads finally to all being constituted righteous. It is God's own righteousness in doing this that is explicitly in view here. God's evangel is a message concerning God's Son, and it is a message of God's power for salvation, and in it God's own righteousness is revealed and made manifest (Rom.3:21) and placed on display (Rom.3:25,26).

Consequently, before the apostle expounds the evangel as it relates to our justification, he draws our attention to God's attribute of pure and absolute righteousness as it is brought to light in the evangel. What the welcome message of God's power for salvation tells us about God's righteousness is basic to our lives and ongoing appreciation of this evangel, of which Paul was not ashamed. The insight into God's righteousness which the evangel provides is a guard against much wrong thinking about God and His work of salvation. The idea, often vaguely felt, and sometimes clearly expressed, that salvation is a matter of God's grace but not of His justice (which is His righteousness), is mistaken. Such reasoning opens the way for the widespread error of a gospel of grace mixed with human works. God's grace harmonizes fully with His righteousness, and in no way can this be compromised by requirements of human contributions. In fact, because of the nature of His righteousness God's grace could not be exercised apart from a sure and righteous foundation, and anything of ourselves can only corrupt that foundation, which is the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. If this does not, in itself, provide an actual, righteous basis for salvation, then it accomplishes no more than the sacrifices of sheep and goats. Christ is the Antitype of the propitiatory shelter (Rom.3:25) and of the sin offering (2 Cor.5:21) and of the approach present (Eph.2:8; cf 5:2). The types could only be a shadow of the operation of God which really brings an end to sin and offense, enmity and infirmity and death. God's righteousness in dealing fully and finally with sin is now revealed.

OUT OF FAITH

The phrase, "out of faith" (Greek: ek pisteōs) occurs twelve times in Romans (Rom.1:17,17; 3:26,30; 4:16,16; 5:1; 9:30,30; 10:6; 14:23,23), and eight times in Galatians (Gal.2:16; 3:7,8,9,11,12,22; 5:5), and nowhere else in Paul's writings. It parallels the phrase "through faith" (dia pisteōs) which is used in Romans 3:22 in reference to Jesus Christ's faith. Both phrases appear in Galatians 2:16 in reference to His faith.

Our faith could never be the source of a revelation of divine righteousness. The righteousness of God is made known by means of Christ's perfect faith in His Father's will and His unparalleled faithfulness in dying for our sake, for the sake of unrighteous enemies and irreverent sinners. What Christ has done in faith's obedience is the source of and means for this revelation of God's supreme righteousness.

"In Christ Jesus is the whole substance of our salvation, and it is ours who are out of the faith of Jesus (Rom.3:26). His faith, which is the original spring of our faith, is that by which He achieved deliverance from the sin which He was made and the death which was its penalty. Faith bore Him through the terrible ordeal of His last day, and faith was a significant element of His sacrifice, a sacrifice voluntarily made in the obedience of faith. He triumphed in faith where all others failed in unbelief . . . . Thus the manifestation of divine righteousness was made possible by the faith of Christ, and our faith in God is now rooted and grounded in His faith, a faith brought to its highest and fullest expression at the cross . . . . God's righteousness is being revealed out of Christ's faith into our faith."[1] Again, our believing that Christ died for our sins is not the cause of justification. Rather it is Christ faithfully dying for our sins that is the source of justification. In believing that Jesus Christ died for our sins we are believing that in His death, He is the source of justification. And in believing, the righteousness that Christ has gained is reckoned to us (Rom.4:11).

THE FAITH OF JESUS

If it is so that God is the righteous Justifier, it cannot be that He justifies on the basis of our faith. He justifies the human sinner only on one basis, and that is "the faith of Jesus" (Rom.3:26), that is the faith of the One Who came in the likeness of sin's flesh and was made sin for our sakes (Rom.8:3; 2 Cor.5:21). The faith of Jesus is the faith of the One Who is the Saviour, Who emptied Himself of His former glories and humbled Himself to the death of the cross. Human works, including the most commendable human act of faith outside of the faith of Jesus, must be set aside if the subject is the revelation of God's righteousness and the achievement of the work of justification. Hence when Paul exclaims: "Where, then, is boasting? It is debarred! Through what law? Of works? No! But through faith's law" (Rom.3:27), he can be thinking only of the faith of Jesus as a law that was perfectly carried out. "For we are reckoning a human to be justified by [Jesus Christ's] faith apart from works of law [imposed on, and even heeded as best a human being might do]" (Rom.3:28).

JUSTIFIED BY CHRIST'S FAITH

In Romans 5:1, also, the words "out of faith" (translated: "by faith"), have their primary application to Christ's faith. Just as peace toward God comes through our Lord, Jesus Christ, so also justification comes out of His faith. Further on, Paul makes it evident what he means by Jesus Christ's faith when he writes that "while we are still sinners, Christ dies for our sakes" (Rom.5:8). Hence, he expresses the evangel of justification by the blunt words "being now justified in His blood" (Rom.5:9).

And beyond the grace of justification reckoned to the believer, Paul heralds the ultimate application of the righteous results of Christ's death to all mankind. Life's justifying is for all mankind, and so all will be constituted righteous through the righteous effect of the obedience of the One, Jesus Christ (Rom.5:18,19). Yet not only "all mankind," but the "many" sins of all mankind must be brought under "the grace which is of the One Human, Jesus Christ" unto a righteous effect (Rom.5:15,16). What was done on Golgotha's hill was done for all, although its effects have been applied only to believers at present.

All of these passages testify to the truth that the faith and faithfulness of Jesus Christ in dying for sinners is the basis for our justification (our "righteous-ification") and the revelation of God as the righteous Justifier ("Righteous-ifier").

FOR FAITH

The revelation of God's righteousness by means of Jesus Christ's faith is for our faith. This revelation sourced in the faith of Jesus Christ is what we are believing.

The believer's faith must not be excluded from Paul's thought here. But our faith is centered on Christ's faith, and it is the means by which justification is being reckoned to us, not the means by which justification is achieved.

The fact that I have faith is not indicative of any achievement on my part but of incredible grace on God's part. Indeed, what a marvelous gift is faith apart from the evidence of sight!

The risen Jesus said to Thomas, "Happy are those who are not perceiving and believe" (John 20:29).

Paul wrote, "Jews signs are requesting, and Greeks wisdom are seeking, yet we are heralding Christ crucified" (1 Cor.1:22). To us it is graciously granted to be believing on Christ (Phil.1:29).

It is not that Thomas did not believe when he perceived the nail prints, nor that visible evidence is never effective in the support of faith. Just as he responded to what he saw by saying, "My Lord and my God!" so all will acclaim, "Jesus Christ is Lord!" as a matter of faith, to the glory of God, in His appointed time. But at present it is graciously granted to us that we walk by faith and not by perception (2 Cor.5:7). We are walking, not according to flesh, but in accord with spirit (Rom.8:4). God parts to us a measure of faith (Rom.12:2) concerning matters unaccompanied by visible evidence or even the support of signs.

What God says concerning the meaning of God's righteousness and Jesus Christ's faith in dying for our sins is altogether good news. It is exactly that which solves all the puzzles of His character and our existence. This is what is for our faith. Of it we are not ashamed.

D.H.H.

THE JUST ONE

GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS is being revealed by means of Christ's faith. This revelation comes to us out of Christ's great act of faith in His God and Father and obedience to His Word in dying for human beings while they are still sinners. In support of this evangel the apostle Paul cites the words of the prophet Habakkuk here in Romans 1:17. He sees the prophecy of Habakkuk 2:4 as having its principal reference to Christ Jesus in His unwavering faith through the most difficult of situations, climaxing in His death on the cross. More than any other, Christ is the Just One (the Righteous One), and more firmly and enduringly than any other, He believed, throughout His life of humiliation, what God had spoken concerning Him.

Regarding this faith of Christ Jesus, our Lord, God spoke long ago through a chosen prophet, in an era of great distress.

THE HABAKKUK CITATION

The prophet Habakkuk lived in dark days when lawlessness and misery, devastation and violence, contention and quarreling were corrupting the entire society of Judea, centered in Jerusalem (Hab.1:2,3). The law which had been given to Israel so that they would fear the One Elohim and might not sin (Exodus 20:20) was torpid, and judgment was tortuous (Hab.1:4).

In such a time Habakkuk implored to Yahweh, crying, "How long [shall this go on], and You are not saving?"

And Yahweh replied with a message to the people:

5 See, [7]treacherous[l] ones[~cs], and look,
And be amazed, be stunned,
For [7]I [l]effect[~c] a deed in your days
You would not [l]believe though it were being related.

What would not be believed even though it was being related as Yahweh's word through the prophet? It was, to begin with, that Yahweh was raising the Chaldeans, "that bitter and hasty nation," who would come from afar, "coming for violence" (Hab.1:6,9). That nation would be centered in one individual who "is making sport of every fortress" and "whose vigor is his eloah" (Hab.1:10,11).

Yet this operation of Yahweh was not to be a work of salvation. It would be violence against violence, treacherous ones against treacherous ones, misery upon misery. It was in view of this multiplication of troubles that the prophet spoke again to Yahweh (with considerable boldness), saying (Hab.1:12,13), 12 Are You not from aforetime, O Yahweh?

My Eloah, my Holy One, [s]You[ph] shall not die.
O Yahweh, You have placed him for judgment,
And, O Rock, You have founded him for correction[–].
13 You are of cleaner eyes [f]than to see[–] evil,
And to look[–] [>]at misery You are not [l]able.
Why are You looking at the treacherous[l],
Are [l]silent [i]when the wicked person is swallowing[–] up one more righteous [f]than he?

Habakkuk agreed that the judgment and correction were necessary, but what of salvation from Yahweh, Who is of cleaner eyes than to look at such things and is not able to look at misery indefinitely? Will He not bring this cycle of human violence followed by divine indignation to an end?

Hence Habakkuk stood on guard and ready for further word from Yahweh, "to see what He shall speak to me" (Hab.2:1).

2 [+]Then Yahweh is answering me and saying,
Write the vision, and make it plain on [·]tablets,
That he may run who is reading [i] it.
3 For the vision is [fr]yet for an appointed time;
And it shall [7]bud[~] [>]at the end,
and it shall not prove a lie.

A vision is set before Habakkuk, and he is to record it plainly on tablets "that he may run who is reading it." This may remind us of Isaiah 40:31 concerning those who are expectant in Yahweh, who shall run and not be wearied, and walk and not faint. So also we read in Isaiah 52:7, "How comely on the mountains are the feet of the tidings bearer, who is announcing peace, bearing tidings of good, announcing salvation."

Yet the vision does not seem to be made clear in the Masoretic (Hebrew) text which continues to speak about it, but offers no message of peace and good and salvation for one who is expectant in Yahweh, no evangel for the tidings bearer to bring with running feet. The third and fourth lines of Habakkuk 2:3 seem to repeat the thought of the first two lines. The vision is for an appointed time when it will bud forth and not prove a lie. But what is the vision? What is coming at its appointed time? What is it that if it be dallying, the faithful Israelite is to tarry for it? What is it that shall come, yea come, and shall not be late?

According to the Greek translation called the Septuagint the third and fourth lines of verse 3 do not speak of "it" (that is, the vision), but of "Him" (that is, the Coming One"). The vision is of the Coming One Who shall come at the appointed time and not be late. That is an evangel of peace and good and salvation, worthy of the running feet of the tidings bearer who is expectant in Yahweh.

If this is so, then Habakkuk 2:4 also speaks of the Coming One, Who is now called the Just One (or, Righteous One).

With this in mind, we present now a tentative revision and expansion of Habakkuk 2:4 as indicated by the Septuagint:

3 For the vision is [fr]yet for an appointed time;
And it shall [7]bud~ [›]at the end,
and it shall not prove a lie.
If [7]He~ be dallying, tarry for [7]Him~,
For [7]the Coming One shall come~,
[7]and[cs] [7]He~ shall not be late.
4 [bd]If He is made presumptuous,
His soul is not upright in Him;
[7]If He is shrinking,
My soul is not delighting in Him.[0]
[+]Yet the Just One [i]by His faith, He shall live.

With this reading we can see that Yahweh gives Habakkuk a vision of the Coming One, Who is the Just One Who will be living by faith. Yet the faith is no easy pathway, for the ordinary person would shrink from it and follow what would presumably be more beneficial. Yet the soul of the Coming One will be upright, and despite the immediate suffering will not be presumptuous and follow His own will. He will live "out of His faith" in accord with the word of God. In every way God will delight in Him.

In full accord with this, and surely with it in mind, Stephen, in reviewing the history of Israel's unfaithfulness, reaches a climax in shouting, "Stiff-necked and uncircumcised in your hearts and ears, you are ever clashing with the holy spirit! As your fathers, you also! Which of the prophets do not your fathers persecute? And they kill those who announce before concerning the coming of the Just One, of Whom now you became the traitors and murderers—who got the law for a mandate of messengers and do not maintain it!" (Acts 7:51-53).

There should be little doubt that, whatever words of the prophets Stephen had in mind, he most certainly had Habakkuk 2:3,4 in view when he spoke of "the coming Just One." From Stephen's view the Just One had already come and lived a life of faith, culminating in being killed by His own people. And we may add that this faith of the One Who came opened the way to His living again in resurrection.

Later, the writer of the book of Hebrews cites lines from the Septuagint version of Habakkuk 2:3 and 2:4 in order to encourage the Hebrew believers in endurance and faith in their own days when what is expected is not what is being observed:

37 For still how very little, He ·Who is coming° will be arriving and not delaying. 38 Now My ·Just One [o]by faith shall be living°, and If He should ever be shrinking°, My ·soul is not delighting in Him.

In this preliminary revision of the CV of Hebrews 10:37,38, we see that the reference is to God's Son, as His Just One. Again, the Just One has already come and exercised faith to perfection. But the writer cites the words of the prophet as they were written and understood by Stephen, in order to draw attention to the strength and glory of Christ's faith. The Just One did not shrink, and God did indeed delight in Him (cf Matt.3:17; Matt.12:18 [cp Isa.42:1]; and Matt. 17:5). And thus He becomes the First and Highest Example of faith for the Hebrew believers. No one could come up to His level, but all will be encouraged in faith by keeping His faith in view.

Consequently, after presenting the vast cloud of witnesses in living lives of faith, the writer returns to Christ as the Inaugurator and Perfecter of faith in chapter 12.

This focus on the faith of the Messiah was provided in the vision given to Habakkuk. He was not about to perceive the Coming One as He shall come in indignation and anger, going forth for the salvation of His people (cf Hab.3:12,13) after which the earth will be filled with the knowledge of Yahweh's glory as the waters are covering the sea (Hab.2:14). Instead the Coming One, Who would not be late, would come first as the Just One, Who shall live by faith. Before He comes in the day of God's indignation, with fierce and decisive action against enemies within and without, seen by all, He must come as One Who lives by faith. That is, He Himself would not fulfill the place of Conqueror and King in Habakkuk's day, but He would come at the appointed time, and even then would live under conditions where the glory is not yet realized. And when that time arrives, instead of entering immediately into the promised joy set before Him, it would be His place to live by faith in accord with the words spoken through Isaiah the prophet (Isa.53:7):

7 Hard pressed is He, and He is humbled[l],
[+]Yet He is not opening His mouth;
Like a flockling to slaughter is He [l]fetched,
And as a ewe before her shearers[l] is mute,
[+] He is not opening His mouth.

In this we see the Inaugurator and Perfecter of faith, Jesus, the Just One of Habakkuk 2:4, Whom Yahweh will desire to crush, and in Whose hand Yahweh's desire shall prosper (Isa.53:10). Yet as written in Isaiah 53:11, out of all this toil, God's righteous Servant shall justify many (Isa.53:11):

It is this coming, His coming that rests on faith, that must occur before the coming Habakkuk longed for. It is because of His coming and living in faith that the prophet's prayer in chapter 3 will be fulfilled.

3 Eloah is coming from Teman,
And the Holy One from Mount Paran.
His splendor covers the heavens,
And His praise, it fills the earth.

PAUL'S USE OF HABAKKUK 2:4

Ananias of Damascus told Saul, "The God of our fathers fixes upon you beforehand to know His will, and to be acquainted with the Just One" (Acts 22:14). Paul, in writing to the Romans, has not forgotten Who that Just One is.

As with Stephen in Acts 7:52 and the writer of Hebrews 10:37,38, so also for Paul in Romans 1:17 and Galatians 3:11, Habakkuk 2:4 speaks as a prophecy of Christ, living in faith's obedience to the death of the cross. It surely is one of the passages expounded by the risen Lord on the road to Emmaus (Luke 24:27). It certainly is one of God's promises of His evangel made before through His prophets in the holy scriptures (Rom.1:2).

We do not discard the application of the passage to God's people in times of distress and, as it may be, seasons of violence and lawlessness and contention, and in fact we see how this fits our situation even more emphatically than those of Israel, for our walk is fully by faith and not be perception. Indeed we are believers who are being saved with much daily joy and peace as we retain, in faith, the evangel of Christ's faith through our lives (cf 1 Cor.15:1-3).

But what has been missed is that here in Romans 1:17 Paul solidly bases our faith on the message of Christ's faith. Our faith is in His faith, which is "the deliverance in His blood" (Romans 3:24), in His giving of Himself for our sins, that He might extricate us out of the present wicked eon (Gal.1:3).

Therefore, Paul writes regarding his present pathway of living in faith: ". . . that I should be gaining Christ, and may be found in Him, not having my righteousness, which is [out of] law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is [out] of God for [into] faith" (Phil.3:8,9).

Through our Lord Jesus Christ

THE FAITH OF JESUS CHRIST

"HAVING perceived that a man is not being justified by works of law, except alone through the faith of Christ Jesus, we also believe in Christ Jesus that we may be justified by the faith of Christ" (Gal.2:16). The faith of Jesus Christ, not our own faith, is the basis of our justification. The righteousness of God is manifested for all through Jesus Christ's faith (Rom.3:21,22). This is a basic truth and foundational element of the evangel. It will pay us well to meditate on this wonderful faith of our Lord.

Faith in God is a matter of believing and depending upon His word and having confidence in His character, regardless of circumstances. The faith of Jesus Christ in His God and Father illustrates both of these aspects of faith.

BELIEVING GOD'S WORD

"My Son are You; I, today, have begotten You. Ask of Me, and I shall give the nations as Your allotment, and as Your holding, the limits of the earth" (Psa.2:7b,8).

Here is one of a number of promises made by God the Father to His only-begotten Son. In the weakened condition brought about by forty days and nights of fasting, Christ was offered the opportunity to hurry the fulfillment of God's promise if He would fall down and worship the Adversary (Matt.4:8-10). Similarly, Abraham was offered the opportunity to hurry the fulfillment of God's promise to him when Sarah suggested that he father a child by Hagar. So often we too, in our impatience and weakness of faith, want to "help God" fulfill His promises. But He needs no help—He desires our faith. The Lord's response to the Adversary reflects both His faith and His reverence for His Father.

Christ still awaits His day of authority, but, like David, waiting on the Lord to remove Saul, He rests in faith, awaiting the Father's time. Facing death, the apparent end of all things for those in the flesh, the Lord Jesus said to Pilate, "Yet now is My kingdom not hence" (John 18:36). He believed He would have that promised kingdom, but that it was yet future, and thus He showed His belief that His Father would raise Him from the dead and eventually seat Him on His throne. This is the same faith that rouses us together with Him (Col.2:12).

HAVING CONFIDENCE IN GOD

Before Paul mentions the faith of Jesus Christ in Romans 3, he paints a vivid and detailed picture of human depravity as he progresses through the first three chapters. He does this because we cannot grasp the faith of Christ until we begin to realize the offensiveness of humanity's sin to God. As children, we probably behaved better for other adults than we did for our own parents. At home we knew where all the invisible boundaries were that could not be crossed. If we behaved poorly at a friend's house, and were confronted by his parents, we would study every expression of our friend in an effort to determine how serious the offense was. Our initial rearing is in the world—not in God's house, and we are incapable of realizing the degree of repulsion that God experiences from our sin. Only by examining Christ and the cross can we come to any realization of the offensiveness of sin to God.

But the Lord Jesus was "in the bosom of the Father," and knew the Father so intimately that He could "unfold" or reveal Him to the world's gaze (John 1:18). Christ knew the Father's love for humanity, but He also knew the unfathomable depth of offense that the Father suffered because of mankind's sinfulness. Only Christ could realize how grievous a thing it was to bear the sin of the world. Only Christ could know how heinous He would be to the Father He loved when He bore our sin. Gethsemane speaks volumes of the close filial relationship between the Son and the Father and of the agony inflicted in the severing of that relationship.

Christ had the utmost confidence in the character of His God and Father. He could view the indignation of God over man's depravity and offensiveness and still not doubt His Father's reconciling love. How different this is from our faith! Some people believe they have already sinned so grievously that God could never dispose of their offense. Some think that God has tied His love before them on a string, so that He can retrieve it if they ever falter in obedience. Many observe God's indignation toward the world and conclude that if God exists at all, He is an angry God, devoid of love. Still others focus on God's reconciling love to the neglect of the inestimable cost of the cross to Him. A balanced faith will view God's love against the background of the offense of the cross.

FAITH AND THE FLESH

The cross of Christ sets before us the death of the flesh. All creation was in Christ and came into being through Him (Col.1:15-17), and in His death all may be viewed as having died: ". . . if One died for the sake of all, consequently all died" (2 Cor.5:14). Thus the cross brings the end of all flesh before us. And the cross also marks the death of the flesh in the believer's life.

It is interesting that when the Lord Jesus came in flesh to His people under the law, He did not search for anyone who had fulfilled the law. Of course such a search would have been fruitless, but the point is that instead, He searched for those who had faith. Law is dependent upon the flesh, and faith and the flesh are continually in opposition to each other. Faith forsakes all confidence in the flesh, even in the best things of the flesh, and clings to God Who is Spirit (Phil.3). Faith is spiritual. The presence of faith verifies that God has bestowed a spiritual ability. Faith is an act of maturity of which the flesh is incapable. In fact, all too often, faith only flourishes as our flesh becomes weaker and weaker with the advance of years. Yet Paul says of the believers who have received a realization of the cross, "those of Christ Jesus crucify the flesh together with its passions and lusts" (Gal.5:24). And so the cross may be seen as the end of the flesh and also as the beginning of faith.

When Christ our Lord faced the cross, He faced it empty of all His rightful authority and ability. He faced the end of Himself, unless God would bring Him back. Faith in His God and Father was all and only what He had. Such is what God desires our condition to be. Oh that the flesh were dead and faith flourishing, that we rested immovable upon the word of God and upon His divine, immutable character!

OUT OF FAITH FOR FAITH

What is meant by the phrase "out of faith for faith?" Apparently little is realized, and less is preached, concerning Jesus Christ's faith! A study of most English translations reveals the fact that very few, if any, apprehended the far-reaching significance of the truth that our Lord Jesus Christ was "the Inaugurator and Perfecter of faith" (Heb. 12:2), and due to this oversight, the very Scriptures which shed forth blessed rays of light for the comfort of the saints have been corrupted by the opinions of men, and the saints have suffered the loss.

Christ is the Inaugurator and Perfecter of faith, and it is "out of His faith" for "our faith" that the righteousness of God with eonian life is reckoned to us.

THOSE WHO BELIEVE

"FAITHFUL is the saying and worthy of all welcome . . . that we rely on the living God, Who is the Saviour of all mankind, especially of those who believe." These words of Paul to Timothy are phrased in a most telling manner. The language is so distinctive and positive, and so all embracive, too.

It comprises a statement worthy, indeed, of all welcome, a counsel of great import. We are enjoined to rely on the living God, Who is the Saviour of all mankind. What a magnificent salvation is this! What majesty of purpose, both in design and effect! See how the greater includes the less, yet the honor and blessing, too, of the seeming few who now believe. Is not the emphasis beautifully put—"especially of those who believe!"

The statement that God is the Saviour of all mankind, so supports and sustains the rare value and virtue of the fact which follows. For in a wonderful fashion, and in His own wise way, God is indeed the Saviour of those who believe. And to what a wondrous extent! To begin with, He effects a marvelous deliverance, a great rescue "out of the jurisdiction of darkness," and the many things which are against us, of the world, and of self. Saved in countless ways, could we but know them all! But how we forget, and maybe lack the discernment to perceive all the occasions of our deliverance!

It will be of rich profit to note the fine sequence of Paul's words in this unfolding of truth. So much is gathered up in clear and concise language, as to make the apostle's statement a vital expression of faith. We rely on the living God.

On the Supreme Being, of light, wisdom and love—the God of grace, and Father of glory. Before such an One, self reliance may well be "gone with the wind." Look to Him, then, in daily thankfulness, mindful of small benefits, and it will be found that there are many situations in life where such reliance brings results of great good. Such a course makes for repose, a quietude within which is a source of strength and a blessing to others.

The living God, Who is the Saviour of all mankind. What a magnificent statement of grace and truth! How God-like and divine! Well may the Psalmist write, "Our God is the God of salvation." Man, now so marred, will be made anew, for unto God shall all flesh come, and not for judgment alone. That is but a part and process of God's high purpose. And, whatever there may be of correction and adjustment, in future experience, it will all be for an exalted end—even the acclaiming of Christ as Lord, for the glory of God the Father.

Less than this would be insufficient as a perfect conclusion to God's purpose. Suffering is a chastening agent of God, whether for the believer in the life that now is, or for the unbeliever in a life to come. But it is never purposeless. Even the Son "learned obedience from that which He suffered." And it all had to do with the efficacy of His sacrifice, His ransom for all. Indeed, such a sacrifice is measureless, for God is not only the Saviour of all humans, but the Reconciler of all beings in every domain of living intelligences.

The taint of sin of every kind, as it affects us humans, and other beings in the realms of space, will be touched and transmuted by the all powerful Christ of God. And the grace of God, in full display, will know no limiting bounds beyond which it cannot flow. Thus, in the whole stretch of God's creation, will all experience the rare virtue of Christ's transforming power. So will His reign and rule bring every realm to complete acknowledgment of God. Then, in every sense of the great phrase, and in truest understanding, God will be All in all.

Surely, then, we cannot but see the positiveness of the clear statement that God is the Saviour of all mankind. Yet note how finely the expression is qualified—"especially of those who believe." So then, right here and now there is an intense application of this great and precious truth. Those who believe. Believe God, daily, going by His Word, and notably the unfoldings of Paul, His slave. For these assuredly hold teaching unique for all who would be vessels for honor in the service of God. To realize day by day the privilege and value of being in the rare company of His choice, is in itself a wonderful blessing. For we have so many causes for thankfulness, and above all, a right of way, an access by faith into a marvelous grace, and expectancy of the glory of God. A full salvation indeed!

How much of exquisite meaning there lies in the distinctive words so emphasized by Paul. Especially of those who believe. They supply a needful note, wisely qualifying the statement as a whole.

"Faithful is the saying and worthy of all welcome, that we rely on the living God, Who is the Saviour of all mankind, especially of those who believe" (1 Tim.4:9-11). How excellent the pathway of proven grace! It is of God that we are in this way, and of God, too, that at long last, all mankind will know, indeed, that He is their Saviour.

But how blessed to be of those who believe now, while here below. What an ever mounting volume of thanks and praise we are able to ascribe to His wise and discerning grace! God has made peace in the Son of His love, and through the blood of His cross, effected a limitless salvation, even the reconciliation of all to the Father of glory. What grace to contemplate, and glory to enjoy!

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

GOD SPEAKS to us in His Word. But what does He say?

Our concern is centered on this question, and this has directed our efforts in two principal ways: the translation of the Sacred Scriptures from their original tongues into our own language, and the publishing of studies and meditations on these texts, especially those of Paul, who is our apostle.

The concordant method of translation which calls for consistency in vocabulary and grammar has proved very helpful, but no translation is perfect. Review is always called for, and revision may be needed from time to time. This is what we are facing now with regard to the "New Testament," and we solicit your prayers.

Regarding one's understanding of these scriptures in translation, it is always beneficial to ask ourselves the four questions concerning a particular text, suggested by Brother Coram on page 136 of this issue: What does it say? Whom does it concern? When does it apply? and, In what sense is it true? As a corollary to the first question I would add: How does it relate to its context? This is what I tried to keep in mind in preparing my article on Romans 8:1-4, published here on pages 133-144.

Such considerations are highly important if we are to come to an appreciation of Scripture apart from intrusive, preconceived ideas of what we think it ought to say. As Brother Mealand remarks concerning the religious world, "Man is too much in the picture" (cf p.128). Even a passage so thoroughly dominated by the glories of Christ as Colossians 1:15-20, is widely qualified and distorted by notions about an independent power of the human will and limitations to God's achievement in the giving of His Son. On this matter, see especially the selections from Brother Knoch's studies on Colossians and Genesis, accompanying Brother Nungesser's article on Christ as "The Firstborn" (pages 99-114).

Both in the work of translating the Scriptures and in our understanding of what God is saying to us in them, we need to keep our attention on Christ, and how it is that what He is and does is all to the glory of God, the Father.

Accordingly, the CV of Romans 3:21,22 has, from its first edition forward, made it clear that Jesus Christ's faith, not our faith, is the means by which God's righteousness is made manifest. This, and the reference to "the faith of Jesus" in verse 26 supports the understanding that all the references to faith in this section of Romans have Christ's faith in view.

This emphasis on Christ and what God achieves in and through Him is echoed in many places throughout this magazine, as illustrated by the following quotations:

"Creation and reconciliation are the scenes of the supremacy of God's Son" (p.99).

"The blood of Christ was shed due to His love and connectedness to every creature" (p.110).

"[Christ's] sacrifice constitutes a ransom that corresponds' to the needs of all sinners: a Saviour Who would die for the sake of each and every individual and thus actually save each one for whom He died" (p.125).

"None in themselves can find repose of heart and mind. It can but be in God's Beloved . . ." (p.127).

"That nothing at all is condemnation to us is settled by the grace of God in the sending of His Son, and the faith of Jesus Christ in dying for our sakes" (p.138).

Colossians 1:15-20

THE SUPREMACY OF CHRIST

CREATION and reconciliation are the scenes of the supremacy of God's Son. The secret of Christ comprises the creation of all in Him at the commencement, and the reconciliation of all through Him at the consummation.

IMAGE OF THE INVISIBLE GOD

God wishes to be known and loved. This is the motive behind creation and reconciliation. Being invisible and unapproachable, He has made an Image of Himself, and a Complement through Whom He can come into contact with His creation. These mediatorial glories belong to His Beloved Son, and make Him preeminent in all things, for they reach from the very beginning to the consummation, and make Him first in both creation and reconciliation.

To be known, God must be seen. He must be brought within the range of creature sensation. As this is impossible with essential Deity, Who is Spirit, it can only be accomplished by means of a Mediator, an Image which portrays in visible form the invisible essence of the Supreme. This was God's "Creative Original," the beginning, or origin, of all creation, for all else was included in Him. This makes Him the "firstborn" of all creation, not only first in time, but first in dignity and honor, and of itself entitles Him, not only to be the Sovereign of the saints in this administration, but to head up all, both in the heavens and on the earth, as He will, in the complement of the eras, before the close of the eons.

Earthly rulers base their right to rule either on hereditary claims, or on their own accomplishments. Our Sovereign has a double right to reign. His is the oldest title in the universe, long antedating Adam, and He has entered the lists against the powers of evil and won the fight on Golgotha. Both diadem and wreath are His. His ancient rights entitle Him to universal sovereignty, and He will yet subject all beneath His feet. And, when all was lost, He brought it back to God, and thus has earned its heartfelt homage. In this universal reign of the Son of God we have the blessed privilege of being among the first to own His sway, and will be among the highest in His world-embracing sovereignty.

CREATION IN THE SON OF HIS LOVE

The wonders of these words are well worthy of our admiring contemplation. Creation and love! How seldom are they brought together! We often hear of God's love in connection with redemption, but creation is usually associated with His power or His wisdom, but seldom with His affection. Few passages of Scripture delve as deeply as this into the origin of things, yet it is in thorough harmony with those basic truths that all is out of God (Rom. 11:36) and God is love (1 John 4:8). The philosopher seeks in vain for the why of all things. Why is there a creation at all? Here is the answer. God's love demands response. Creation is not an end in itself. Although it displays God's wisdom and power, its underlying purpose goes far deeper, for it was created in love.

Had this simple yet profound truth ever penetrated into the hearts of the teachers of God's people, how revolutionary would have been its effect! True, with their lips they have preached the glad message "God so loved the world," yet they have been even more zealous to confine His love to those who believe, since they could hardly reconcile eternal torment or annihilation with the operations of love. May He broaden our hearts and widen our understanding! All that God does is done in love. Creation as well as redemption and reconciliation have their roots in the divine affection. And for this very reason it is that all are lost and all will be saved, some indeed by faith, during the eons, yet others by sight, through judgment, all through the deliverance wrought by Him in Whom they were originally created.

We may well suppose that creatures of another sphere, who know little of humanity, would not find it easy to understand that all mankind was once in Adam. To us it is so commonplace that we fail to realize the marvel of it. Science has made futile endeavors to prove that man, as well as other creatures, gradually evolves into forms quite different from their progenitors, but without any practical success. They have not succeeded in robbing us of the wonder that in each single seed are almost infinite potentialities. These examples should aid us to understand, or at least to believe where we cannot apprehend, that simple yet sublime statement that all was created in the Son of God's love.

BOTH HEAVENS AND EARTH

The secret of Christ is not confined to earth, and the scope of Colossians is by no means limited to the ecclesia which is His body. We alone were chosen in Christ before the disruption, yet even before that, all was created in the Son, not only that on earth, but in the heavens as well. The august grandeur of this thought will overwhelm all those who have given some attention to the celestial spheres, or even gazed upon the starry host. Here are marvels, and magnitudes, and measures which make the mind faint with solemn awe. Creation on earth, with all its many marvels, sinks into insignificance, when compared with the celestial realms. Had it not been hallowed by His presence and His sacrifice, we would think it mean beside the mighty majesty of the heavenly hosts. Yet all the creatures in the heavens were created in Him.

ALL THROUGH AND FOR

Since all ruling powers were once in Him, it is not at all strange that all rule should return to Him in the last eon. This is in line with the further truth that all is through Him and for Him. Creation was not an independent act, without any relation to subsequent developments. On the contrary, it was logically the result of God's purpose, which could not be fulfilled until the far future. Creation is, indeed, the prelude to reconciliation. The Son, in Whom it was effected, had far more in view, and it was only a preparation for the tragedy of the eons, and these, in turn, only the means for effecting the glorious consummation—God All in every one of His creatures.

So, not only was all in Him, but, at the same time it was also through Him and for Him. Without it He could not have accomplished His further work. Due to this relation of all parts of creation to Him it is held together by Him. Whatever differences and distances there may be between the various parts, such as between earth and the heavens, in Him they are welded into one, and, as we shall see, will be united under His headship in the last eon.

Such is the preeminence of the Image of God as the Firstborn of creation. From the beginning all rule is His and all owe Him subjection. The authority of darkness is a usurper, and deserves no subjection at our hands. In being transported into the kingdom of the Son of His love we return to the only rightful Suzerain. His realm will one day spread to every corner of the universe and bring every creature to His feet. All shall be subject to Him. We have the privilege of being among the first to yield to His beneficent sway.

THE FIRSTBORN

CHRIST IS the Firstborn of every creature and all are created in Him so that all are related to Him (cf Col.1:15,16). If Christendom truly understood this passage, their idea that God is going to lose the vast majority of humanity could not find a place in their theology. Many sermons have been given where the minister concentrated on "all has its cohesion in Him" as if that is the most important part of Colossians 1:15-20. It is important, but Christ being Firstborn of every creature and the ramifications thereof are critical to the whole passage and its conclusion about the reconciliation of all to Him.

God has revealed to the apostle Paul, Christ's connectedness to the creation and to every being within the creation:

". . . out of [God] all is" (1 Cor.8:6), and so God is revealed as the original source of all. And then it is stated: "Jesus Christ, through Whom all is," thus showing us Christ as the channel through Whom all came into being. So we go back, way back before the eons. Seeing through the mists of time we get a glimpse of God's plan as it is revealed to us in its most primitive stage, as it is beginning to unfold. Before all the vast starry hosts of the heavens came into being through His Son, God had a plan which is called "the purpose of the eons, which He makes in Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Eph.3:11). That plan, conceived in God's heart, is being carried out through His Son.

The august wisdom involved in the planning stages must have been immense. How did God conceive all the parts of the atom along with gravity and energy and everything in the universe being held together by forces we are just beginning to get an inkling of an understanding? How did God know to create humanity with its ability to replicate via sperm and egg? How did God know stars and planets would be needed in His grand design where no star or planet ever existed before? The vastness of God's creation with all the varied creatures just on our earth is so immense as to boggle the mind. Yet what we see today may be miniscule compared with the creation of the first eon or even the eon prior to the flood of Noah's day. Today we may be seeing only a remnant of the creation which survived the world-wide flood.

Before the creation came into being through God's Son, the existence of humanity was planned along with its disobedience, its ransom from bondage to sin and death and the exaltation of Christ as well as God being All in all. None of these are the outworkings of a causeless, humanistic evolution. Likewise, it was planned that the entire creation would be subjected to vanity with the goal of being freed from its slavery of corruption into the glorious freedom of the children of God (cf Rom.8:20,21).

Many are the voices arising from humanity accusing God of all manner of evils throughout the ages. God deems it wise to educate humanity in the knowledge of good and evil. The education began with the first Edenic pair and still continues. At the consummation of the eons God is justified in all He does. And as Paul prophetically announces to his readers in Philippians 2:11, these things are for the glory of God, the Father. He will be glorified by all. This glorification reveals that at that future point in time, all have been brought into a realization of the truth. All in the celestials, terrestrial and subterranean finally perceive and enter into the actual goal God had for the eons.

But what is the means by which this goal will be realized? Let us now look at this passage concerning the Son of God's love which shines so brightly among all the constellations of passages in God's Word:

15 Who is the Image of the invisible ˙God, Firstborn of every creature, 16 for in Him is ˙all created, ˙that in the heavens and ˙that on the earth, the visible and the invisible, whether thrones, or lordships, or sovereignties, or authorities, ˙all is ˚created˚ through Him and io˙for Him, 17 and He´ is before all, and ˙all has its cohesion in Him.

18 And He´ is the Head of the body, the ecclesia, Who is ˙Sovereign, Firstborn o˙from among the dead, that in all He´ may become˚ l˙first, 19 t˙for in Him the entire complement delights to dwell, 20 and through Him to reconcile ˙all to Him (¯making peace through the blood of His ˙cross), through Him, whether ˙those on the earth or ˙those in the heavens. (Col.1:15-20)

This passage is glistening brilliantly with the glory of God's goal for the universe. Christ is the Image of the invisible God. He reveals to us God's wisdom, knowledge, power and love both in creation and by His act of ransoming and reconciliation.

A WONDERFUL CONNECTEDNESS

Christ is revealed as "the Firstborn of every creature, for [or, the reason why this is so, is that] in Him is all created." So there is a wonderful connectedness Christ has with every creature within the creation which He brought into existence. As the Firstborn, He has the immense responsibility of taking care of every creature with whom He is connected. He must be every creature's Kinsman Redeemer. We see this theme in the "Old Testament" concerning the firstborn of each family in Israel. The firstborn received the majority of everything the father had in order that, upon the decease of the father, the firstborn would take over the reins of the family.

Abraham had become very old and so Isaac was given everything Abraham had according to Genesis 24:36 and 25:5. This indicated Isaac was the true firstborn. "Abram was very heavy in cattle, in silver, and in gold" (Gen.13:2), and so all these went to Isaac in order to take care of the family. In the case of Jacob and Esau, Esau sold his birthright ("firstbornship") and relinquished the right to receive the majority of blessings from his father. It is interesting to note that the Hebrew word for "firstborn" and "birthright" belong to the same family, as seen by their spelling: bkur is used for "firstborn" and bkure for "birthright." "Birthright" could be thought of as "firstbornship." In Genesis 27, Jacob became the kinsman redeemer (Gen.27:28,29). Right afterward, in chapter 28, Yahweh revealed Himself to Jacob (Gen.28:13-15). Likewise, following Joseph's reception of the distinctive tunic, Yahweh revealed to Joseph the future when he would reign over his family rather than Reuben his brother, who was the firstborn from Leah. Reuben had his father's concubine Bilhah. Jacob was so upset concerning this that he made a distinctive tunic, not for Reuben but for Joseph, his firstborn from his beloved wife Rachel. Jacob was telling his family that Joseph was now the leader among his brothers even though Reuben was his firstborn (Gen.46:8; 49:3). Joseph would watch out for the kin related to him. This is exactly what he did when they came to him in Egypt. That is why such a one is called the kinsman redeemer. If the kin got into trouble, it was his responsibility to redeem them. This is a wonderful picture of the Grand Kinsman Redeemer, the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in Whom we have deliverance (Rom.3:24).

It is of great interest that God sent all the plagues upon Egypt to free His people. It was only when God ransomed His people with the death of Egypt's firstborn that they were freed from slavery. What a fitting picture of the death of God's Firstborn, the Firstborn of every creature, to ransom and free the entire creation from the slavery of corruption. Our salvation from sin and death was not without great sacrifice. Christ gave Himself a correspondent ransom for all. But why did He give Himself a ransom for all? Because He is the Firstborn of all and that is what His responsibility is: to ransom all connected to Him! Thus we read:

4 [God] [l]wills that all [=]mankind be saved and come into a realization of the truth. 5 For there is one God, and one Mediator of God and [=]mankind, a [h]Man, Christ Jesus, 6 Who is [-]giving Himself a correspondent Ransom for[s] all . . . . (1 Tim.2:4-6)

BOAZ, A TYPE OF CHRIST

Now, some may wish to claim that it was possible for Christ the Antitype, to fail as to His own responsibility here even as the original kinsman redeemer in type failed in the case of Ruth. So shameful it was for that kinsman redeemer not to redeem Ruth that the Scriptures refuse to even name him, calling him a "so and so" and "[of the] House of the Pulled-off Sandal." As proof that he had refused to carry out the responsibilities, if Ruth had been present, it would have been her right to receive so and so's sandal because this was so, and she was obliged to spit in his face. His duty was also to raise up offspring in the name of the deceased husband.

Boaz was next in line as a near kin to her, and it was he who redeemed her. It was through the kinsman redeemer, Boaz, that the Kinsman Redeemer of the universe came! From the book of Ruth we read concerning this:

4 [+] Boaz had gone up to the gate and [l]sat down there, [+ bd]when the kinsman redeemer[l] was passing by of whom Boaz had spoken. [+ 7]Boaz[0] [l]said [7]to him[0], Do turn in, do

ONLY CHRIST COULD RANSOM ALL

Had Christ reneged on His responsibility He would have just been a so and so. He would carry the disparaging title: House of the Pulled-off Sandal. Had He failed, who could have done what He was supposed to have done? No one! There just wasn't anyone in the universe. There wasn't another connected to every creature through the creative act of Christ! This is what the Colossian passage is showing us! It is so grand, so marvelous, and so spectacular. It is a marvel that so few have seen it. That so few have seen it is a testimony to the blindness of humanity.

The Father has given Christ all and has seated Him at His right hand. Rather than blessing the universe with physical goods, they are blessed with even greater, that is, spiritual. Immortality, incorruption, righteousness, reconciliation and love along with the fruit of the spirit, Christ is heavily weighted with these incredible treasures and He dispenses them to all in the universe with unstinted grace! It is through the blood of Christ's cross that every creature in the universe will be reconciled to God. The blood of Christ was shed due to His love and connectedness to every creature. Being the Firstborn of all creation He has responsibilities no one else had or could have. Being the Firstborn of all creation He is the Kinsman Redeemer of every creature of the entire creation since the entire creation came through Him! How spectacular—how wonderful for the creation that God had such a faithful Son! God gave His Son the faith and ability to go ahead with the incredible task of going to the cross, enduring the shame and facing death. He did it all in faithfulness to God and to His high office as the Firstborn of all creation. He did it due to the vast love with which He loves us. How grand is our Redeemer: Rather than ending up being just a so and so, He is given a Name above all names!

If the current theology of Christendom is correct, if Christ has failed to ransom and redeem the vast majority which Christendom has assigned to eternal loss, then Christ's name must be for ever relegated to that of a "so and so" and He must give every lost soul His sandal. Such is the scandalous nature and outcome of one who fails to redeem his kin. But a glorious picture emerges of One exalted to the highest place in the universe and given a Name above every name! Is it any wonder that, in the future, this grand display of adoration will take place:

[8] . . . He humbles Himself, [-]becoming[o] obedient unto death, [y]even the death of the cross. [9] Wherefore, also, [']God highly exalts Him, and graces[o] Him with the Name [']that is above every name, [10] that in the Name of Jesus every knee should bow, celestial and terrestrial and subterranean, [11] and every tongue should acclaim[o] that Jesus Christ is Lord, [io]for the glory of God, the Father. (Phil.2:8-11)

CONCERNING JACOB AND JOSEPH

As we, who are chosen, are prone to do as Jacob did, and waste our lives in an effort to obtain what is already ours in Christ, his example should be of great value, to show us what we should not do. Let us not blame Jacob for doing as he did, but thank him for his example, lest we do likewise. Moreover, in contrast to Esau, who was "profane," in that he gave up his birthright for a single feed (Heb.12:16), Jacob prized it above all, and even descended to shabby trickery to get it. In the depths of his heart he was true to the Subjector, and valued His gifts, even if, with his twisted brain and reprehensible hands, he sought to steal them.

The most remarkable thing about Jacob is his flawlessness. Just as Noah was a just man (Gen.6:9) and yet drank too much (9:21), and Abraham and Isaac were justified and richly blessed in spite of their mistakes, so, in Genesis 32:28 Jacob is called Upright-with-El ("Israel"), and prospers greatly notwithstanding his atrocious tricks (Gen.30: 28-43). How can this be? He was no more "responsible" for them than for kicking his mother before he was born. Not only was he called without being even consulted, but all the crooked parts which he played were in the script before he came upon the stage. They were essential to the great purpose of the eons, the revelation of the Deity, so were not only right, but essential to His glory. So he is rewarded for them, rather than punished.

PARTIALITY OF PARENTS

It is only as we keep God's ultimate intention (not will) in mind that we can understand the perverse partiality of the parents of the twins. Otherwise we would [il]logically expect Isaac to love Jacob, for the superior, the firstborn, Esau, was to serve the inferior, Jacob. In this he was justified, not from the physical aspect, but the spiritual. His love for Esau was based upon his fleshly appetite, the taste of his tongue. At the last, however, he recognizes his own blindness, and the hand of Yahweh in correcting his mistake (Gen.27:24-33). So it was with Rebecca. Although she recognized the divine prophecy, and gave Jacob his proper place, yet she was really to blame when Jacob deceived his father (27:6). So it is always, both good and ill, will work His will, or, rather, His intention.

THE BIRTHRIGHT

The patriarchs did not live on flocks alone, for they had bread, and now we read of lentils (Gen.25:34). It is somewhat surprising, however, to find Jacob stewing a stew. Esau was a good hunter, who supplied Isaac with venison, but it was uncertain. On this memorable occasion Esau had tried hard, so he was faint; in fact he spoke as if he was about to starve. This was quite improbable, and only shows how little he cared for his birthright, when he bargained it away for a single meal. Lentil stew is red (adm), so his name was later changed to Edom (Adum). Even his descendants and his land were given this name. What a shameful, sordid origin for the name of a country! Yet how fitting for the man and his descendants who bartered the most precious spiritual possession to satisfy his soul![1]

REJECTION OF ESAU

Jacob's deception of Esau is usually considered merely

1. Unsearchable Riches, vol.50, p.11,12-14.

a mean trick played by him to get the blessing of the firstborn. This is a very superficial view. The matter had been settled and made known before he was born, by divine decree. "The greater shall serve the inferior" (Gen.25:23). "For, not as yet being born, nor yet putting into practice anything good or bad, that the purpose of God may be remaining as a choice, not out of acts, but of Him Who is calling" Who said, "Jacob I love, yet Esau I hate" (Rom. 9:11-13). Indeed, there were many actors in this episode. Elohim decreed it. Isaac sought to prevent it. Rebecca planned the deception. Esau had forfeited it by his indifference to its value, shown by trading it for one glutting of grub. It is only one scene in the great drama of divine determination. It agreed with God's glory.[2]

JOSEPH'S DISTINCTIVE TUNIC

In the Orient, the clothing is expressive of standing and rank. Jacob's sons probably dressed alike, unless the oldest, the firstborn, wore some distinctive mark. But Joseph was younger than they, and, so far as is recorded, had done nothing to merit such partiality. But Jacob, to express his love for the son of his beloved wife, made him a distinctive tunic (Gen.37:3). Others translate: "a coat of many colors" (AV), "a long robe with sleeves" (RSV), "a garment reaching far down," etc. The Hebrew is kthnth TUNIC, such as was made for Adam and Eve in Eden, and shsim LIMITINGS. In earliest days the styles did not change, and those in the same station in life would wear the same kind of clothing. But Jacob made a distinctive tunic for Joseph limited to him alone. This distinguished him from the rest, which they resented.

Is not this confirmed by the spiritual counterpart? Not, however, in His outward appearance, in His clothing, was

2. Unsearchable Riches, vol.50, p.49.

Christ distinguished from His brethren, but in His spiritual words and actions. These were, like the robes, worn by the chief priest, for glory and beauty. And the fact that He was distinguished in this way made His brethren hate Him all the more. He was able to wear the white garments which were worn in entering the divine presence, and ask His hearers, "Who of you is exposing Me concerning sin?" In His words and deeds the purple is seen in Matthew, as the King, the crimson in Luke, as the Son of Mankind, the amethyst in John, as the Son of God. He, indeed, had "a coat of many colors." It is possible, though not certain, that Joseph was distinguished in this way, but we are not distinctly told so.

JOSEPH'S DREAMS

Joseph has been criticized for telling his dreams to his family (Gen.37:5-11). In ordinary circumstances, it might have been unwise, if not offensive. But we should always remember that faith justifies all actions. Joseph believed these revelations to be of God, so had a right to speak. Nay, it would have been wrong if he had not spoken. This is seen more clearly in the Antitype. He, also, was blamed because of His supposed pretensions, and denounced because He claimed to be the Messiah. When He stood before the chief priest, and was exorcised to tell whether he was the Christ, the Son of God, He replied, "You say it! Moreover, I am saying to you, Henceforth you shall be seeing the Son of Mankind sitting at the right hand of power and coming on the clouds of heaven." Then they said that He is a blasphemer, liable to death (Matt.26:62-67). Joseph was quite correct in making known his dreams. Even his brethren acknowledged this after they were fulfilled. So will Israel acknowledge Christ in that day![3] A. E. Knoch

UNDERSTANDING AND ASSURANCE

"CORRESPONDENT RANSOM"
"CORRECTLY CUTTING"

Question:

I long to be "sound in the faith," even as Paul instructs (Titus 2:2). Yet I realize that practically every teaching is disputed by someone, and, that the Concordant teaching is usually a minority view, often even an extreme minority view. Can you help me in my quest for understanding and assurance?

Answer:

IN our quest for faithfulness, let us realize and rejoice that, ultimately speaking, maturity in faith is not our own work but is the Lord's work in us. While the usual claim that the believer "must cooperate with the Holy Spirit" is, strictly speaking, true, yet as popularly understood, it is false. The self-control which one must exercise in order not to quench the spirit is itself the fruit of the spirit (Gal. 5:23). Therefore, if it may truly be said of us that we have been "cooperative," let us not boast in ourselves that this is so, but thank and praise God that this is so.

Each believer belongs to the Lord; thus we are His "slaves." Accordingly, we are, so to say, His "household servants" (AV), His "domestics" (CV, Rom.14:4). Since we are but domestics ourselves, it is not our place to be judging Another's domestic (Rom.14:4a). We are not in charge. Consequently, not to us, but "to his own Master he is standing or falling" (Rom.14:4b).

Concerning the fellow domestic who has been "infirm in the faith" (Rom.14:1), the good news is this: the time will come when "he will be made to stand, for the Lord is able to make Him stand" (Rom.14:4c).

Accordingly, then, in our quest for a faithful walk, my best advice is to take Proverbs 4:7 to heart, which is: "The principal thing is wisdom; acquire wisdom, and with all your acquisition, acquire understanding." Similar wise counsel is found in Proverbs 23:23: "Buy the truth, and do not sell it, [even as] wisdom and discipline and understanding" (Prov.23:23).

When we "understand" a certain thing, we truly discern its meaning. "Wisdom" is the faculty by which we make the highest and best application of knowledge. Since all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are concealed in God (Col.2:3), "the assurance of understanding" (Col.2:2) is that which we have when God makes our faith grow up (1 Cor.3:5-7). Until then, "it is the glory of Elohim to conceal a matter" (Prov.25:2).

A man cannot hunger and thirst for that for which he has no taste. Apart from desire—sufficient desire—we cannot and therefore will not apply ourselves sufficiently to reach our goal. While progress in the faith is by and in the grace of God, it is through our own efforts, according to our strongest desires. One who is wise, therefore, will realize that "a man cannot get anything if it should not be given him out of heaven" (John 3:27).

May the following thoughts be helpful to you in slaving for the living and true God, while waiting for His Son out of the heavens, Whom He rouses from among the dead, Jesus, our Rescuer out of the coming indignation (cf 1 Thess.1:9,10).

REALIZATION IN PRAYER

Just as proficiency in any field requires training and experience, progress in the faith is impossible apart from prayer and education. This is God's way; it is His "means of grace." It is unrealistic and foolish to minimize the importance of either of these two entities.

In prayer, as in our walk in general, we are to become imitators of the apostle Paul; as he says, "according as I also am [an imitator] of Christ" (1 Cor.11:1). Thus we have the apostle "for a model" (Phil.3:17). We do well to note that his concerns and petitions to God are not for soulish welfare but for spiritual enlightenment. Among Paul's most notable prayers are these; may they be our guide as we seek wisdom from above and spiritual understanding:

"Therefore, I also, on hearing of this faith of yours in the Lord Jesus, and that for all the saints, do not cease giving thanks for you, making mention in my prayers that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may be giving you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the realization of Him, the eyes of your heart having been enlightened, for you to perceive what is the expectation of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His allotment among the saints, and what the transcendent greatness of His power for us who are believing, in accord with the operation of the might of His strength" (Eph.1:15-19; cp 2 Cor.4:13).

"Be rejoicing in the Lord always! Again, I will declare, be rejoicing! Let your lenience be known to all men: the Lord is near. Do not worry about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God, and the peace of God, that is superior to every frame of mind, shall be garrisoning your hearts and your apprehensions in Christ Jesus" (Phil.4:4-7).

"We are thanking the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, always praying concerning you, on hearing of your faith in Christ Jesus and the love which you have for all the saints, because of the expectation reserved for you in the heavens, which you hear before in the word of the truth of the evangel, which, being present with you, according as in the entire world also, is bearing fruit and growing, according as it is among you also, from the day on which you hear and realized the grace of God in truth, according as you learned it from Epaphras, our beloved fellow slave, who is a faithful dispenser of Christ for us, who makes evident to us your love in spirit.

"Therefore we also, from the day on which we hear, do not cease praying for you and requesting that you may be filled full with the realization of His will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, you to walk worthily of the Lord for all pleasing, bearing fruit in every good work, and growing in the realization of God; being endued with all power, in accord with the might of His glory, for all endurance and patience with joy; at the same time giving thanks to the Father, Who makes you competent for a part of the allotment of the saints, in light" (Col.1:3-12).

FOUR VITAL QUESTIONS

In studying any passage of Scripture, we must always ask ourselves: (1) What does it say? (2) Whom does it concern? (3) When does it apply? and (4), In what sense is it true?

Unless we have no opinion at all concerning a certain subject, it will be impossible for us not to make some type of judgment concerning it with respect to these questions, even if we do not consciously rehearse these points or even know they exist. Therefore, it is by far the wiser course to keep these questions ever before us as we seek further light, and, as God grants it to us.

(1) What does it say? In order to judge correctly here it is essential that we learn the difference between an actual scriptural declaration and a mere human inference therefrom. We need to be especially clear as to the enormous difference between a corollary (that which, though not expressed, must be true, in light of what has been said) and an inference (that which not only has not been expressed, but may well not be true at all, and, in any case, cannot be known to be true). We must not self-confidently presume that a writer is making an implication when it may well be that it is only we ourselves who are making an unwarranted inference.

It will not suffice to note that a certain translation may state a certain thing in a certain passage; for, for all their accord, there are many differences in rendering among translations, from one version to another. These differences are often by no means trivial or confined simply to choice of phrasing or even to significantly distinct ideas though only concerning minor points of teaching. To the contrary, in some cases, differences in translation declare completely opposite thoughts, even concerning subjects of the greatest consequence.

It is totally inadequate, not to mention dangerous, to approach the Word of God with no more in hand than the Authorized Version or some other all-too-frequently lawless and discordant translation. Indeed, we need much guidance and wisdom even with a faithful translation before us, and cannot hope to gain a good understanding without an accurate, concordant version.

If we would not blindly follow others, our only recourse, then, is to the authority of the Scriptures themselves, through a careful consideration of their own definitive usages of the words of inspiration. Such a pursuit entails, at minimum, at least some measure of intelligent, personal use of a concordance, one which provides access to all occurrences of those words of the Original concerning which the meaning is disputed.

(2) Whom does it concern? and (3) When does it apply? It does not follow from the fact that a certain revelation is "in the Bible," is "in the New Testament," or is included among "the very words of Christ," that such a revelation therefore concerns ourselves. This may or may not be the case. Furthermore, some things that have a vital application, whether for Israel or the nations, are nonetheless only applicable within a certain era or under a certain administration. They are not necessarily in effect continually and interminably even for those to whom they do apply, much less with respect to all.

Such important questions as these must be intelligently and patiently considered; we must endeavor not to make rash judgments, decisions that are the fruit of our own imprudence and impatience, according to our ignorance and prejudice.

For example, in the matter of determining the scope of those who come under the purview of any certain passage, the word "all" is frequently misunderstood and misinterpreted. It must be recognized that even where the word "all" or any other "universal" expression is used (e.g., "each," "any," or "every"), the reference is always to all—to "each" and "every" one—of those who are in view within the scope of the subject matter of the text in question.

In some instances, the reference is to all believers (or, as the case may be, to all saints, humans, or even creatures) without distinction—apart from any limitations—whether of era or administration. In other cases, either the actual context of a passage or the nature of the case limits the application of such "universal" terms. It limits them solely to all those of a certain group or class, to those living at a certain time or under a certain administration or economy. Similarly, it is essential to recognize that a phrase which possesses mere close proximity to a different context, is not at all the same thing as a phrase which is inherently a part of the subject being addressed.

(4) In what sense is it true? Even if we have succeeded in discerning what has been said, whom it concerns and when it applies, we are not ready to come to a conclusion until we resolve the vital question which remains, In what sense is this declaration true? That is, is it to be understood literally or figuratively; absolutely or relatively; and, peremptorily or provisionally?

All literature is comprised primarily of literal expressions, even if many figurative expressions should also be employed. Indeed, without an understanding of the literal it is impossible to discern the message of the figurative, for literal meaning is the basis of figurative application.

Therefore, the adage "whenever possible, literal" is essentially sound advice. We would prefer to refine this slightly, however, and say, "Whenever viable—all things considered—literal." Taking this approach will not close the door to the recognition of true figurative passages or otherwise diminish our insight to discern that which is spiritual (which is an entirely different matter from that which is figurative). To the contrary, it will form a sound basis for our study of literary figures and will tend toward awakening us to their presence. Though there are many figures of speech, by far the most common ones, metaphor and metonymy, are concerned, respectively, with either likeness to or association with the literal. Of course, when considering literal meaning, we must not confound essential meaning with derived usage. Similarly, we must note the difference between the many lexical definitions of a word's usage, and the vital, definitive essence of the word itself, which distinguishes it from other expressions.

When judging between the literal and figurative, if, because it would entail absurdity or contradiction to take a phrase literally we are constrained to deem it figurative, we must still ask ourselves, Of what does the figure consist and what is the literal idea behind the figure, which it merely serves to convey?

Yet wherever there is no compelling reason to take a statement figuratively and we therefore judge it to be literal, we must still decide whether this literal statement is absolute or relative. If we should judge it to be truly absolute, we must regard it as universally so, without limitation of any kind. If we should regard it as relative, we must decide the scope of the subject matter to which this literal statement may be applied. Few scriptural passages are fully absolute, without limitation of any kind, even if they should be practically absolute. And many statements are by no means absolute, but are true only as they relate to a certain subject. It is strictly a matter of wisdom and discernment, based upon our total knowledge of all facts that have a bearing on a matter, as to whether we should judge a statement in one way or another.

It will not suffice merely to make bold claims as to the significance of a passage, especially when, if the truth be known, we may never have realized that such a thing as varied senses in which a passage may be taken even exists.

All these matters are concerned with wise and astute judgment. They are matters of "interpretation," which is merely to say they are matters concerning which we must make correct decisions. Though it is not literally true that "the Scriptures interpret themselves," nonetheless, the spirit of this aphorism is certainly true, as expressed through this metonymical figure!

The literal idea intended is that if we would truly understand (i.e., make out the meaning of) a certain text, we must make many correct decisions concerning it as we are guided by the many related scriptural matters with which it is associated or otherwise connected or dependent.

Question:

Why, in 1 Timothy 2:6, did Mr. Knoch translate using the two words, "correspondent Ransom"? My wife asked me, "What does that mean?" I told her that I did not know why Mr. Knoch chose to use two words; and since the single word here in the Greek, antilutron, is only found once, there is nothing else to compare it with. I figured that what was meant by "correspondent [Ransom]," is "equal to the whole," or something similar. But it does not seem that the word "correspondent" was necessary in order to convey that thought, since it is followed immediately by "on behalf of all."

Answer:

I am pleased that your wife asked about this, that I might share a few words with you both concerning it.

Please see the Unsearchable Riches article, "For or Instead?" concerning this question (vol.81, pp.145-151; this article also considers the Greek word huper [OVER, or "for the sake of"], and is quite helpful in responding to the common claim that Christ is our "substitute").

While the compound antilutron only appears in 1 Timothy 2:6, anti is found in quite a few passages and lutron in several. The first element of antilutron, of course, is anti; it is sometimes rendered "for" in the CV (with a superior "id")—in the sense of "an eye for an eye" (i.e., "an eye corresponding to an eye").

The verb lutroō (LOOSEN) is translated either "ransom" or "redeem." "'Loosen' is used many times in the Septuagint for each of two Hebrew words, gal ('redeem') and phde ('ransom'). 'Ransom' is used only in relation to the claims of Yahweh, especially as to the firstborn of man and beast (Ex.13:13,15; 34:20; Num.3:46-49), as well as of vows involving death (Lev.27:3; 1 Sam.14:45).

"'Redeem' is used of human rights, as property (Ruth 4:4,6; Lev.25:25,54; 27:13,33), and the avenger (Num.5:8; 35:12,27). 'Ransom' involves the divine; 'redeem,' the human: the former is religious in scope; the latter, social, and is seldom used in the later Scriptures (Luke 24:21; Titus 2:14)" (Keyword Concordance, p.239).

While, as a standard, we have assigned INSTEAD to anti, nevertheless, the essential thought, common to all contexts, is that of "corresponding to."

For example, Matthew 2:22 contains the phrase, "hearing that Archelaus is reigning in Judea in the stead of his father Herod . . ." concerning which it is evident that the sense is that Archelaus was now reigning in correspondence to the fact that Herod was now dead.

Similarly, in Luke 11:11 Jesus declared: "Now of some father of you a son will be requesting bread. No stone will he be handing him! Or a fish, also. Not, instead of a fish, a serpent will he be handing him!" (Luke 11:11). Even as every father knows that there is no suitableness in giving a stone to a son who asks for bread, he likewise knows that there could be no fit correspondence in handing a serpent to a son who had requested a fish: "Not [in correspondency to] a fish, a serpent will he be handing him!" since he knows very well that there is no fitting correspondency in acting thus in response to such a request.

Hence it is evident that the literal "instead" should not be understood in the sense of a replacement or substitute, but in the sense of an equivalence or correspondence. For example, the phrase "an eye for [lit. "instead"] an eye" (Matt.5:38), does not have in view the substitution of the aggressor's eye for his victim's, so that the eye of the victim was spared, and only the aggressor's eye was destroyed. "This was not true. Both eyes perished. One eye did not replace the other. The law demanded an equivalent, not a substitute."[1]

Indeed, in those instances where anti is idiomatically rendered "for," the discerning reader will recognize that the sense, in fact, is "corresponding to." Thus such passages constitute definitive evidence of the actual force of this word.

1. A. E. Knoch, Unsearchable Riches, vol.81, p.148.

In order to incorporate the literal "instead" in the case of the common phrase "evil for (anti) evil," we might, however awkwardly, express Romans 12:17 thus: "To no one render [a new act of] evil in the stead of [i.e., in correspondence to the former act of] evil."

Thus, through these considerations of the essential meaning of anti, we learn that Christ is giving Himself as a "corresponding-to-Ransom" (i.e., idiomatically, as a "correspondent Ransom"), a correspondent Ransom which is given for the sake of all. That is, His sacrifice constitutes a ransom that corresponds to the needs of all sinners: a Saviour Who would die for the sake of each and every individual, and thus actually save each one for whom He died.

Question:

Since all of the New Testament is true and is written by Christians for Christians, how can you say that only part of it applies to us?

Answer:

All Scripture is truth for today concerning the subject with which it deals and with respect to those who are concerned in it. All Scripture is for us in the sense that it is in some way beneficial to us, whether for teaching, exposure, or correction; and it is all given to us with a view toward our instruction in righteousness (2 Tim.3:16), so that we might know what is true. This is all unto the end that the man of God might truly be "equipped, fitted out for every good act" (2 Tim.3:17).

Yet if we should wish truly to engage in faithful acts, we must come to "know that which concerns [ourselves]"

(Col.4:8), and to distinguish it from what does not concern us, insofar as any certain act of human obedience, divine blessing, curse, promise, warning, or other teaching is concerned.

It is by no means ideal for us to take to ourselves those things in the Bible which do not belong to us. Such practices are mere religious thievery, no matter how hallowed by antiquity. The apostle Paul refers to those who (however sincerely) were taking up with those things which are concerned with the flesh and with the nation of Israel, as "curs," as "evil workers," and entreats the Philippians to "beware" of them (cf Phil.3:2-9).

It is true that we must not contrive artificial distinctions, imagining differences that simply do not exist. Yet it is just as true that we must not fail to note and heed all genuine distinctions; no matter how many of our own traditions may have to be set aside as a result.

Misplaced truth becomes insidious error, for it seems to have scriptural support. As little as it may be heeded, at least the principle of proper application seems to be acknowledged among virtually all believers. For example, hardly any seek to apply all the laws of Moses to themselves, or even all the imperatives of the Lord Jesus, which He declared within the compass of His personal ministry to Israel. We have yet to hear of any today who wish to make either male circumcision or animal sacrifices compulsory for salvation. This is so however much these same ones may differ among themselves or seek to press other "requirements" into service unto the same end.

Therefore, nearly all, even if tacitly, at least assent to the principle of "correctly cutting the word of truth" (2 Tim. 2:15), insofar as this entreaty has in view the fact that while all Scripture is for us, it is not all to us; it is not all applicable to believers today, to those who are the members of the body of Christ. ENRICHED IN HIM

THERE IS a divine eloquence in the thought that we are enriched in Him. Note the fullness, the completeness so resident in the words, as they lie enshrined in Scripture. "For in everything are you enriched in Him, in all expression and all knowledge" (1Cor.1: 5).

In everything enriched. Made wealthy for all time in the bestowal of a great assurance, a rare position, and a most blessed standing. Nothing is wanting, "for in Him the entire complement of the Deity is dwelling bodily. And you are complete in Him Who is the Head of every sovereignty and authority" (Col.2:9,10).

The value of such a standing lies in the thought of its being in Him—the Christ of God, the Son of His love, glorious Head over all. A standing, truly, of wondrous worth, and one utterly beyond us, had not God revealed the grace of it to our hearts.

The heart of man did not ascend, nor could it aspire to such transcendent grace. It must be God-revealed. And so, through Paul, it came to our hearts in the light of His Word.

God shines in our hearts, and then alone, illumination is ours. For, by His spirit, God brings us to see, and also to realize, that in Christ is our completeness. Not in ourselves, for there can be no abiding self satisfaction. None in themselves can find repose of heart and mind. It can but be in God's Beloved, even "in accord with His delight, which He purposed in Him" (Eph.1:9).

We see, then, how it is all of God that we should be so enriched in the Son of His love, and given so perfect a standing. God has given us His own sublime point of view. He has shown us that, in His sight, we are complete. And, as a writer well expressed it, "It belongs no more to the giant in spiritual things than it does to the mere babe in Christ. The saint of fifty years' standing is in the sight of God not one atom more complete in this respect than the youngest believer." Of course, in the realization of so great a truth, one may have a deeper sense of it, but what God wants us to see, and truly grasp, is what the position is in itself and in His own sight.

It is the simple and obvious which is often passed by. And this is deadly true of the religious world. Man is too much in the picture. Far too much is he thrown back on himself, or on that vague term "Christianity," which he is so often told to embrace and accept. Rarely is the Christ of God set before him as the all glorious risen Son of God, Lord of the universe, and the One to Whom God has assigned future Rulership of all the realms of space.

COMPLETE IN CHRIST

It is, then, in Him that our completeness lies. What Christ is to God, that He should be to us. That is so all-important in the life of a believer. A grand subject for study is the Ephesian letter, for therein we see all that God has made Christ to be to His people. But so many fail to perceive this truth, that Paul so clearly unfolds. They are taken up with the four accounts and the sermon on the mount as being central to their faith, so do not see all that God has made them to be in Him. Hence they are ignorant of their standing in Christ, and of their perfection in Him.

By so many, the so-called Lord's prayer and the ten commandments are considered as sufficient for Christian position and profession. As a consequence the sheer freedom and blessedness of grace is not enjoyed. For this rare unalloyed pleasure and the glad experience of God's peace, we should study Paul's letters, for in them we have the loftiest presentation of Christ as the all glorious Son of God. And the apostle to the nations brings Him so wondrously near to our hearts, and thus to our lives.

Especially in the Ephesian letter shall we find it so, for there he seems to reach the very pinnacle of grace. We are so taken up with God, the Father of Glory, and His choice and placing of us in the Beloved. What a standing and what a position and privilege is accorded us, and all "in accord with the counsel of His will!"

So, reading on and on, we find Paul's earlier statement, already quoted, fully confirmed. "For in everything are you enriched in Him, in all expression and all knowledge." And in this epistle, with its companion letters to the Philippians and Colossians, nothing is wanting to our completeness, our maturity as sons of God. There is a fullness of expression and of knowledge that makes us wise indeed and full of praise to God for the grandeur of His sublimest revelation.

Now, the assurance of salvation God would have us know is a permanent experience. It is not a thing of fits and starts, of transient feelings and emotions. It is an utter resting upon God's valuation of the incomparable worth and sacrifice of Christ. We therefore want to think of it as God thinks, Whose thoughts are unfolded to us in the Word of His grace. And let us ever bear in mind that the truth of the evangel of the glory of the happy God, with which Paul was entrusted, is not shaken by its not being believed. It remains true whether it is accepted or not.

However, God, being the happy God, wants us to exult in the tremendous character of it. Not to think of it in a numerical sense, as though it were to be judged by present day estimates with their various limitations. If we are wise to the marvelous extent and reach of God's saving grace, we shall the more appreciate its present worth and ultimate triumph.

Having, then, so perfect a standing, and one so altogether unmoved by this passing world, let us so grasp the glory of it as to intensely realize its power in our lives. Thus shall we experience a state in full keeping with our standing. But to know where we stand is vital. Then it follows, in God's own way and sequence, that our walk the more truly adorns the teaching of God as set forth in His Word.

We do well to remember that our character, however moral, does not determine this rare position before God. It is the realization of our position, and its attendant privilege, which effects our attitude and character before men. So often, to use a simple expression, "the cart is put before the horse." Far too frequently are people exhorted to do things, than just to believe God and to take His valuation and acceptance of Christ. And, resting there, to draw from it power and strength. Conscious, therefore, of our standing in Christ, our aim should ever be to raise our experience to its great level. As with Paul, it should be a case of "this one thing I do." Be pursuing, be grasping, that for which you were grasped by Christ Jesus. "Be carrying your own salvation into effect, for it is God Who is operating in you to will as well as to work for the sake of His delight" (Phil.2:13).

There is a little word of Paul's quite worthy of note, especially in the way he uses it. It is the simple word be. And there is power in it, far more than in the word do. As you come across it you will see how positive it is. And there is action involved in the word, also. Out of many, here is a good illustration.

"Whatever is true, whatever is grave, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is agreeable, whatever is renowned—if there is any virtue, and if any applause, be taking these into account. What you learned also, and accepted and hear and perceived in me, these be putting into practice, and the God of peace will be with you" (Phil.4:8,9).

How fine the concluding thought here—"the God of peace will be with you." Paul was able to say, "I learned to be content in that in which I am." Truly, God's peace "is superior to every frame of mind." Do we not see and sometimes intensely feel, how such God-given language fits our need? By all means, then, let us adhere to God's clear language, especially as enunciated by Paul, true herald to the nations. For it is in such expressions, that we most truly find the enrichment which is in Christ.

It is the highest medium of communication to our hearts, of God's purpose in Christ—God's purpose of the eons as it vitally affects the recipients of the evangel of the glory of Christ, and, indeed, as it affects the entire creation of God. Nor is such attention any disparagement to other writers of the Scriptures. Far from it, for all their writings contribute to the whole. But in this era of grace, so ushered in, and opportunely by Paul, we are the more concerned with the evangel he presents and heralds to the nations.

It may truly be said that Paul's letters bring to the heart and mind the highest truth concerning God and Christ, and that they bring that truth to a perfect and sublime conclusion. For, while they unfold an ideal order of going for believers of the nations, they also reveal a climax to God's purpose most satisfying to Himself as also to the creatures of His hand.

As to the emergence of full glory in the final issue of God's grace, Paul is a rare optimist with buoyant note. Only in reference to man and to "man's day" is he the pessimist. Our Lord Himself touched upon it, and His servant Paul discerned and experienced its fruit in a deep degree. From Constantine, all down the ages, apart from fitful gleams of light and obedience thereto, it has been and remains a dark picture.

But for the sons of light, though the night progresses, yet the day is near. Yes, as God counts time, the day is near, and wonderful days to follow, leading stage after stage to the cloudless day of God. The near and the far unite in grace and glory. And the glory of the Son will find full expression, for it will be the glory of a marvelous resignation, the triumphant close of a perfect reign. For then at last He resigns His throne, unquestioned and unmarred, to God.

"O Day-spring from on high, Whose cloudless light
Has beamed upon me, banishing my night
With dawn of heaven; Sun of Righteousness!
Rise, oh for ever rise! for ever shine
Brighter and brighter! from all weeping eyes
Remove all tears; and over all Thy saints,
And over earth and heaven, and o'er the bounds
Of time's dark night, and far into the depths
Of all the ages pour out the light,
Pour out the sea of glory, the full sea
Of all Thy glory—inexhaustible."

ELI R. BEACHY

Eli R. Beachy, 86, of Lititz, Pennsylvania, died on September 17.

A kind and gentle man, Eli was a devout believer in Christ Jesus, who loved, and had confidence in, the evangel of the grace of God.

Eli's wife Irene preceded him in death in 2014. We joyfully anticipate reuniting with them both in the day of Christ's appearing, which will be the day of their—even as of our own—glorification, in conformation to the image of God's Son.

"Now we are aware that God is working all together for the good of those who are loving God, who are called according to the purpose that, whom He foreknew, He designates beforehand, also, to be conformed to the image of His Son, for Him to be Firstborn among many brethren" (Rom.8:28,29).

THE EVANGEL AND OUR WALK

WHEN Paul boldly (some would say "rashly") sets forth God's evangel concerning His Son in Romans 5:20 as a message saying that, "where sin increases, grace superexceeds," he makes no attempt to water it down, but rather takes up an artful objection of human wisdom to it: If grace is so all-encompassing, we may as well be persisting in sin that it should increase. "No!" says Paul, and immediately he turns the attention away from human wisdom back to God's evangel of grace, which is the word of the cross, which is God's wisdom (1 Cor.1:18-25):

We are those who died to sin! (Rom.6:2).

But what can that mean? After all, in the flesh we are very much alive to sin. So Paul explains by pointing to what we have in spirit, and of this we must not be ignorant: We are baptized into Christ Jesus,[1] and this being so we are baptized into His death (Rom.6:3).

Our old humanity (which is what we got from Adam) is crucified together with Christ Jesus (Rom.6:6).

This being so, Paul's question seems not only reasonable but highly relevant to our present lives: How shall we still be living in sin? And here he is not denying that we still sin. He simply wants us to see how illogical it is to be still living in sin, when we are dead to it with regard to our position in Christ. In Christ Jesus we are freed from the law of sin and death, as Paul tells us in Romans 8:2. This is absolutely true in relation to what has occurred and will be so, and also as to our present position in the sight of God. And in listening attentively to this message of grace there is spiritual power (Paul calls this the "firstfruit of the spirit" in Romans 8:23) for a walk, even while in our flesh, that accords with this position. This, of necessity, is a relative matter, until the resurrection, a matter of growth, yet of highest value to us.

THE GRACE OF GOD

Already Paul had expressed the evangel in terms of grace and gratuity. By works of law, no flesh at all shall be justified in God's sight (Rom.3:20), for all sin and are wanting of the glory of God (Rom.3:23). Yet now God's righteousness is manifest through Jesus Christ's faith (Rom.3:21,22), that is His faith in dying for our sakes while we are still sinners (Rom.5:8). God's righteousness is revealed, and justification is achieved by this means only, not by our works, and (here we need to be clear) it is not even by our faith. It is by means of Christ's faith.

"Where, then, is boasting? It is debarred! Through what law? Of works? No! But through faith's law. For we are reckoning a human to be justified by [Christ's] faith apart from works of law" (Rom.3:27,28). The faith in view is the faith of Jesus Christ. God's righteousness is manifest through Jesus Christ's faith, so that we are justified gratuitously, in God's grace, through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus (Rom.3:24; cp Gal.2:16).

And what is His faith? "While we are still sinners, Christ dies for our sakes" (Rom.5:8). This is God's evangel, the message of His grace in not sparing His own Son, but giving Him up for us all (Rom.8:32). This testimony of a grace that is not of ourselves, but of God, through Jesus Christ, is consistently presented and upheld throughout Paul's epistles. But it is truly central in Romans.

NEWNESS OF LIFE

In that we are identified with Christ in His death, we are identified with Him in His life. This means that we shall be of the resurrection and walking in newness of life. When Paul says in Romans 6:4 that we "should" be walking in newness of life, he is not telling us we "ought" to be walking that way (as much as that may be so), but that, being baptized into Christ, even as Christ was roused from among the dead through the glory of the Father, our walk in newness of life is thus also through the glory of the Father. The aorist subjunctive, indicated by the conditional word "should," directs us to see the basis of the condition. The basis of our walk in newness of life is the same ("thus also") as the basis of the rousing of Christ from among the dead. It is the glory of the Father which brings about newness of life. If we think we are obligated, of ourselves, to live today "even as" Christ lives today in resurrection, then we are wretched indeed. For we do not walk that way. The "should" of verse 4 has, in effect, the same force as the "shall" of verse 5. "For if we have become planted together in the likeness of [Christ's] death, nevertheless we shall be of the resurrection also," walking in newness of life, through the glory of the Father. This is a certainty.

In this we hear the evangel which is the power of God for salvation, not only in achieving justification and receiving conciliation, with expectation of a full realization and experience of a life and walk that is just as Christ Jesus, our Lord enjoys today, but also the power of God for salvation in accord with the earnest of the spirit, in our present walk. God has positioned us under grace. So if our walk is to accord in any way with the spirit which accompanies our believing of the evangel, we must first, and continually through our lives, be coming to know, and be taking into account, and be retaining, and be enslaving our minds to God's evangel.

So it is that in Romans 6 Paul presents the evangel to us not only as a message of Christ's death and resurrection, but a message of our identification with Him in His death and resurrection, an identification that is in spirit and which emits spirit.

By no means shall we then be slaving for Sin in the resurrection, for we died, and one who dies has been justified from Sin. Yet again, if we are baptized into Christ, so that this is true that we died together with Christ, it is true also that we shall be living together with Him also. Having died together with Him, Who is no longer dying, Who has died to Sin once for all, so also we are, in spirit, dead to sin. This is our position in Christ Jesus. And in that He is living to God, we are, in spirit, living to God in Christ Jesus, our Lord. That is where we are in spirit. (Keep taking this evangel into account!) This being so, how, then, shall we still be living in such a way that we are increasing our sins in order to get more grace?

In this way, Romans 6 brings God's evangel concerning His Son into our lives right now. Not only is it a message concerning what has happened and will happen because of the faith and obedience of Jesus Christ in dying for our sakes, but it is a message that vibrates over our darkened and corrupted lives, just as God's spirit vibrated over the disrupted earth in connection with God's words in Genesis 1:2, followed by verses 3-31.

It is our security and joy, continually to give our attention to this word of God concerning the faith of Jesus Christ and our inclusion in Him which we have in spirit, in which we are "dead, indeed to Sin, yet living to God in Christ Jesus, our Lord." And in that we have this blessing in Christ Jesus, we are invigorated by it by means of spirit. Brother A. E. Knoch expresses it well in his note on Romans 6:12: "A realization of our death to sin and life in Christ will give us power to cope with sin, always remembering that sin cannot bring us into disfavor because of the superexceeding grace."[2]

Accordingly, our apostle points to the ways in which our mouths and ears, as well as heart and mind may be involved with the evangel. It is the evangel that we are to declare and listen to and think about deeply, with thanksgiving. In chapter 7 Paul himself sets the example regarding the mind, when he attacks his wretchedness over the infirmity of his flesh by thanking God for His grace and enslaving his mind to God's "law," which is, most certainly, God's law of grace (Rom.7:21-25).

"Grace is the door that leads us out of Romans seven into Romans eight. It ushers us out of misery into the realm of pure delight. It transfers us from unsatisfactory, distressing self-inspection, where we are harassed with doubts and condemned by ourselves, into that marvelous realm which greets us in the opening of the eighth chapter. 'Nothing, consequently, is now condemnation . . . .' Instead of continual condemnation grace absolutely defies all condemnation. Even where sin abounds, grace superabounds, so that sin itself is submerged in the redundance and superfluity of grace."[3]

We come, then, to the eighth chapter of Romans:

ROMANS 8:1-4

8 Nothing consequently is now condemnation to ˙those in Christ Jesus. [2] For the spirit's ˙law of ˙life in Christ Jesus frees you from the law of ˙sin and ˙death. [3] For ˙what was impossible to the law, in which it was infirm through the flesh, does ˙God, ¯sending His s/own ˙Son in the likeness of sin's flesh and concerning sin, He condemns ˙sin in the flesh, [4] that the just requirement of the law may be ful- filled in us, who are not walking in accord with flesh, but in accord with spirit.

Here Paul continues this exposition of the evangel as it relates to us who are believing, telling us that as a consequence of God's law of grace, "Nothing . . . is now condemnation to those in Christ Jesus." That is absolutely so, as indicated by the emphatic negative, ouden. That nothing at all is condemnation to us is settled by the grace of God in the sending of His Son, and the faith of Jesus Christ in dying for our sakes.

Brother Knoch testifies concerning his growth in realizing what Paul wrote here, as follows: "Many a thankful thought have I wafted heavenward for 'no condemnation,' when once the great truth of justification had filled my spirit with overflowing joy. At that time I associated the words only with my vindication through the blood of Christ. I saw nothing more in them than Christ for me in death. When I came to translate I found that the Greek did not say no but nothing. It does not negative condemnation, but things. It began to dawn on me that here we have more than justification stated negatively. The previous chapters had been dealing with the sins of the saints. In the third chapter we have the justification of the sinner; here we have that of the saint. Nothing of all that we read of in the sixth and seventh chapters—sin, the flesh, the law—not even these can be our condemnation."[4]

We are under grace! We are under the evangel that nothing is condemnation to us.

THREE FURTHER ABSOLUTES

Now, added to the absolute truth that nothing is now condemnation to those in Christ Jesus, are three further absolutes, the first called "the spirit's law," the second

4. Unsearchable Riches, vol.27, p.169,170.

being God's evangel itself, and the third looking ahead to its future results in our lives.[5]

It is noteworthy that Paul uses four "aorist" verbs (indefinite as to time, so that the fact of the action is stressed) here in Romans 8:2-4. Grammatically speaking, two of these are in the indicative mode: "frees" and "condemns;" one is a participle: "sending;" and the fourth one is in the subjunctive mode: "may be fulfilled," which draws attention to the basis of this fulfillment, not self-effort, but God's sending of His Son Whose death as the Antitype of the sin offering puts sin under a sentence of condemnation that will be fully carried out. It is therefore a fact that we shall fulfill the just requirement of the law, absolutely and without flaw in the oncoming eons.

In using "fact" verbs, Paul emphasizes the actions as matters of highly important truth. They express facts which cannot be toned down or altered because of human irreverence and unrighteousness and infirmity. And they are stated in such a way that our full attention is to these actions as certainties.

5. Although missing in the earliest manuscript evidence, the phrase concerning our walk, which appears in the AV in verse 1 in connection with "no condemnation," has appeared here in all editions of the CV until now, in connection with verse 2. A. E. Knoch defended this reading in an article in Unsearchable Riches, vol.27, pages 159-170, on the basis of a marginal reading in Codex Sinaiticus, by the hand of a corrector in the sixth or seventh century. This editor claimed that he based his insertions on a second century manuscript of high reliability. Nevertheless the contextual evidence strongly supports the manuscripts which include this phrase only at the end of verse 4, where there can be no doubt of its originality. As rendered in the AV the phrase, seems to limit the "no condemnation" to those who walk in a certain way, thus suggesting that human behavior is the contributing source to this blessing. The CV has avoided this by connecting the phrase with verse 2, but this seems to make the freedom from the law of sin and death a relative matter, defined by our behavior rather than our position in Christ Jesus established by God's spirit.

LIFE IN CHRIST JESUS

Nothing is now condemnation to those in Christ Jesus. For the spirit's law of life in Christ Jesus frees us from the law of sin and death. Twice we hear these riveting words: we are in Christ Jesus. It is because we are positioned before God in Christ Jesus that nothing can condemn us. This is the grace in which we stand (Rom.5:2). Nothing we do can condemn us because we stand before God in Christ Jesus, and thus are free (in Him) from the law of sin and death. Our old humanity is crucified together with Christ. In Him it is dead, even as Christ no longer has death lording it over Him. This is truth for us due to the law of the spirit; it is the evangel as it applies to us, and as such it is absolute truth.

THE LAW OF THE SPIRIT

Later when Paul writes from a Roman prison of this grace in which we are saved, he makes certain we understand that "this is not out of you; it is God's approach present," through faith (Eph.2:8;9), that is, through Christ's faith. In Romans 3:27 Paul uses the words, "faith's law," to refer to this "law" by which justification is achieved and we are delivered from sin and death, not by human works, but in God's grace, through the faith of Jesus Christ (Rom.3: 21-28). Then in Romans 7:25 Paul uses the words, "God's law," to refer to this operation of God, through His Son, which rescues us from wretchedness. Thus the apostle thanks God, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Paul enslaves his mind to this law of grace and love which God follows in sending His Son to die for our sakes.

Even as our flesh is under enslavement to Sin's law, our minds (like Paul's) and heart (cf Rom.6:17) need to come under enslavement to God's law, that is, His evangel concerning His Son, which now we see in its further development as the spirit's law. This law identifies those who are believing, not only with the death of Christ, but with His life in resurrection, and thus frees us, as we are positioned in Christ Jesus and stand before God, from the law of sin and death.

FREED IN CHRIST JESUS

This freedom is ours in that where it is impossible to keep the law of Sinai because of the law of sin in our fleshly members, God sends His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh and concerning sin, and by this means He condemns sin in the flesh to final extermination. And this is so that the righteous requirement of the law may be fulfilled in us (Rom.8:1-4a). With the cross as its basis, there can be no doubt that the righteous requirement of love for God and our associate, which the law calls for, shall be fully and perfectly expressed in us. Because verse 3 is the basis of 4a, the "may" becomes a "shall." It is a vital feature of our happy expectation, that we shall be so constituted that we shall be righteous as Christ is righteous and be truly walking in love as He is walking in love.

Verse 3 is the key fact. Without God's sending of His own Son concerning sin there can only be condemnation for sinners, for we could never be freed from the law of sin and death and would never come close to fulfilling the law of love. The word "sending" is an aorist participle, or verbal adjective expressing a fact about God. He is the "sends-His-own-Son-in-(the)-likeness-of-sin's-flesh-and-concerning-sin" God.

In addition, we recognize that these actions, the freeing and the sending and the condemning and the fulfilling are facts which cannot be verified by our physical senses, but nevertheless are filled with spirit as we are believing them. The evangel says it is an unalterable truth even though we cannot prove it empirically that we are freed

(in our position "in Christ Jesus") from the law of sin and death, and that God condemns sin in the flesh, and that we shall fulfill the righteous requirement of the law (which is love), for all of these facts are based entirely on the fact of God's sending of His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh and concerning sin.

WALKING

Now in the middle of Romans 8:4 Paul changes from "fact" verbs to a present participle, along with the relative negative.[6] The believers are the "walking-no(t)-in-accord-with-flesh-but-in-accord-with-spirit" people.

To note that 4a speaks of fully and perfectly walking in love (which awaits our future conformity to the image of God's Son, cf Rom.8:29; Phil.3:21) while 4b speaks of a walk that always in our current lives has room for growth in love, is not to suggest any lessening of value to the words of 4b. Here indeed Paul points to something the believer has right now which the unbeliever does not have. It, too, is a matter of grace. We are walking all the time in our present lives under the vibrating influence of the truth that while we are still sinners Christ dies for our sakes, so that we shall in the future, in every way and without flaw of any sort, be walking in newness of life, living to God as Christ is living to God. So also, in Christ Jesus, we are living every day under the assurance that nothing is condemnation to us, that in Him we are freed from the law of sin and death, and that because of God's sending of His Son for the condemnation of sin we shall most certainly be fulfilling the righteous requirement of the law, which is love.

6. Unfortunately, by a typesetting error, the negative in verse 4 lacks the lightface "t" in the CLNT, which would identify it as a "conditional negative" (cf the KEYWORD CONCORDANCE, p.206, under no.) This will be corrected in the revised CVNT.

This expectancy of glory to come is power to us now as we are focusing on it in mind and heart.

SPIRIT AND FAITH

Those who are walking in accord with spirit rather than flesh are those who are walking by faith rather than perception (2 Cor.5:7). The parallels of spirit to faith, and flesh to perception, are striking. Spirit is invisible power, and faith is a "conviction concerning matters which are not being observed" (Heb.11:1). Perception in 2 Corinthians 5:7 is the perception of our fleshly members.

Israel walked in the wilderness in accord with the directing of the cloud of smoke by day and the pillar of fire by night. These were continually visible to the physical eye and did not call for faith as it is central to our calling. Then also God's word came to them in the form of the law which looked to the flesh for its fulfillment. Yet we are not under law, but under grace (Rom.6:14), which focuses on what God has done in the sending of His Son for the condemnation of sin.

Always we walk under grace, so that we are invigorated by God's word, His evangel of His giving of His own Son, the word of the cross. It is God's WELL-MESSAGE, His wisdom and His power, speaking not of what we must do but of what God has done in and through His Son, and of its results. As we are believing this it bears the fruit of the spirit in us: love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control (Gal.5:22,23).

WALKING IN LOVE

Hence Paul connects our walk, not with the law of Sinai, but with the evangel, which is faith's law, God's law of grace, the spirit's law of life in Christ Jesus. And this, in turn, prepares us for the entreaties beginning in Romans

12:1 where the evangel is summed up in the phrase, "the pities of God."[7]

The entreaties of Romans 12 and 13 especially are thus built on the declaration of our position in Christ Jesus given in Romans 6 and now more precisely in Romans 8. Always our walk is guided and invigorated by God's evangel concerning the faith and obedience of Jesus Christ and its results. Our walk in the Lord is not the basis of our position in Christ, but our position in Christ is the moving influence of our walk. God's grace to us and Christ's faith and love in giving Himself for our sins, and the spirit's law of identifying us with Christ so that we have life in Him, this is what invigorates us in our walk. Thus we read, for example, in Ephesians 4:4:30-5:2:

"Do not be causing sorrow to the holy spirit of God by which you are sealed for the day of deliverance. Let all bitterness and fury and anger and clamor and calumny be taken away from you with all malice, yet become kind to one another, tenderly compassionate, dealing graciously among yourselves, according as God also, in Christ, deals graciously with you.

"Become, then, imitators of God as beloved children, and be walking in love, according as Christ also loves you, and gives Himself up for us, an approach present and a sacrifice to God, for a fragrant odor."

A walk that accords with spirit is a walk that is becoming shaped by the message of God's grace in Christ, that evangel which vibrates over our lives as we are believing it.

7. The English word, pities, is not an exact equivalent of the Greek word, oiktirmos, at least in current English usage, but in that it expresses God's own feeling toward us in distress (cf KEYWORD CONCORDANCE, p.225), we can see it as speaking of grace emanating from the depths of God.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

UNSEARCHABLE RICHES, FOURTH QUARTER 2016
BEING THE FOURTH NUMBER OF VOLUME ONE HUNDRED SEVEN

IN this issue of Unsearchable Riches magazine we present the current status of a Revised Concordant Version of Romans. It retains the features and follows the principles of translation of the previous editions, but there are a few changes in vocabulary and grammar. It is with the hope of solidifying appreciation for God's evangel as a message revealing God's righteousness by means of the faith of Jesus Christ that we now use the word "righteous" instead of "just" in key passages such as Romans 1:17 and 5:16 and 18, and have added the lightface "His" before the word "faith" in 3:25.

A review of Habakkuk 2:4 (see the revised translation on page 176) as cited in Acts 7:52 and Hebrews 10:37-39 convinces us that the quotation in Romans 1:17 refers principally to Christ Himself as the Righteous One, and to His faith. So also, looking again at Brother Knoch's editorial for March 1953 (Unsearchable Riches volume 44, pages 49-53) and Brother Coram's study in volume 102, pages 11-25, concerning the Greek words with the stem -dik- (JUST) encourages us to introduce the new variants, righteous (outcome) in Romans 5:16, righteous (response) in 5:18, and righteous (intent) in 8:4. See the notes on these passages, pages 183 and 186).

A number of the brief comments in the "Notes on Romans" article are taken from the CONCORDANT COMMENTARY ON THE NEW TESTAMENT, compiled by A. E. Knoch, and these are identified by the initials AEK. The rest are my own. D.H.H.

He has promised°, He is able to do also. 22 Wherefore also, it is reckoned to him *io*for righteousness.

23 Now it is not written because of him only, that it is reckoned to him, 24 but because of us also, to whom it is labout to be lreckoned°, ˙who are believing on Him ˙Who rouses Jesus our ˙Lord *o*from among the dead, 25 Who is given up because of our ˙offenses, and is roused because of our ˙justifying.

6 For Christ, while we lare still infirm, still in accord with the era, for the sake of the irreverent, dies. 7 For hardly for the sake of a righteous man will anyone be dying°: for, for the sake of a ˙good man, perhaps *a*some-one may even be daring to die, 8 yet ˙God is commending this ˙love of *sf*His *io*to us, seeing that, while we lare still sinners, Christ dies for our sakes. 9 Much rather then, ¯being now justified in His ˙blood, we shall be lsaved from ˙indignation through Him.

10 For if, being enemies, we are conciliated to ˙God through the death of His ˙Son, much rather, ¯being conciliated, we shall be lsaved in His ˙life. 11 Yet not only so, but we are glorying° also in ˙God, through our ˙Lord, Jesus Christ, through Whom we now obtain the conciliation.

12 Therefore, even as through one human ˙sin enters into the world, and through ˙sin ˙death, and thus ˙death passes through into all =mankind, on which all sin— 13 for until law sin was in the world, yet sin is not being taken into account° when there lis no law; 14 *bt*nevertheless ˙death reigns from Adam unto Moses *on*over ˙those also who do not sin *on*in the likeness of the transgression of Adam, who is a type of Him ˙Who is labout to be.

15 But not as the offense, thus also the grace. For if, by the offense of the one, the many die, much rather the grace of ˙God and the gratuity in grace, ˙which is of the One Human, Jesus Christ, *io*to the many superabounds.

16 And not as through one act of ¯sinning is the gratuity. For indeed the judgment is out of one into condemnation, yet the grace is out of many offenses into a righteous outcome. 17 For if, by the offense of the one, ˙death reigns through the one, much rather, ˙those obtaining the superabundance of ˙grace and the gratuity of ˙righteousness shall be reigning in life through the One, Jesus Christ.

18 Consequently then, as it is through one offense *io*for all =mankind *io*for condemnation, thus also it is through one righteous response◊ *io*for all =mankind *io*for life's justifying. 19 For even as through the disobedience of the one human the many are constituted sinners, thus also through the obedience of the One the many shall be lconstituted righteous.

20 Yet law comes in by the way, that the offense should increase. Yet where ˙sin increases, ˙grace superexceeds, 21 that, even as ˙Sin reigns in ˙death, thus ˙Grace also should reign through righteousness *io*for life eonian through Jesus Christ, our ˙Lord.

6 *a*What then shall we ldeclare? That we may be persisting in ˙sin that ˙grace should increase?

2 May it not *b*come° to that! We whoa* die to ˙sin, how shall we still be living in it? 3 Or are you lignorant that we, whoever are baptized into Christ Jesus, are baptized into His ˙death? [4] We then are entombed together with Him through ˙baptism into ˙death, that, even as Christ is roused *o*__from__ among the dead through the glory of the Father, thus we´ also should walk in newness of life. [5] For if we have become planted together in the likeness of His ˙death, *bt*__nevertheless we shall be of the resurrection also,__ [6] knowing this, that our old ˙humanity is crucified together with Him, that the body of ˙Sin may be nullified, for us by no means ˙to be still slaving for ˙Sin, [7] for one ˙who dies has been justified˚ from ˙Sin.

[8] Now if we die together with Christ, we ˡbelieve that we shall be living together with Him also, [9] having perceived that Christ, ¯being roused *o*__from__ among the dead, is no^{t} longer dying. Death is lording it over Him no^{t} longer, [10] for in *w*__that He dies, He dies to ˙Sin once for all__ time, yet in *w*__that He is living, He is living to ˙God.__ [11] Thus you also be reckoning˚ yourselves to be dead indeed to ˙Sin, yet living to ˙God in Christ Jesus, our ˙Lord.

[12] Let not ˙Sin then be reigning in your mortal ˙body, *io*__for__ you ˙to be obeying its ˙lusts. [13] Nor yet be presenting your ˙members as implements of unrighteousness to ˙Sin, but present yourselves to ˙God as if ˡalive *o*__from__ among the dead, and your ˙members as implements of righteousness to ˙God. [14] For Sin shall not be lording it over you, for you are not under law, but under grace.

[15] *a*__What then? Should we sin,__ seeing that we are not under law, but under grace?

May it not *b*__come˚__ to that! [16] Are you not ˚aware that to whom you are presenting yourselves as slaves *io*__for obedience,__ his slaves you are, whom you are obeying, whether of Sin *io*__for death, or of Obedience__ *io*__for righteousness?__ [17] Now thanks be to ˙God that you were slaves of ˙Sin, yet you obey *o*__from__ the heart the type of teaching *io*__to which you are given over.__ [18] Now ¯being freed from ˙Sin, you are enslaved to ˙Righteousness.

[19] As a human am I saying this because of the infirmity of your ˙flesh. For even as you present your ˙members as slaves to ˙Uncleanness and to ˙Lawlessness *io*__for ˙lawlessness, thus now present your ˙members__ as slaves to ˙Righteousness *io*__for holiness.__ [20] For when you were slaves of ˙Sin you were free as to ˙Righteousness. [21] *a*__What fruit, then, had you then?—__*on*__of which you are now ˡashamed˚, for indeed the consummation of those__ things is death. [22] Yet now, ¯being freed from ˙Sin, yet ¯being enslaved to ˙God, you ˡhave your ˙fruit *io*__for holiness. Now the consummation__ is life eonian. [23] For the ¯ration of ˙Sin is death, yet the gracious gift of ˙God is life eonian in Christ Jesus, our ˙Lord.

7 Or are you ˡignorant, brethren (for I am speaking to those who ˡknow law), that the law is lording it over a ˙human *on*__for as much time as he is living?__

[2] For a ˙woman in wedlock is ˚bound˚ to a living ˙man by law. Yet if the man should die, she is ˚exempt˚ from the law of the man. [3] Consequently then, while the man is living, she will be ˡstyled an adulteress if she should become˚ *d*__another man's,__ yet if the man should die, she is free from the law, ˙being no adulteress on ¯becoming˚ *d*__another man's.__

[4] So that, my brethren, you´ also are put to death to the law through the body of ˙Christ, *io*__for you ˙to become˚__ *d*__An__other's, ˙Who is roused *o*__from__ among the dead, that we should bear fruit to ˙God. [5] For when we were in the flesh, the passions of ˙sins, ˙which were through the law, operated˚ in our ˙members io ˙to bear fruit to ˙Death. [6] Yet now we are exempted from the law, ¯dying in that in which we were retained˚, so that it is for us to be slaving in newness of spirit and not in oldness of letter.

[7] *a*__What then shall we ˡdeclare?__ That the law is sin?

May it not *b*__come˚__ to that! But ˙sin I know not except through law. For besides, I had not been aware of ˙coveting except the law said, You shall not be coveting. [8] Now

˙Sin, ¯getting an incentive through the precept, produces° in me *e*__all__ manner of coveting. For apart from law Sin is dead. 9 Now I´ lived apart from law once, yet at the ¯coming of the precept ˙Sin revives. Yet I´ die, 10 and it is found that, to me the precept *io*__for life, this__ is *io*__for death.__ 11 For ˙Sin, ¯getting an incentive through the precept, deludes me, and through it, kills me. 12 So that the law indeed is holy, and the precept holy and righteous and good.

13 Does ˙good, then, become° death to me? May it not
*b*__come°__ to that! But ˙Sin, that it may appear Sin, is producing° death to me through ˙good, that ˙Sin may become° an ac inordinate sinner through the precept. 14 For we are °aware that the law is spiritual, yet I´ am fleshly, having been disposed° of under ˙Sin. 15 For what I am effecting° I ˡknow not, for not what I ˡwill, this I am putting into practice, but what I am hating, this I am doing. 16 Now if what I am not willing, this I am doing, I am conceding that the law is ideal. 17 Yet now it is not* longer I´ who am effecting° it, but ˙Sin making its home i in me.

18 For I am °aware that good is not making its home in me (that is, in my ˙flesh), for ˙to ˡwill is lying° beside me, yet ˙to be effecting° the ideal is not. 19 For it is not the good *w*__that I ˡwill__ that I am doing, but the evil *w*__that I am not am not willing, this I´ am doing, it is not* longer I´ who am effecting° it, but ˙Sin which is making its home in me.

21 Consequently I am finding the law that, at my ˙willing to be doing the ideal, the evil is lying° beside me. 22 For
I am ˡgratified° with the law of ˙God *ac*__as__ to the human

Jesus Christ, our ˙Lord. Consequently then, I´ *s*__my__self, with the mind indeed am slaving for God's law, yet with the flesh for Sin's law.

8 Nothing consequently is now condemnation to ˙those in Christ Jesus.◊ 2 For the spirit's ˙law of ˙life in Christ Jesus frees you from the law of ˙sin and ˙death. 3 For ˙what is impossible to the law, in which it was infirm through the flesh, does ˙God, ¯sending His *sf*__own ˙Son in__ the likeness of sin's flesh and concerning sin, He condemns ˙sin in the flesh, 4 that the righteous intent of the law may be fulfilled in us, ˙who are not walking in accord with flesh, but in accord with spirit.

5 For ˙those who ˡare in accord with flesh are ˡdisposed to ˙that which is of the flesh, yet ˙those who are in accord with spirit to ˙that which is of the spirit. 6 For the disposition of the flesh is death, yet the disposition of the spirit is life and peace, 7 because the disposition of the flesh is enmity *io*__to God, for it is not ˡsubject° to the law of ˙God,__ for neither is it ˡable°. 8 Now ˙those who ˡare in flesh are not ˡable° to please God.

9 Yet you´ are not in flesh, but in spirit, if so be that God's spirit is making its home in you. Now if anyone ˡhas not Christ's spirit, this one is not His. 10 Now if Christ is in you, the body indeed is dead because of sin, yet the spirit is life because of righteousness. 11 Now if the spirit of Him ˙Who rouses ˙Jesus *o*__from__ among the dead is making its home in you, He ˙Who rouses Christ Jesus *o*__from__ among the dead will also be vivifying your mortal ˙bodies because of His ˙spirit making its home i in you. 12 Consequently then, brethren, debtors are we, not to the flesh, ˙to be living in accord with flesh, 13 for if you are living in accord with flesh, you are ˡabout to be dying. Yet if, in spirit, you are putting the practices of the body to death, you will be living°. 14 For whoever are being led° by God's spirit, these are sons of God.

8:1 some manuscripts add; Not according to flesh are they walking; cf v.4.

15 For you do not get slavery's spirit *io*to fear again, but you get the spirit of sonship, in which we are crying, Abba, Father! 16 The spirit itself is testifying together with our spirit that we are children of God. 17 Yet if children, enjoyers also of an allotment, enjoyers indeed of an allotment from God, yet joint enjoyers of Christ's allotment, if so be that we are suffering together, that we should be glorified together also.

18 For I am reckoning° that the sufferings of the current era do not deserve td the glory labout to be revealed *io*for us. 19 For the premonition of the creation is awaiting° the unveiling of the sons of God. 20 For to vanity is the creation subjected, not voluntarily, but because of Him Who subjects it, *on*in expectation 21 that the creation itself also shall be lfreed from the slavery of corruption into the glorious freedom of the children of God. 22 For we are °aware that the entire creation is groaning together and travailing together until now. 23 Yet not only so, but we sourselves also who lhave the firstfruit of the spirit, we´ sourselves also are groaning in ourselves, awaiting° the sonship, the deliverance of our body. 24 For to expectation are we saved. 26 Now similarly, the spirit also is aiding° our infirmity, for *a*what we should pray° for, to accord with what lmust be, we are not °aware, but the spirit itself is pleading fors us with inarticulate groanings. 27 Now He Who is searching the hearts is °aware *a*what is the disposition of the spirit, *t*for in accord with God is it pleading fors the saints.

28 Now we are °aware that, to those who are loving God, God is working all together *io*for good, to those who lare called according to the purpose 29 that whom He foreknows He designates beforehand also to be conformed to the image of His Son, *io*for Him to be Firstborn among 31 *a*What then shall we ldeclare tod* these things? If God is fors us, *a*who is against us? 32 Surely He Who spares° not His own Son, but gives Him up fors us all, how shall He not, together with Him, also be graciously° granting us all?

37 *bt*Nay! in all these we are more than conquering through Him Who loves us.

38 For I am °persuaded° that neither death nor life, nor messengers, nor sovereignties, nor the °present, nor what is impending, nor powers, 39 nor height, nor depth, nor any *d*other creation, will be lable° to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus, our Lord.

And their ˙backs bow together continually.Ps 69:22,23*

11 I am saying then, Do they not trip that they should fall? May it not *bcome˚ to that! But in their ˙offense is ˙sal- vation to the nations io ˙to provoke them to jealousy.
12 Now if their ˙offense is the world's riches and their ˙dis- comfiture the nations' riches, how much rather ˙that which fills them! 13 Now to you am I saying, to the nations, *onin as much as indeed then I´ am the apostle of the nations,
I am glorifying my ˙dispensation, 14 if somehow I should provoke those of my ˙flesh to jealousy and should save *asome o of them. 15 For if their ˙casting away is the con- ciliation of the world, *awhat will the taking back be if not life *ofrom among the dead?

16 Now if the firstfruit is holy the kneading is also; and if the root is holy the boughs are also. 17 Now if *asome of the boughs are broken out, yet you´, being a wild olive, are grafted among them and become˚ joint participant of the root and ˙fatness of the olive, 18 be not vaunting˚ over the boughs. Yet if you are vaunting˚ you´ are not bearing the root, but the root you.
19 You will be declaring then: Boughs are broken out that I´ may be grafted in. 20 Ideally! By ˙unbelief are they broken out, yet you´ ˚stand in ˙faith. Be not ˡhaughty, but ˡfear. 21 For if ˙God spares˚ not the ac natural boughs, nei- ther will He be sparing˚ you! 22 Perceive then the kindness and severity of ˙God! On ˙those indeed who are ¯falling, severity, yet on you, God's kindness, if you should be persisting in the kindness: else you´ also will be ˡhewn out. 23 Now *tthey also, if they should not be persisting in ˙unbelief, will be ˡgrafted in, for ˙God ˡis able to graft them in again. 24 For if you´ are hewn out o of an ˙olive wild *acby nature, and, beside nature, are grafted into a cultivated olive tree, how much rather shall these, ˙who are in accord with nature, be ˡgrafted into ˙their own olive tree!
25 For I am not willing for you to be ˡignorant of this ˙secret, brethren, lest you may be passing for prudent among yourselves, that callousness, *fin part, on ˙Israel has *bcome until w the complement of the nations may enter. 26 And thus *eall Israel shall be ˡsaved, according as it is ˚written˚,

Arriving out of Zion shall be the ˡRescuer.
He will be turning away irreverence from Jacob.
27 And this is b My ˙covenant with them

28 *acAs to the evangel indeed they are enemies because

29 For unregretted are the graces and the calling of ·God. 30 For even as you´ once are stubborn toward ·God, yet now are shown mercy at their ·stubbornness, 31 thus these also are now stubborn to this ·mercy of yours, that now they´ also may be shown mercy. 32 For ·God locks up ·all together io·in stubbornness that He should be mer-

33 O, the depth of the riches and the wisdom and the and untraceable His ·ways! 34 For a·who knows the mind of the Lord? or a·who becomes° His adviser? 35 or a·who gives to Him first, and it will be |repaid him? 36 seeing that out of Him and through Him and io·for Him is ·all: to Him be the glory io·for the eons! Amen!

12 I am entreating you then, brethren, th·by the pities of ·God, to present your ·bodies a sacrifice, living, holy, well

3 For I am saying, through the grace ·which is ¯being yet ·individually members of one another. 6 Now having graces excelling in accord with the grace ·which is ¯being

9 Let ·love be unfeigned. Abhorring ·that which is wicked, is °written°, Mine is vengeance! I´ will |repay! the Lord

13 Let every soul be |subject° to the |superior author-

·those which |are, |have been set° by God, 2 so that he ·who you should be doing ·evil, |fear°, for not feignedly is it ˙indignation, but also because of ˙conscience.

6 For therefore you are settling taxes also, for they are God's ministers, ˡperpetuated io˙for this self-same thing. 7 Render to all ˙their dues, to ˙whom ˙tax, ˙tax, to ˙whom ˙tribute, ˙tribute, to ˙whom ˙fear, ˙fear, to ˙whom ˙honor, ˙honor.

8 To no one ˡowe n˙anything except ˙to be loving one another, for he ˙who is loving d˙another has fulfilled law. 9 For ˙this: You shall not commit ˡadultery, you shall not ˡmurder, you shall not ˡsteal, you shall not ˡtestify falsely, you shall not ˡcovet; Ex 20:13-17; Dt 5:18-21 and if there is any d˙other precept, it is ˡsummed° up in this ˙saying, in ˙this: You shall ˡlove your ˙associate as yourself. Lv 19:18 10 ˙Love is not working° evil to an ˙associate. The complement then of law is ˙love.

11 This also do, being ˚aware of the era, that it is already the hour for us to be roused out of sleep, for now is our ˙salvation nearer than when we believe. 12 The night progresses, yet the day is ˚near. We then should put° off the acts of ˙darkness, yet should put° on the implements of ˙light. 13 As in the day, respectably, should we walk, not in revelries and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and jealousy, 14 but put° on the Lord Jesus Christ, and be making° no provision io˙for the lusts of the flesh.

14 Now the ˡinfirm in the faith be taking° to yourselves, but not io˙for discrimination of reasonings. 2 w˙One indeed is believing to eat all things, yet the ˡinfirm one is eating greens. 3 Let not him ˙who is eating be scorning him ˙who is not eating. Yet let not him ˙who is not eating be judging him ˙who is eating, for ˙God takes° him to Himself. 4 a˙Who are you´ ˙who are judging Another's domestic? To his ˙own Master he is standing or falling. Now he will be made to ˡstand, for the Lord is ˡable° to make him stand.

5 w˙One indeed is deciding for one day rather b˙than another day, yet w˙one is deciding for every day. Let each one be fully ˡassured° in his ˙own mind. 6 He ˙who is ˡdisposed to the day is ˡdisposed to it to the Lord; and he ˙who is eating is eating to the Lord, for he is thanking ˙God. And he ˙who is not eating, to the Lord is not eating, and is thanking ˙God. 7 For not one of us is living to himself, and not one is dying to himself. 8 For bs˙both, if we should be living, to the Lord are we living, bs˙and if we should be dying, to the Lord are we dying. Then bs˙both if we should be living bs˙and if we should be dying we are the Lord's. 9 For io˙for this Christ dies and lives, that He should be ¯˙Lord of the dead as well as of the living.

10 Now a˙why are you´ judging your ˙brother? Or a˙why are you´ also scorning your ˙brother? For all of us shall be ˡpresented° at the dais of ˙God, 11 for it is ˚˙written°:

> Living am I´, the Lord is saying,
> t˙For to Me shall ˡbow every knee,
> And every tongue shall be acclaiming° ˙God! Is 45:23

12 Consequently then, each of us shall be giving account concerning himself to ˙God. 13 By no means then should we still be judging one another, but rather decide this, not ˙to ˡplace a stumbling block for a ˙brother, or a snare.

14 I have perceived and am ˚persuaded° in the Lord Jesus that nothing is contaminating th˙of itself, except that the one reckoning° anything to be contaminating, to that one it is contaminating. 15 For if because of food your ˙brother is sorrowing°, you are not t longer walking according to love. Do not, by your ˙food, ˡdestroy that one for whose sake Christ dies. 16 Let not then your ˙good be ˡcalumniated°, 17 for the kingdom of ˙God is not food and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in holy spirit. 18 For he ˙who in this is slaving for ˙Christ is well pleasing to ˙God and attested by ˙˭mankind.

19 Consequently then, we are pursuing ˙that which makes for ˙peace and ˙that which is for the edification of io ˙one another. 20 Not on account of food [l]demolish the work of ·God. All indeed is clean, but it is evil to the human ·who [th]with stumbling is eating. 21 It is ideal not ·to eat =meat, nor yet to drink wine, nor yet to do aught [i]by which your ·brother is stumbling, or is being snared° or weakened.

22 The faith which you´ [l]have, have [ac]for yourself in ·God's sight. Happy is he ·who is not judging himself in that which he is attesting. 23 Now he ·who is doubting° if he should eat is °condemned°, seeing that it is not out of faith. Now everything which is not out of faith is sin.

15 Now we´, the able, [l]ought to be bearing the infirmities of the impotent, and not to be pleasing ourselves. 2 Let each of us [l]please his ·associate [io]for his ·good, toward his edification. 3 For ·Christ also pleases not Himself, but according as it is °written°, The reproaches of ·those reproaching You fall [on] on Me.[Ps 69:9] 4 For whatever is written before is written [io]for ·this teaching of ours, that through the endurance and [th] the consolation of the scriptures we may [l]have ·expectation.

5 Now may the God of ·endurance and ·consolation grant you ·to be [s]mutually [l]disposed to [i] one another, according to Christ Jesus, 6 that with one accord, [i]with one mouth, you may be glorifying the God and Father of our ·Lord Jesus Christ. 7 Wherefore be taking° one another to yourselves according as ·Christ also takes° you to Himself, [io]for the glory of ·God.

8 For I am saying that Christ has become° the Servant of the Circumcision for the sake of the truth of God, [io] ·to confirm the patriarchal ·promises. 9 Yet the nations are to glorify ·God for[s] His mercy, according as it is °written°,

> Therefore I shall be acclaiming° You among the nations,
> And to Your ·Name shall I be playing music.[Ps 18:49]

10 And again he is saying,

> Be merry, nations, with His ·people![Dt 32:43]

11 And again he is saying,

> [l]Praise the Lord, all the nations,
> And let them laud Him, all the peoples.[Ps 117:1]

12 And again Isaiah is saying,

> There will be the Root of ·Jesse,
> And He ·Who is rising° to be [l]Chief of the nations:
> On Him will the nations [l]rely.[Is 11:10]

13 Now may the God of ·expectation fill you with [e]all joy and peace in ·believing, [io]for you ·to be superabounding in ·expectation, in the power of holy spirit.

14 Now I´ [s]myself also am °persuaded° concerning you, my brethren, that you [s]yourselves also are bulging with goodness, °filled° with [en]all ·knowledge, [l]able° also to be admonishing one another. 15 Yet more daringly do I write to you, [f]in part, as prompting you, because of the grace ·which is ⁻being given to me from ·God, 16 [io]for me ·to be the minister of Christ Jesus [io]for the nations, acting as a priest of the evangel of ·God, that the approach present of the nations may become° well received, having been hallowed° [i]by holy spirit.

17 I [l]have then a ·boast in Christ Jesus, in ·that which is toward ·God. 18 For I am not daring to [l]speak any of what Christ does not effect° through me [io]for the obedience of the nations, in word and work, 19 in the power of signs and miracles, in the power of God's spirit, so that from Jerusalem and around unto ·Illyricum I have completed the evangel of the Christ. 20 Yet thus I am [l]ambitious° to be bringing the evangel° where[e] Christ is not named lest I may be building on another's foundation, 21 but according as it is °written°,

> They to whom it was not ⁻informed concerning

Him, they shall ˡsee°,
And they who have not heard,
they shall ˡunderstand. Is 52:15

22 Wherefore I was ˙much hindered° also ˙to come to[d] you. 23 Yet now having by no means still place in these ˙regions, yet having [f]for many years a longing ˙to come to[d] you, 24 as ever I may be going° into ˙Spain (for I am expecting, while going° through, to gaze° upon you, and by you to be sent forward there, if I should ever first be filled [f]in part by you)—25 yet now I am going° [io]to Jerusalem, dispensing to the saints. 26 For it delights Macedonia and Achaia to make° [a]some contribution [io]for the poor of the saints ˙who are in Jerusalem. 27 For they are delighted, and they are their debtors, for if the nations participate in their ˙spiritual things they ˡought to minister to them in ˙fleshly things also. 28 When then, ¯performing this, and ¯sealing° to them this ˙fruit, I shall be coming° away through you into Spain. 29 Now I am ˚aware that, in coming° to[d] you, I shall be coming° [i]with the blessing of Christ which fills.

This revision of the Concordant Version of Habakkuk 2:3,4 is based on the Septuagint Version as reflected in Acts 7:52 ("the coming of the Righteous One") and Hebrews 10:37,38 ("For still how very little, He Who is coming will be arriving and not delaying. Now My Righteous One by faith shall be living, and: If He should ever be shrinking, My soul is not delighting in Him").

NOTES ON ROMANS

1:1 As a slave of Christ Jesus and a called apostle, Paul presents God's evangel, for which he was severed from the former apostles (Acts 13:2) and from his fleshly relationship to Israel (Gal.1:15).

Paul dates his apostleship from the commission he received at Antioch when he was severed from the rest to preach the evangel of God to the nations. Hitherto only Jews and proselytes like Cornelius heard the evangel. Now Paul is called to preach justification to the other nations. This evangel was promised before. AEK

God's evangel is that message from God concerning His Son which is the vehicle of God's power for salvation, and in which God's righteousness is revealed (Rom.1:3,16,17).

To the Corinthians Paul worded this evangel as he had brought it to them and as they had accepted it, as follows: "Christ dies for our sins in accord with the scriptures, and . . . He was entombed, and . . . He has been roused the third day in accord with the scriptures" (1 Cor.15:1,3,4).

1:3,4 God's evangel is concerning His Son, not concerning us or what we must do. It concerns Jesus Christ, our Lord, Who dies for our sakes and is roused from the dead (Rom.4:24,25; 5:8; 6:10; 8:3,32; 1 Cor.15:3,4).

With a view to future results of Christ's death and resurrection, Christ is identified as David's seed, according to the flesh, which speaks of His place as King (promised before, for example, in 2 Sam.7:12; Isa.9:6,7; cf Rom.11: 26,27; 15:12). Yet also, in accord with the evangel which is committed to Paul (2 Tim.2:8), this kingship will include Christ's celestial kingdom (2 Tim.4:18), and His rule until all enemies are subjected under His feet (1 Cor.15:25-28).

This glorious future will involve the resurrection of the dead (cf Rom.6:5,6 concerning believers; 1 Cor.15:20-22 concerning all) by which operation Christ is designated Son of God with power, bringing life out of death by the spirit of holiness (cf John 5:26; 11:25). This is displayed in a limited measure during His earthly ministry (cf Mark 5:35-42; Luke 7:11-16; John 11:41-44), foreshadowing what will culminate in God's own time in the vivification of all. The evangel is a message of life out of death.

1:16 God's evangel is the message of God's power for salvation. From the human standpoint, the word of the cross appears to be a word altogether of shame, of weakness and stupidity, but the message of the death and resurrection of God's Son not only announces God's achievement of righteousness, holiness and deliverance for sinners, but brings these blessings into the lives of believers (cf 1 Cor. 1:18-31), in accord with the firstfruit (or "earnest") of the spirit (cf Rom.8:23; 2 Cor.1:22; 5:5; Eph.1:13,14).

1:17 God does not save unless it can be a righteous operation and ultimately be realized and enjoyed as so. His power and His righteousness are equal partners with His love, so that salvation is necessarily justification ("righteous-ification"), and indeed, vindication.

God's righteousness is being revealed out of faith. It is made manifest through Jesus Christ's faith (Rom.3:21,22). This accords with the words of the prophet: "Yet the Righteous One, in His faith, He shall live" (Hab.2:4, CVOT, revised[1]). When the Righteous One came (cf Hab.2:3; Acts 7:52; Heb.10:37,38) He was obedient in faith unto the death of the cross (Phil.2:8; 3:9). In that Christ dies once and for all time, all die (Rom.6:10; 2 Cor.5:14). Furthermore, all will be vivified in Him, (1 Cor.15:22). Consequently, God is now displayed as the righteous Justifier ("Righteous-ifier") of the human by means of the faith of Jesus (Rom.3:26).

This righteous work of God is already in operation in spirit in the believer's life. It is into faith, that is, for the believer's faith. The citation of Habakkuk 2:4, thus has an application to us as well, for righteousness is reckoned to us "who are believing on Him Who rouses Jesus our Lord from among the dead, Who was given up because of our offenses, and was roused because of our justifying" (Rom.4:24,25). We who are believing live today in this faith, and we shall live in resurrection on the basis of Christ's faith (Rom.6:5).

1:18-3:20 This long section (corresponding to Romans 3:23) shows why God's evangel is so desperately needed, and thus so preeminently well. Here our attention is drawn to human irreverence and unrighteousness and the revelation of God's indignation. What is said about God's righteousness is related to His work of judgment. These sixty-four verses are in contrast to God's evangel concerning His Son, and make no reference to it or to Jesus Christ except in the brief parenthetical reference in 2:16.

2:16 With the mention of the hidden things of humanity (which makes any possibility of justification through God's righteous judgment wholly unlikely, indeed nil), Paul interrupts this long exposition of hopelessness to point ahead to his evangel which manifests God's righteousness through Jesus Christ, that is, through His faith. and announces justification through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus (cf Rom.3:21-24).

3:21,22 Justification as a manifestation of God's righteousness can come about only apart from law, and only through Jesus Christ's faith. A human is not being justified by works of law, but rather through the faith of Christ Jesus (Gal.2:16).

Christ alone of all mankind, not only did good and kept the law, but He believed God even when He smote Him for our sins. It is out of His faith for our faith (Rom.1:17). AEK

God's evangel is placed before us here in the words, Jesus Christ's faith. His perfect faith in giving Himself as a Correspondent Ransom for all (cf 1 Tim.2:6) is the message from God which we are believing. Our believing does not make it so, but rather, in believing what is so, we are blessed with joy and peace in expectation (cf Rom.8:24; 15:13).

3:23 Not one is righteous (3:10); no flesh at all shall be justified in God's sight by works of law (3:20), for all sin and are wanting of the glory of God. This is the truth concerning humanity. But it is set before us in contrast to the truth of God's evangel concerning Jesus Christ which is now proclaimed as gratuitous deliverance.

3:24 They hated Him without a cause—gratuitously (John 15:25). Such is the meaning of this precious word. Justification on any other ground than the free and unforced favor of God is impossible, for none deserve it. AEK

God's evangel is a message of God's grace, i.e., of JOY gratuitously given by God in the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus. It is not a covenant, or contract, between God and us, in which we place our faith in Christ so that God can do His part in delivering us from sin, but a gratuitous favor of God of justification already procured in the death and resurrection of Christ Jesus, which is put to our account when we believe. It is marked out "for all," for all are sinners, but it is even now placed "on all who are believing."

3:25 This message of grace centered in the faith of Jesus Christ is continued now as Paul speaks of Christ Jesus as the Antitype of the propitiatory, both the offering and the "mercy seat" (cf Lev.16:2-34), through [His] faith, and in His blood (cf Heb.2:17; 9:5,12,14.24).

It is essential to the manifestation and display of God's righteousness that the penalties of sins are not simply passed over, as occurred before under the law in the forbearance of God.

3:26 God's evangel points toward the display of His righteousness in the current era. How does it do so? God is displayed as righteous in His work of justification, by truly being the Justifier of the human (cp Rom.2:1,3; 3:28) out of Jesus' faith, that is, by means of His death for sinners (Rom.5:8,9).

3:27 Such a deliverance, entirely on the ground of grace, bars all boasting, unless it be in Christ and in His God Who has become our Justifier. AEK

3:28 Here also the faith by which justification for the human is secured is Jesus Christ's faith. Already it is reckoned to those who are believing.

4:3-5 reckoned into righteousness: Justification is achieved solely by means of Christ's faith unto the death of the cross, but (as with Abraham in uncircumcision) righteousness is reckoned to us, i.e. put to our account upon believing God's well-message concerning His Son.

4:13 the promise to Abraham, or to his Seed: The promise to Abraham of the allotment of the world was, in a true sense, a promise to Christ Who is the [singular] Seed of Abraham (cf Gal.3:16). There is no allotment from God which is not in its first and highest sense Christ's allotment (cf Rom.8:17; Eph.1:11,18-23).

As further developed in Galatians, the law was not given till hundreds of years after Abraham was counted righteous. The promises he received . . . were unconditional, dependent only on God's faithfulness. AEK

4:17 Abraham "faced" the promise and believed it of the God Who is vivifying the dead and calling what is not as if it were. This anticipates the evangel as a message concerning Jesus Christ's faith. As the promised Seed our Lord put His faith in God as the One Who vivifies the dead.

4:23-25 As for us, we also are believing on Him Who rouses Jesus our Lord from among the dead. We face the evangel which speaks not only of past achievements at the cross but of future glories which "are not" experienced at present, and, in God's grace, we believe it. Furthermore, having perceived that Christ, being roused from among the dead, is no longer dying, and in that He is living, He is living to God, we also are reckoning ourselves to be dead indeed to Sin, yet living to God in Christ Jesus, our Lord (Rom.6:9-11).
5:1,2 We stand before God, being justified out of faith, that is, the source of justification reckoned to us who are believing and of our position before God is Jesus Christ's faith.

Justification is the ground of peace. Sin no longer bars us from the presence of God. Yet peace is a favor infinitely beyond justification. God's affections are not satisfied with clearing us from all guilt. He craves our love and our adoration. Righteousness alone does not give us a passport into His presence, but this further grace of reconciliation urges us into full and affectionate fellowship with Him. AEK
5:6-11 Here is God's evangel concerning His Son, in which His righteousness is revealed. Here is the faith of Jesus Christ which is for our faith—for our believing.

God's way of winning our response is to pour His own love into us first, as exemplified in the death of Christ for us while we were most undeserving of His favor. The grace of it lies in the entire lack of anything in us to draw out His affections toward us. AEK

It is in view of the fact that we are infirm, and live in accord with the era, and are irreverent, and are sinners, and are enemies, that Christ dies over us ("for our sakes"). Even as God's spirit vibrated over the earth in its state of chaos and vacancy and darkness (Gen.1:2), so the death of God's Son encompasses corrupted humanity under its continuing, powerful effects and brings forth justification and salvation and conciliation.

5:12-19 Death entered through sin at first, but now sin is transmitted through death. All sin because they are mortal. Christ brings life, which disposes of both death and sin. AEK

Here sin and death are traced to one human, Adam, so that we can know and appreciate God's evangel concerning His Son more clearly as a message of righteousness and life, through the One Human, Jesus Christ. With the help of verses 13 through 19 we can fill out the comparisons introduced here in verse 12:

Therefore, even as through one human sin enters into the world (even through his one offense, his one act of sinning, that is, the disobedience of the one human),—and through sin, death, and thus death passes through into all mankind (so that death reigns, and the many descendants of Adam die, which is to say that death reigns through the one),—on which all sin (even those also who do not sin in the likeness of the transgression of Adam), leading to the many offenses, the countless sins of mankind, bringing all into condemnation, even the many descendants of Adam being constituted sinners . . . .

Thus also the grace, which is of the One Human, Jesus Christ, even through the obedience of the One, that is, through His one righteous response (Christ's righteous response to His Father's will, in contrast to Adam's offensive response to Yahweh's instructions) there will be a righteous outcome and a reigning in life for those obtaining the superabundance of grace and the gratuity of righteousness, and ultimately for all mankind there will be the enjoyment of life's justifying, and all the many descendants of Adam, shall be constituted righteous.

5:18 The parallel here is perfect. Adam's one offense is counteracted by Christ's one righteous [act]. The act of Adam actually affects all mankind. So Christ's work, eventually, must also actually justify all mankind. This cannot be during the eons, hence will not be fully accomplished until . . . all are made alive in Christ (1 Cor.15:22). If Adam's offense only gave each one an opportunity to sin, so that some become sinners and others not, then we might say that Christ's work brings justification to all subject to their acceptance. But we must acknowledge that man has no choice in becoming a sinner, thus also, will it be through the work of Christ. Both are actual and universal. AEK

5:20 where the sin increases, the grace superexceeds. That which comes through the One Human, Jesus Christ superexceeds over that which comes through Adam. This is essential to the manifestation of God's righteousness.

6:1-17 The question of Romans 6:1 arises where the evangel of God's grace is not being retained in mind and heart, that is, not being reckoned ("taken account of"), as Paul urges in Romans 6:11, and being obeyed ("submissively listened to") from the heart as he reminds us in 6:17.

As we did not die, but Christ was crucified for us, we may reckon His death as ours, fully finishing our connection with sin . . . . A realization of our death to sin and life in Christ will give us power to cope with sin, always remembering that sin cannot bring us into disfavor because of the superexceeding grace. AEK

7:1 The apostle now addresses particularly those who have been under law, that is, who were of the Circumcision. His appeal, however, is not to the law itself, but to the nature of all law, that it has jurisdiction only over those who are alive. AEK

7:7-23 Sin is not known in its true character except through law. Instead of sin being ignorant inability, it becomes the opposite. It is active hostility. The law which seemed to be given to regulate, only roused it. AEK

7:24,25 What is the answer to this wretched man's cry? It is grace. There is no other deliverance possible. This brings us back to where this digression began, the reign of Grace at the end of the fifth chapter. AEK

It is likely that the word Grace! (Greek, charis) dropped out early in the copying of Paul's letter because of its similarity to the following expression of thanksgiving. This conjecture is supported by the context and by differences in the readings of the oldest extant manuscripts.

In place of Paul's wretchedness due to the law of sin in his members warring with the law of his mind (7:23), Paul is now thanking God, through Jesus Christ for His grace, which he calls God's law. This law is one of giving what was most precious and beloved to Him to bring those most offensive and irreverent toward Him to Himself in love, this being the only way in which they could be delivered righteously. Thus, in enslaving his mind to God's way of dealing with sin, by the giving of His Son, Paul is being transformed (cp Rom.12:2; Eph.4:23), despite the fact that Sin's law still operated in his flesh.

8:1-4 God's grace, through Jesus Christ, that is, God's law means that nothing is now condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus. For the spirit's law, that law of God's spirit by which, in spirit, we are given life in Christ Jesus (cf Rom.6:11), frees us (in our position before God, cf Rom.5:2) from the law of sin and death.

God's evangel concerning His Son is a message of power for salvation in our lives, informing us of future deliverance in Christ Jesus and rescue and freedom from the old humanity, which we already are given in spirit. As with Paul, it is our joy and strength to enslave our minds to this "well-message," which the apostle now rehearses in language bursting with joyful significance:

What is impossible to the law, in which it was infirm through the flesh, does God.

What God does is carrying out His law in sending His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh.

This sending of His Son in the likeness of sin's flesh was concerning sin (cf Lev.16:5; Heb.10:6,8; 13:11), that is, in this form (cf Phil.2:7,8), Christ was made to be the Antitype of the sin offerings (cf 2 Cor.5:21).

By this most holy operation of God's law, He condemns sin which has so severely corrupted us and our lives by its residence in the flesh.

The result finally will be that the righteous intent of the law may be [because it is based on God's sending of His own Son the "may be" becomes "shall be"] fulfilled in us. This is our expectation, vibrating with spiritual power on our walk, that it might be increasingly in accord with the spirit of God as exhibited and settled in the evangel.

8:9-17 God's spirit, which is a spirit of life, seen in His rousing of Christ Jesus from among the dead, and Christ's spirit, which in every way is a spirit of sonship, are homing in us who are believing God's evangel concerning His Son, taking it into account and listening to it with submissive attention.

8:18-21 The sufferings of the current era cannot come up to the measure of the glory about to be revealed for us. God has subjected the creation to vanity, but He has done so in expectation of its deliverance into the glorious freedom of the children of God.

8:22,26,28 We who are believing are aware of the creation's groaning and travailing, as well as our own groaning, yet we are not aware exactly what we should pray for, to accord with what must be. Nevertheless, God is aware what is the disposition of the spirit in our hearts. Furthermore, it is given to us who are loving God to be aware that . . . God is working all together for good.

8:28 This awareness is strengthened as we give attention to such details of God's purpose as the facts that whom

He foreknows, He designates beforehand to be conformed to the image of His Son, and these He calls and justifies and glorifies.

8:31,32 Paul uses mostly aorist verbs here, verbs which give all their force to the actions as facts, so that we might enjoy in spirit what we cannot prove by what we see and experience in body and soul. God's evangel is that God is for us, and this is known in that He spares not His own Son, but gives Him up for us all. These facts are the basis of our present joy and peace.

9:1-3 my sorrow is great . . . for I myself wished to be anathema from Christ. Paul was in acute sympathy with his brethren according to the flesh, for he himself had been the most rabid of all in opposing the Christ he now adored. This is a most apt confession, as he is about to introduce the great doctrine of the divine Sovereignty, for he is the star example of God's sovereign grace. AEK.

9:13-18 Jacob I love, yet Esau I hate . . . to whom He is willing He is merciful, yet whom He is willing He is hardening. The usual deduction from this is that God is not just. In a man this would not be right, but it is God's sovereign privilege to display Himself through any of His creatures, in any way best suited to the purpose. Love needed a Jacob for its display. Power needed a Pharaoh for its foil. Man cannot turn the tide of God's affections in his favor, nor can he stem the torrent of His wrath. In God's great purpose to eventually bless all mankind it is His prerogative to form and use suitable vessels to convey His mercy. Of such was Jacob. Esau was needed to emphasize Jacob's unworthiness. Pharaoh was elevated by God, not that his name might be great, but that God's Name might be made known through all the earth. AEK.

9:19-24 The questioner persists in looking at God's sovereignty from the human standpoint of the individual, when it should be viewed from the divine national vantage. God has a large purpose which will eventuate in the blessing of all. But in the process of its fulfillment it demands the temporary use of some as foils to set forth His indignation and power, that He should also make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy. This chapter does not deal with the destiny of the individual. That has been settled. All mankind will be justified eventually (Rom.5:18). It is not difficult to see how God can justify Pharaoh, whom He hardened, lest his heart should soften and he should fail to oppose Him further. AEK.

10:1-13 Intense zeal, religious fervor, coupled with self-righteousness, does not lead to salvation. God demands subjection to His righteousness in Christ. The law should establish their unrighteousness and thus reveal God's righteousness, which is manifested in Christ. Israel, as a nation, will be saved when they see Him Whom they stabbed, and recognize Him as their Righteousness. AEK.

11:1-6 It would seem from the foregoing that God was through with His ancient and beloved people and was thrusting them away. But the apostle hastens to deny this assumption. God does not thrust away His people whom He foreknows. Their apostasy is only in part, and the term of it is temporary. That not all of Israel are thrust away is evident from his own case. He, of all Israelites, most deserved to be thrust from God's presence and blessing. Yet he is not included in the national defection. And he is not alone. Elijah thought that he was the only one in all Israel who did not bow the knee to Baal. But God, in His sovereign dealings, restrains seven thousand from worshiping the idol. Neither was Paul alone, for there was, as always, a remnant reserved by God. These, however, are not those who are more faithful than the rest, or more deserving than the mass of the nation. If it had not been for God's choice in grace, there never would have been a remnant.

11:17-24 It is a remarkable fact, generally unknown, that a very old olive tree, no longer capable of bearing, may be rejuvenated by a wild graft . . . . Israel is the old olive tree which becomes almost incapable of bearing the olives from which the light-giving oil was obtained. Some of the branches were broken out, and the nations were grafted in, and, through living contact with its root, becomes God's testimony in the earth. The light of God is now no longer with Israel, but with the nations. But all the light is derived from the Scriptures which came through Israel. Apart from the sacred scrolls, the nations shed no light. AEK

The apostle is dealing with Israel and the nations—not individuals. No individual believer will be broken out of the olive tree. The nations, however, as such, no longer believe, and are due to be cut out of the olive tree. AEK

11:26 Only a few, comparatively, are being saved among the nations, but when Israel again regains its proper place, all Israel shall be saved. Then the whole nation, from the least to the greatest, will know God. And they will become the light of the world, as they were always intended to be. AEK

11:32 God's purpose includes all nations. No matter what their present attitude toward Him, it is all a part of His plan and a preparation for the display of His mercy. Here we have the real reason why all, in turn, become stubborn. God Himself locks them up to it, not that He may condemn them, but that He may have occasion to manifest His mercy. AEK

12:1,2 Paul is not directing us by the righteous requirements of the law, but rather, he is entreating us by the pities of God. God's evangel concerning His Son, as a message of God's power for salvation, in which His righteousness is revealed, commending His love, gratuitously granting His grace and bestowing His mercy over all stubbornness, is summed up here by the words, "the pities of God." This is most appropriate for opening this final section of Romans concerned with the believers' personal lives and walk, for it speaks of the evangel as it reflects God's own personal feelings toward us and all His creation. That all is out of God and through Him and for Him should not suggest any sense of impassivity on His part. He feels all the sufferings of the current eon, for it is part of that which is out of Him. He knows Paul's sorrow and unintermittent pain of heart, as well our own groaning and travailing, and He feels it all continually from the depths of His being. Yet He does so "in expectation that the creation itself shall be freed from the slavery of corruption into the glorious freedom of the children of God" (Rom.8:18-21). The greatest expression of His pity is seen in the sending of His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh and concerning sin (Rom.8:3), in not sparing Him, but giving Him up for us all (Rom.8:32). It is through these expressions of God's true being that Paul now entreats us, drawing us to his side as his brethren.

12:6-21 Thus Paul entreats us that, having graces excelling, we should exercise them in accord with the analogy of the faith. This goes beyond prominent activities of service to everyday, humble living, where, having the graces of faith and expectation and love (cf 1 Cor.12:31; 13:13), we may walk in accord with the analogy of the faith, that is the pattern of love set by our Lord in the evangel.

13:1 Unlike Israel, we do not come into conflict with the rulers of the world. The setting up of the kingdom will involve the subjection of them all to the suzerainty of Christ. But we have no place in that earthly kingdom. While Israel is thrust aside we must recognize the existing authorities. God is not at variance with present governments. It is not a question of obeying God rather than man, as when Peter refused the orders of the Sanhedrin. We must not withstand regularly constituted magistrates, but depend on God to overrule their acts if they seem to conflict with our duty to God or our convictions of His truth. AEK.

13:8 The debtor is the servant of the lender. The servant of God should never be under obligation to another. Love alone is the great debt which never can be fully discharged. Law is useless where there is love, for every precept is more than met by the dictates of love. AEK

14:1 Fellowship among God's saints should not be based on knowledge or ignorance. God receives us even when we are feeble in faith. AEK

15:5-7 Paul prays that the God of endurance and consolation may grant us to be mutually disposed to one another. Such behavior accords with that of Christ Who takes us to Himself, for the glory of God. In this the evangel is being proclaimed by the believer's disposition.

16:25 The importance of this closing benediction is apparent from the fact that it was written by the apostle with his own hand after Tertius had finished the epistle. Paul characterizes the great themes of his epistle, my evangel, and the heralding of Christ Jesus in accord with the revelation of a secret hushed in times eonian (conciliation), in contrast with the evangel of God (1:1) which He promised before. The conciliation was not made known through the ancient prophets, but through prophetic writings, such as this epistle and 2 Corinthians. It is of principal importance that we see the point the apostle makes here, for otherwise we shall not appreciate the unique, distinctive character of the conciliation, which is first set forth in this epistle. The teaching of the fifth to the eighth chapters and especially the eleventh chapter is absolutely unknown in the prophets . . . . The conciliation was a secret they knew nothing of, for it makes Israel's defection the ground of worldwide, unbounded blessing to the nations until Israel is again in God's reckoning. AEK

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

PAUL'S TESTIMONY

With CHRIST,
Have I been crucified,
Yet I am living;
No longer I,
But living in ME
Is CHRIST.
Now that which I am living
In flesh,
In faith
I am living,
The [faith]
Of the SON OF GOD
WHO loves ME
And gives HIMSELF up for ME.

WE PRESENT herewith the current status of our revised CONCORDANT VERSION OF GALATIANS. Along with it are selected notes from Brother Coram's study on this epistle which appeared in volumes 82, 87 and 88 of Unsearchable Riches (occasionally updated), with a few added comments by A. E. Knoch (AEK) and myself (DHH).

The evangel of Christ undistorted! and those called in the grace of Christ undisturbed! That is what Paul has in view in his letter to the Galatians (cf Gal.1:7). Yet sadly, this message from God concerning His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord (cf Rom.1:1-5) is still being distorted and misunderstood even by the chosen.

This evangel is called "the evangel of Christ" in 1:7, which is that which calls us "in the grace of Christ" (1:6). This grace is Christ's giving of Himself for (over) our sins, so that He might extricate us out of the present wicked eon (1:4). Indeed the word "grace" by itself, or rather "the grace," as used in Galatians 5:4 is intended to recall the evangel of Christ, His giving up of Himself to death for our benefit. The Galatians fell out of the enjoyment of this most welcome message from God concerning His Son.

Yet another signifier of the evangel, much used in Galatians, but almost entirely covered up by tradition is the phrase "faith of Christ Jesus" in 2:15 (or "faith of Christ" in 2:15; "faith of the Son of God" in 2:20; and "faith of Jesus Christ" in 3:22). In these expressions we hear the evangel of Christ's faith as a matter of faithful obedience to the death of the cross (cf Phil.2:8), taking the pathway of His Father's will, rather than His own (Matt.26:39).

Regarding this way of wording the evangel, see especially Brother Coram's notes on Galatians 2:7 ("the evangel of the Uncircumcision") and 2:15 ("the faith of Christ"). Included there is a good discussion of the significance of the Greek genitive case and various ways in which it can be expressed in English. Wishing to bring the Greek meaning out as clearly as possible, and in a way in which it can hardly be misapplied, we are now using the so-called possessive case, in rendering these phrases in Galatians 2:15 and 3:22 ("Christ Jesus's faith," "Christ's faith," "Jesus Christ's faith"). We also use the full wording, "the faith" where it appears in the Greek so that the reader might more easily relate the thought to Christ's faith. And in 3:24 we have added the word "His" in lightface type to bring out the connection with the evangel of justification by Christ's faith previously presented.

That the reference is to Christ and His faith in 3:24 is made doubly certain when we follow the connection between what Paul says of the coming of the Seed in 3:19 and the coming of the faith in 3:23 and 3:25 as well as God's delegating of His Son when the full time comes, as the evangel is expressed in Galatians 4:3,4.

As for Galatians 2:20 (arranged as Brother Knoch suggested in his notes on Galatians for the first half of the verse, and carried further now on the second page of this magazine), there is no change in meaning when we replace the relative pronoun "that" with "the (faith)" as our translation of the Greek definite article ("the"), but it clarifies the point. As we continue to live in flesh, we, as believers, are living in the assurance of the evangel of the faith and faithfulness of the Son of God in dying for our sins. Here, as with Paul, is spiritual strength for our present lives as those who belong to "the family of the faith [of Christ]" (Gal.6:10). D.H.H.

PAUL TO THE GALATIANS

1 Paul, an apostle (not from human beings, neither through a human, but through Jesus Christ and of God, the Father, ˙Who rouses Him o˙from among the dead), [2] and all the brethren tg˙with me, to the ecclesias of ˙Galatia:

[3] Grace to you and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, [4] ˙Who gives Himself ov˙for our ˙sins, so that He might extricate° us out of the ˚present wicked ˙eon, according to the will of our ˙God and Father, [5] to Whom be ˙glory io˙for the eons of the eons. [6] I am marveling that thus swiftly you are being ˡtrans-ferred° from ˙that which calls you in the grace of Christ io˙to a different evangel, [7] which is not another, except it be that a˙some ˙who are disturbing you ˡwant also to distort the evangel of ˙Christ. [8] But if ever we also, or a messen-ger out of heaven, should be bringing an evangel° to you beside that which we ev˙bring° to you, let him be anath-ema! [9] As we have declared before, and at present I am saying again, if anyone is bringing you an evangel° beside that which you accept let him be anathema!

[10] For at present am I persuading as to human beings or ˙God?◊ Or am I seeking to ˡplease human beings? 1:10 persuading human beings or ˙God: Paul's persuading is manifest to God (2 Cor.5:11), not as pleasing human beings, but God (1 Th 2:4).

once, in ˙Judaism, that I [ac] inordinately persecuted the ecclesia of ˙God and ravaged it. 14 And I progressed in ˙Judaism above many contemporaries in my ˙race, being [l]inherently exceedingly more zealous for the traditions of my fathers. 15 Yet when it delights ˙God, ˙Who severs me [o]from my mother's womb and calls me through His ˙grace, 16 to unveil His ˙Son in me that I may be evangelizing° Him among the nations, I do not immediately submit° it to flesh and blood, 17 neither come I up [io]to Jerusalem to[d] those ˙who are apostles before me, but I come away into Arabia, and I return again [io]to Damascus.

2 Thereupon, [th]after the lapse of fourteen years, I again go up [io]to Jerusalem with Barnabas, ¯taking Titus also along with me. 2 [y]Now I go up in accord with a revelation, and submit° to them the evangel which I am heralding among the nations, yet privately to ˙those of [l]repute, lest somehow I should be racing or run [io]for naught. 3 But not [y]even Titus, ˙who is [tg]with me, being a Greek, is compelled to be circumcised. 4 Yet it is because of the false brethren who are smuggled in, who[a] come in by the way to spy out our ˙freedom which we [l]have in Christ Jesus, that they shall be enslaving us—5 to whom, not [y]even [td]for an hour do we simulate by ˙subjection, that the truth of the evangel should continue [tg]with you. 6 [y]Now from

3:2,5 hearing of faith: the Greek word akoê (hearing) refers to that whichis heard, i.e. tidings.
3:11 the Righteous One: cf Ac 7:52; Ro 1:17; Hb 10:37,38; it is not in law, that one is justified but by the faith of the Righteous One, Christ Jesus (2:16; 3:22), Who became a curse for our sakes (3:13).

3:14,23,26 the faith: Here also "the faith" refers first of all to Jesus Christ's faith (3:22) in giving Himself for our sins (1:4).

25 *y*Now at the ¯coming of the faith, we are no*t* longer under an escort, 26 for you are all sons of God in Christ Jesus through the faith. 27 For you, whoever are baptized into Christ, put° on Christ, 28 in Whom there is no*t* Jew nor yet Greek, there is no*t* slave nor yet free, there is no*t* male and female, for you´ all are one in Christ Jesus. 29 *y*Now if you are Christ's, consequently you are of ˙Abraham's seed, enjoyers of the allotment according to the promise.
4 *y*Now I am saying, *on*for as much time as the enjoyer of an allotment is a minor, in nothing is he of more ˡconsequence than a slave, being master of all, 2 but is under guardians and administrators until the time purposed by the father. 3 Thus we´ also, when we were minors, were °enslaved° under the elements of the world. 4 Yet when the full ˙time comes, ˙God delegates His ˙Son, *b*come° o of a woman, *b*come° under law, 5 that He should reclaim ˙those under law, that we may get the place of a son. 6 *y*Now seeing that you are sons, ˙God delegates the spirit of His ˙Son into our ˙hearts, crying Abba! ˙Father! 7 So that you are no*t* longer a slave, but a son. *y*Now if a son, an enjoyer also of an allotment from God, through Christ.

8 But then indeed having no*t* perception of God, you are ¯slaves of ˙those who, by nature, ˡare not gods. 9 Yet now, ¯knowing God, yet rather ¯being known by God, how are you turning about again *on*to the infirm and poor elements for which you ˡwant to slave again anew? 10 Days are you scrutinizing, and months and seasons and years. 11 I ˡfear° for you, lest somehow I have toiled *io*for you feignedly.

12 ˡBecome° as I, *t*for I am ⁺even as you, brethren, I ˡbeseech° you. In nothing do you injure me. 13 *y*Now you are °aware that *th*during an infirmity of the flesh I bring the evangel° to you ˙formerly. 14 And your ˙trial, in my ˙flesh, you do not scorn, neither do you loathe it, but as a messenger of God you receive° me, as Christ Jesus.
15 Where then is your ˙happiness? For I am testifying to you, that if possible, ¯gouging out your ˙eyes, you would give them to me. 16 So that I have become your enemy by being true to you!

17 They are ˡjealous over you, not ideally, but they ˡwant to debar you that you may be ˡjealous over them. 18 *y*Now it is ideal for you to be ˡjealous° in the ideal always, and not only in my ˙ˡpresence *td*with you.

19 Little children mine, with whom I am travailing again until w Christ may be formed in you! 20 Yet I wanted to be ˡpresent *td*with you just now, and to change my ˙voice,
*t*for I am ˡperplexed° *i*about you.

21 ˡTell me, ˙you who ˡwant to be under law, are you not hearing the law? 22 For it is °written° that Abraham has two sons, one out of the maid and one out of the free woman. 23 But the one indeed out of the maid is °begotten° according to flesh, yet the one out of the free woman through the promise: 24 which*a* is allegorizing°, for these women are two covenants; one indeed from Mount Sinai, generating into slavery, which*a* is Hagar. 25 *y*Now Hagar is ˙Mount Sinai in ˙Arabia; y it is in ˡline with the Jerusalem which now is, for she is in ˡslavery with her ˙children.
26 Yet the Jerusalem above is free, who*a* is mother of us all. 27 For it is °written°,

> Be glad, barren one, ˙who are not bringing forth!
> Burst forth and implore, you ˙who are not travailing!
> *t*For many are the children of the desolate,
> Rather than of her ˙who ˡhas the husband.Isa 54:1

28 *y*Now you´, brethren, *ac*as Isaac, are children of promise. 29 But even as then, the one according to flesh persecuted the one according to spirit, thus also it is now. 30 But *a*what is the scripture saying? Cast out this ˙maid and her ˙son; for by no means shall the son of the maid be enjoying the allotment with the son of the free woman.Gn 21:10 31 Wherefore, brethren, we are not children of the maid, but of the free woman.

5 Into ·this ·freedom◇ Christ frees us! |Stand firm then, and be not again |enthralled° with the yoke of slavery.
2 p·Look! I´, Paul, am saying to you that if you should be circumcising°, Christ will |benefit you nothing. 3 y·Now I am attesting° again to every h·man who is circumcising°, that he is a debtor to do the whole law. 4 Exempted from ·Christ are you who[a] are being justified° in law. You fall out of ·grace. 5 For we´, in spirit, are awaiting° the expectation of righteousness o·by faith. 6 For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision is availing anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith, operating° through love.
7 You raced ideally! [a]·Who hinders you not to be |persuaded° by the truth? 8 ·This persuasion is not o·of Him ·Who is calling you. 9 A little leaven is leavening the whole kneading. 10 I´ have confidence io·in you in the Lord that in nothing you will be |disposed otherwise. y·Now he ·who is disturbing you shall be bearing his ·judgment, whosoever [a] he may be.
11 y·Now I, brethren, if I am still heralding circumcision, [a]·why am I still being persecuted°? Consequently the snare of the cross of ·Christ has been nullified°. 12 Would that ·those who are raising you to insurrection |struck° themselves off also!
13 For you´ are called on·for freedom, brethren, only use not the freedom io·for an incentive to the flesh, but through ·love be slaving for one another. 14 For the entire law is °fulfilled° in one word, in ·this: You shall |love your ·associate as yourself.[Lv 19:18] 15 y·Now if you are biting and devouring one another, |beware that you may not be consumed by one another.
16 y·Now I am saying, |Walk in spirit, and you should under no circumstances consummate the lust of the flesh. 17 For the flesh is lusting against the spirit, yet the spirit against the flesh. y·Now these are opposing° one another, lest you should be doing these whatsoever you may |want.

18 y·Now if you are |led° by spirit, you are not still under law.
19 y·Now apparent are the works of the flesh, which[a] are adultery, prostitution, uncleanness, wantonness, 20 idolatry, enchantment, enmities, strife, jealousies, furies, factions, dissensions, sects, 21 envies, murders, drunkennesses, revelries, and the like of these, which, I am predicting to you, according as I ¯predicted also, that ·those committing ·such things shall not be enjoying the allotment of the kingdom of God.
22 y·Now the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, 23 meekness, self-control: against ·such things there is no[t] law. 24 y·Now ·those of ·Christ Jesus crucify the flesh together with its ·passions, and ·lusts. 25 If we may be living in spirit, in spirit we may be observing the elements also. 26 We may not |become° vainglorious, challenging one another, envying one another.
6 Brethren, if a human should be precipitated also in [a]·some offense, ¯you´, ·who are spiritual, be attuning ·such a one in a spirit of meekness, noting yourself, that you´ also may not be tried. 2 |Bear one another's ·burdens, and thus fill up the law of ·Christ. 3 For if anyone is supposing himself to be anything, being nothing, he is imposing on himself. 4 y·Now let each one be testing his sf·own ·work, and then he shall be having his ·boast io·for himself alone and not io·for ·d·another, 5 for each one shall be bearing his ·own load.
6 y·Now let him ·who is being instructed° in the word be contributing to him ·who is instructing, in all good things. 7 Be not |deceived°, God is not to be |sneered° at, for whatsoever a human may be sowing, this shall he be reaping also, 8 t·for he ·who is sowing io·for his sf·own ·flesh, [a]·from the flesh shall be reaping corruption, yet he ·who

NOTES ON GALATIANS

1:1 Paul, an apostle. In this epistle to the Galatians, the characteristic words of thanksgiving or blessing, which introduce Paul's other epistles, are conspicuous by their absence. Instead of giving thanks, Paul "marvels" (1:6); instead of a word of blessing, he warns of anathema (1:8,9). Without any deference either to formality or pleasantry, Paul abruptly begins by insisting that his apostleship is "not from human beings, neither through a human," but that it is instead "through Jesus Christ and of God, the Father."

1:2 Grace to you and peace. Even if Paul must omit his usual introductory words of thanksgiving or blessing, that he might lose no time in pressing the urgency of his message upon the recipients of this epistle, he nevertheless does not omit his always-applicable (and, always-appropriate) words of greeting: "Grace to you and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ."

That which is in grace is not out of works, "else the grace is coming to be no longer grace" (Rom.11:6). While a wage is not reckoned as a favor (or gracious gift), but as a debt (Rom.4:4), that which is reckoned as a gracious gift is not reckoned as a debt. Consequently, when believers, such as the Galatians, "fall out of grace" (Gal.5:4b), they do so only in their apprehension of grace, and in an appreciation of it, with all the practical benefit that this entails.

1:4,5 extricate. Even as God "extricated" ("lifted out") Joseph out of all his afflictions" (Acts 7:10), and, later on, extricated the sons of Israel out of Egypt (Acts 7:34), thus also, Christ Jesus "gives Himself for our sins, so that He might extricate us out of the present wicked eon." In each case, the respective extrication is "according to [literally, "down"] the will of our God and Father, to Whom be [the] glory." The basis of the blessed deliverance is God's own decision so to act. What it "comes down to," then, is that Christ gives Himself for our sins, so that according to God's own will, such a glorious deliverance of us, out of this wicked eon (cp 1 Thess.4:15-17), should actually come to pass. It is not that Christ gives Himself for our sins so that such a deliverance might possibly come to pass, but then again might never come to pass at all. If God must wait on the human, and worse yet, depend on humanity, He can never act in grace, much less, can He glorify His own Name, alone, in our deliverance.

1:6 transferred. The Galatians were transferred from "that which" called them in the grace of Christ to a different evangel. "That which," in the Concordant Version, simply represents the Greek definite article ("the"). It is evident from what is said, however, that "the evangel" through which the Galatians were called into the grace of Christ brought by Paul, was that from which they were transferred to a different evangel. This is the central point: the message to which the Galatians had been transferred, which they deemed a message of good news, was nonetheless different than the evangel of the grace of Christ.

different. The Greek word, heteros, speaks of "essential difference," or difference in kind." Certainly grace is the essential characteristic of the evangel of Christ. Yet through his use of heteros, Paul thus insists that the spurious evangel by which the Galatians had become deceived, was, in its very essence, different than the evangel of Christ which Paul was heralding among the nations (2:2).

1:7 not another. Furthermore, it was "not another." That is, it was not actually the evangel of the Circumcision (cf 2:7), even if the Galatians were so ignorant of the true nature of that evangel as to identify the heterogenous corruption which they had embraced as the evangel of the Circumcision.

Here, for the English "another," the Greek is allos, from which "allotropic" is derived, which points to variation of form, to changes of properties shown by elements, without change of essential composition. Whatever the Galatians themselves might claim or imagine, Paul insists that their false gospel is essentially different from the evangel of the grace of Christ, and a gross caricature of the "other" evangel which was that of the Circumcision. According to truth, it is no evangel at all. Therefore, it should be rejected, not embraced.

1:8,9 let him be anathema. In the Septuagint (the ancient Greek translation of the Old Testament), anathema is the translation of the Hebrew cherem. It speaks of something that is "devoted," yet in the sense of, unto adversative judgment; hence, "devoted to destruction" (or "loss," e.g., Deut. 7:26; Joshua 7:1,11-13). When Paul, then, says of any who bring a false gospel, "let him be anathema!" the sense is, let him be subject to certain, adversative judgment. The word itself, however, tells us nothing of the particulars or duration of any such judgment. For this we must consider the nature of the case, in any specific pronouncement of anathema.

The "anathema" which Paul foresees in Galatians 1:8,9, consists of many grave consequences, but these do not include being subjected to "eternal condemnation" (for God will abolish death and become All in all, 1 Cor.15: 26,28); neither does it consist in the loss of eonian life for any such opposing teachers, who nevertheless are in Christ (for eonian life is a gracious gift, Rom.6:23), nor that such must come under God's indignation (for God has not appointed us to indignation, 1 Thess.5:9a; cp Rom.5:9). Finally, this anathema does not involve soulish suffering. There is much that is destructive, that nonetheless is not at all physically destructive. For example, untroubled resignation concerning, combined with an unbridled zeal to uphold, the teaching of a horrible hell where the vast majority of men must spend eternity, coupled with an ethic that can finally only thank oneself for one's exemption therefrom, is conducive neither to pity nor humility. Yet since most especially if they should enjoy a good measure of conventional well-being, are insensitive to the deep injuriousness of such attitudes and beliefs, they remain oblivious to the very real anathema to which their own apostasy has subjected them.

If people finally owe their enjoyment of divine blessing to themselves, it is impossible for them to thank God for it. Such cannot glorify God as God, and must to a considerable extent involve themselves in the veneration of the creature rather than the Creator. They cannot thank God alone even for their virtues, much less for their failures, which will yet bring glory to Him, for they imagine that they themselves are ultimately responsible for their deeds.

Anyone who is subject to such dreadful consequences as these, certainly has come under a great anathema, a tremendous course of destruction, to one's own loss. And, anyone who repudiates the grace of Christ for a different evangel—so long as he continues on in such a course—is indeed subject to just such consequences.

1:10 persuading. The reason why a certain adversative judgment must fall upon any who bring a different evangel to those whom God is actually blessing in accord with Paul's evangel is because in announcing his evangel, the apostle is not persuading "as to" human wants, but as to God, to Whom he is manifest (2 Cor.5:11; cp 1 Thess.2:4)). Paul's message, first of all, is God's message, and the apostle persuades human beings with God ever in view.

1:10-12 not seeking to please human beings. The reason why Paul was not seeking to please human beings, and was not still pleasing human beings, was because the evangel which he brought was not in accord with a human. And, in turn, the reason why his evangel was not in accord with a human, was because he neither accepted it from a human nor was he taught it by a human. The word "human" is in the singular, as in the phrase "through a human," in verse 1. The emphatic intimation here, through the repeated, singular form, is implicative of a particular human, likely Peter. But in a wider sense, neither is Paul's evangel in accord with a human, with respect to the entirety of the human race. The Hebrew term for human being is adm ("Adam"). The Circumcision evangel is very much concerned with the human race, not just Israel, and God's purpose for it is on the earth and in the flesh. So Paul has in mind to distinguish his evangel from that of the Circumcision (which is in accord with humanity). The apostle does not simply make a general contrast between a message from God that is divine in nature, and one concerned with ordinary human thinking and philosophy. But Paul's evangel is also different from that of the Circumcision which has much that accords with humanity, though indeed being of God and concerned with Christ.

the evangel, evangelized by me. While Paul is indeed relating "his story" in chapters 1 and 2, nevertheless his account focuses on "the grace of Christ" (1:6), "a revelation of Jesus Christ" (1:12), that is, "the evangel which is being brought by me" (1:11). So both Paul's story, and the message given to him, have this one pattern: not in accord with humanity, and being in accord with God and a revelation of Jesus Christ that came from God.

1:13,14 my behavior once, in Judaism. There was nothing in Paul's former career to account for his becoming a herald of the cross. Thus the apostle proves that it was simply absurd to suggest, as certain of his enemies were insinuating, that he had received his evangel from Peter.

1:15 Yet, when it delights God. The particle de, though sometimes rendered "now" (as previously done in the CV here), is perhaps better rendered here in its standard way by "yet." Though sometimes only slightly so, de is an adversative connective, in the sense that that which follows this expression and to which it refers stands against the subject which precedes it. Thus we understand that God's "delight" to unveil His Son in the foremost sinner (1 Tim.1:15,16), Saul of Tarsus, stood against Saul's Judaism, in which, in his unbelief, he had so ferociously persecuted the ecclesia.

mother's womb. Thus it becomes evident that "mother's womb," here, is not literal but figurative. Indeed, through the severing of the umbilical cord, all infants, when first born, are severed from their literal mother's womb. But Paul, in the considerations before us, was severed from Judaism. Judaism was that which had long been nourishing him, as well as being that in which he had enjoyed much growth. Hence, he speaks of it as having been his "mother's womb."

In being severed from Judaism, Paul was severed also from those of its practitioners who were believers in Christ (cp Acts 13:2), yet "severed for the [i.e., that] evangel of God . . . concerning His Son . . . Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom.1:1-4), which, in its most complete form, has been preserved for us in the epistle to the Romans. This evangel of God—which is also the evangel of Christ (Gal.1:7)—was revealed to Paul by Jesus Christ Himself. Hence, with reference to the one to whom Christ had revealed this evangel, Paul termed it "my evangel" (Rom.16:25).

1:16-24 I do not immediately submit. Paul had not received his evangel from those who were apostles before him, and was acting under a sense of a unique divine call that admitted of neither human validation nor supplement. Therefore, rather than seeking out one or more of the twelve for any reason whatsoever, Paul instead came away into Arabia, and returned again to Damascus.

"The natural course for one in Saul's case would be to go up to Jerusalem and submit to them what he had received from the Lord and seek their patronage and fellowship in its proclamation, or indeed, ask their opinion and permission to promulgate it. But what does he do? He goes into the desert where no human influence is at work. He waits three years before telling Peter about it, and then he does not even form the acquaintance of the twelve or of the ecclesia. They actually did not know him personally, though they were glorifying God for the great change in him. All of this shows conclusively that Paul did not at that time, derive his doctrine from Peter or the twelve." AEK

2:1,2 after fourteen years. Previously, Paul had "related" his story to Cephas (1:18). Now, he "submits" (2:2) the evangel which he was heralding among the nations to those in Jerusalem. In each case, he imparts something to the others; he does not learn from them. Initially, he had perceived that his evangel of grace apart from law was bound to be disturbing to many. Hence, he had prepared Cephas for this, before the crisis came. And now, fourteen years later, due to the ever-widening rift among many over issues of law-obedience, Paul goes up to Jerusalem to place his evangel before them.

2:3-6 false brethren. In Galatians 2:3, Paul refers to the time when "not even Titus, who is with me, being a Greek, is compelled to be circumcised." Yet Paul adds that nonetheless, "it was because of the false brethren who were smuggled in, who came in by the way to spy out our freedom which we have in Christ Jesus, that they shall be enslaving us—" (2:4). That is—and the sense is so evident that Paul breaks off his words without actually expressing his thought—it was because of the claims (cp Acts 15:1,2,5) of certain "false brethren" that Titus was then pressed by some to be circumcised, even though even these could not well compel him to undergo the rite, contrary to the counsel of the pillars of the Jerusalem ecclesia.

2:7 the evangel of the Uncircumcision. Considered In itself, it is possible to understand this phrase as a metonymy for "the evangel*ization* of the Uncircumcision." But it is not translation but interpretation to render this phrase, as in most modern Bibles, "the gospel to the Uncircumcision." Both "Uncircumcision" and "Circumcision" are in the genitive case. The sign of the genitive in English is OF- not TO-. Ideally, appropriate translation requires the former and precludes the latter. There may be a few cases where, due to the idiosyncracies of English, good diction may be strained if the genitive should be represented by OF. Nearly always, however, and certainly in this case at hand, it makes perfectly good English to say "the evangel of the Uncircumcision," as much so as to say, "the epistles of the apostle Paul." They are not the epistles to the apostle Paul, but the apostle Paul's epistles. Similarly, Paul does not speak of the evangel to the Uncircumcision, but of the Uncircumcision's evangel.

Paul speaks explicitly of "the evangel which I am heralding among the nations" (2:2); "the evangel which is being brought by me" (1:11); which he neither accepted from a human nor was taught by a human, that instead came to him "through a revelation of Jesus Christ" (1:12). The apostle himself will inform us as to its particulars. If we believe and understand both the revelations of Paul's evangel, according to Christ Himself, as well as the teachings of the twelve according as the Lord instructed them, we will soon know whether Paul's evangel "of the Uncircumcision" is a fresh revelation, distinct in various respects from the teaching of the twelve, or is, however expressed, essentially merely a restatement of their teaching.

It is not that the evangel of the Uncircumcision is the exclusive province of those of the nations; nor is it that the evangel of the Circumcision debars all but those who are Israelites by nature. It is rather that the evangel of the Uncircumcision is the evangel which is primarily for those of the nations, as brought to the nations through the ministry of the apostle Paul, who is the apostle of the nations (Rom.11:13; cp 1 Tim.2:7; 2 Tim.1:11; Eph.3:8).

Certain Israelites (such as Paul himself) are also called and blessed according to that evangel which, characteristically, is the evangel of the *Un*circumcision. Similarly, certain non-Israelites were themselves called and blessed according to that evangel which, characteristically, is the evangel of the Circumcision.

In the former case, any such descendants of Jacob lose their standing as Israelites and forfeit the advantages of the law—while concomitantly gaining the even greater benefits of the evangel of the Uncircumcision. If they are faithful, like Paul, they gladly forfeit all such benefits of flesh, while deeming them mere refuse (cf Phil.3:4-8).

In the latter case, like those of old who sojourned in Israel, any such non-Israelite believers who were nonetheless called and blessed according to the evangel of the Circumcision, were required to heed the law of Yahweh, which attended that evangel. Any such ones must become proselytes (cf Acts 2:10; 6:5; 13:43); that is, they must "come toward" Israel and observe the "one law," which applied not only to the native-born, but to the naturalized citizen as well (Ex.12:49). Initially, such ones had to undergo the rite of circumcision; subsequently, they would make a passover to Yahweh. They would then be deemed "natives of the land [of Israel]" (Ex.12:48,49). As naturalized Israelites, they would also be required to keep from violating the sabbaths, as well as to keep their hand from any evil, according to the law of Moses. Only thus could they hold fast to Yahweh's covenant (Isa.56:1-7; cp Acts 15:21) and be worthy of the resurrection of the righteous (cf Luke 14:14; 20:35; cp Matt.5:17-20; 7:21-23).

Thus it is fitting for Paul to declare that God will be justifying the Circumcision "out of faith" and the Uncircumcision "through the faith" (Rom.3:30). In each case, the faith which justifies is "Jesus Christ's faith" (Rom.3:22); "Jesus's faith" (Rom.3:26). As in Romans 11:36, where it is revealed that all is not only out of God, but through God as well, here too in Romans 3:30, it is certainly likewise true that under God, both the Circumcision and the Uncircumcision owe not only the origin but the agency of their justification as well to the faith of Christ.

Yet in the case of the Circumcision believers, who must center much of their attention upon their own observance of the law, it is not so obvious that even so, their justification is solely out of Jesus Christ's faith. After all, this truth, as such, is not even a part of the evangel of the Circumcision, even though it is certainly true concerning them, even as Paul declares.

However, in the case of the believers of the Uncircumcision, who are not under law at all (Rom.6:14), for whom Grace reigns even where sin increases (Rom.5:20,21), whose very evangel brings to the forefront the fact that their justification is not only out of the faith of Christ but is through the faith of Christ as well, it becomes fitting for Paul to emphasize that God will be justifying them "through the faith [of Christ.]."

2:16 faith of Christ [or: Christ's faith]. In Galatians 2:16, Paul states that "we may be justified through the faith of Christ and not by works of law." Here we first need to consider the translation itself, "faith of Christ." This becomes a special need since most modern translations, even as they render "the evangel of the Uncircumcision" (2:7) as "the gospel to the uncircumcised" (e.g., the NASB), translate "faith of Christ" similarly, as "faith in Christ."

This question as to the sense of this phrase is by no means solely a question of grammar; yet it is indeed a question in which grammatical issues are an important consideration. Grammatically, the question as to what is to be understood by pistis Iesou Christou, is a question of the usage of the genitive case. Grammatical case is the syntactical relationship of a noun, pronoun, or adjective to other words in a sentence, generally indicated by declensional endings in inflected languages (such as Greek), or by prepositions and word order in non-inflected languages (such as English).

The Greek genitive case includes the English possessive case, The genitive's presence is indicated in the Concordant Greek Text's sublinear by of-. It is the case of genus or kind. Its function is largely adjectival. Indeed, the Concordant Version renders "the exile of-Babylon" as "the Babylonian exile" (Matt.1:12). Similarly, "the blasphemy of the spirit" (Matt.12:31), in the Greek syntax is "the . . . of the spirit blasphemy."

In fact the main reason for the acceptance of the interpretation "faith in Christ" is the age-old tradition that one is saved by his own believing. Such a notion is then read into the text. Nevertheless all that the Greek says is: faith of-Christ; that is, faith that in some respect has reference, or relates to Christ. Even on grammatical grounds the case here for an "objective" genitive (i.e., for a faith that is directed Christward) is very weak. Yet if one insists on such an interpretation, it would then become necessary to refer this "faith in Christ" to God, not to the human, in order for this expression to accord with the evangel itself, the revelation that justification is gratuitous and in grace, through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus.

When Paul wishes to speak of the believer's faith in (i.e., "into") Christ, he does so not by means of a genitive noun apart from a preposition, but by means of an accusative (i.e., objective) noun together with an accusative preposition: ". . . rejoicing and observing your order and the stability of your faith in (i.e., "into") Christ" (Col.2:5).

A parallel expression to the faith of Christ is that of the grace of Christ: "grace which is of the One Human, Jesus Christ" (Rom.5:15). It would never occur to anyone to translate this text as "grace in Christ," much less to claim that it speaks of the believer's grace! Yet the only real difference between the genitive "of Christ" here and those which we have considered elsewhere, is that here the phrase is appended as a modifier of grace, while in the others (as in Galatians 2:20) the same phrase functions as a modifier of faith.

The very notion that such texts as Romans 3:22,26 and Galatians 2:16 (also 3:22) which say "faith of [Christ]", nonetheless have in view faith in Christ—namely the believer's own faith in Christ—is but the stepchild of the long-standing tradition that affirms that "justification by faith" means man's justification not by his performing works of law, but by his acceptance of Christ and assenting to faith in Him. The idea is that man saves himself, or if it is preferred, qualifies for God to save him, not by a former method, that of performing righteous deeds, but by a new method, that of acquiescing in faith.

Traditional theology is not merely saying that salvation comes upon believing in Christ, and not apart from or prior to. What it is also saying (even if more implicitly than explicitly) is that salvation is of the nature of an exchange, a reward, requital, or compensation. When preachers say that salvation is "by faith [i.e., man's faith]," they are using "by" in a transactional sense, according to the meeting of a requirement (as in, "by doing your work, you are entitled to your wages").

The phrase faith OF-Christ however, is parallel to and must agree with the essence of the evangel itself, the revelation that we are "being justified gratuitously in [God's] grace, through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus" (Rom.3:24). The deliverance is not said to be through our faith in Christ Jesus, but through Christ Jesus Himself. Similarly, it is not revealed that we were conciliated to God through our faith in the death of His Son, but that we were conciliated to God through the death of His Son (Rom.5:10). Further, it will not do to attempt to avoid this truth by artfully claiming that while this is so, it is only so on the "condition" (i.e., based upon a requirement) that we accept and believe on Christ. Any such claim is spurious; for we are not justified on a "conditional" basis that we meet some sort of requirement. Instead, we are justified apart from law, on a gratuitous and gracious basis, which precludes any and all requirements.

Therefore, all passages which declaim "the faith of Jesus Christ," out of which we are justified, must be understood to be referring to a faith which is His own: Christ's own perfect faith in giving Himself to the death of the cross—not man's faulty faith in Him.

Of course we ourselves can only speak of our justification by means of our own faith, since it is by faith that we apprehend what God has achieved through the work of the cross, even as what He will yet achieve in the eons ahead, when His promises are fulfilled. Still, the saint's own faith only gains for him a recognition of the justification which God has already established for him—through the faith of Christ (cf Rom.4:25-5:1; 5:9).

2:17,18 a dispenser of sin? Though a trivial act in itself,

1. In order to express this sense unmistakably in English we render the phrases in our revised CV using the possessive case: "Christ Jesus's faith," and, "Christ's faith."

Cephas' refusal to eat with those of the nations (2:12), was fraught with serious consequences. Thus he affirmed that the uncircumcised believers were "common and unclean" (cp Acts 10:28; 11:3), and set up again the barrier of law. If we should put ourselves under law, by claiming that this is what Christ would have us do, we imply that, effectually, He is a dispenser of sin. This is because, if He indeed would now have us take up the very agency through which Sin revives, gets an incentive, and produces in us all manner of coveting (cf Rom.7:8-10), it is impossible to disassociate Him from our failures. Such, through works of law, was the nature of the old covenant under which God displayed man's failure in all its horror. Such is not the nature of the Pauline evangel, which is, so to say, "a new covenant" indeed (cp 2 Cor.3:6).

If Paul were to once again establish a policy of law-righteousness, which he had previously discarded (cp Phil.3:7), in so doing he would be "commending" himself as a transgressor. That is, thus he would be providing himself with the very means by which he would now have the "standing" of a transgressor. Where no law is, there is no transgression (Rom.4:15). Yet under law, sinners become transgressors. Paul refused to put himself in any such jeopardy ever again.

Submitting to public pressures (as Cephas did, and as the Galatians were doing) in a way that suggests we think the law has some force in justification is a sin and may give the impression that justification in Christ encourages such sinful hypocrisy. Yet the Galatians were making law-justification (Rom.2:13) an acceptable thing, at least in relation to circumcision, and so were rebuilding what they had demolished. Were they actually "under law" (in relation to Paul's evangel), their taking up with the law would have been a transgression! (There is perhaps some irony here.)

Under grace we have a "right" to do anything: "All is allowed me" (1 Cor.8:9; 10:23). But Paul was very jealous of the evangel and was sensitive to the effects our behavior will have on others. The saving grace of God trains us to act in accord with what we believe, that is out of love and with the glory of God always in view.

2:20 crucified . . . living. Our living to God depends upon our having died to condemnatory law. Hence, as Paul declares, "With Christ have I been crucified." Yet the wonder of it is that though it is true that in this respect we have "died," it is as a result of this very death, together with Christ, that in our spirits we now are living! So in saying "I" am living, Paul must add that it is "no longer I, but living in me is Christ." It was not the power of the flesh, which is weakness, which was vitalizing Paul, but the power of Christ's spirit in him. As he said, "that [life] which I am now living in flesh, I am living in faith, the faith of the Son of God, Who loves me, and gives Himself up for me."

2:21 not repudiating the grace of God. To "repudiate" something is to reject its validity, or to refuse to acknowledge it. It is to have "no place" for it, which is the meaning of the elements of the Greek word we translate "repudiate" (atheteō, UN-PLACE).

The apostle Paul, decidedly, was not repudiating the grace of God; he was rather exalting it, and giving it its rightful place. The Galatians, however, in seeking justification through law instead of through the faith of Christ were repudiating the grace of God.

Everywhere in Scripture, especially within the Pauline epistles, "grace" is of the nature of a favor, or gracious gift. It is not granted "out of works," or in return for "services rendered" (cp Rom.4:4; 11:6). It is the very antithesis of a reward or compensation. We cannot qualify ourselves for it, nor disqualify ourselves from it. It not only knows nothing of "requirements," but precludes that very notion.

If righteousness were through law, there would have been "no just cause" for Christ to have died. Then His death would have been both uncalled for and unwarranted. But since His death was not a gratuitous event it follows that righteousness is not through law and that the Galatians and all their imitators are not correct in seeking it on that basis.

3:1 graphically crucified. "Graphically" is an idiomatic variant of prographō (BEFORE-WRITE), Which literally means, "write before" (e.g., Eph.3:3). Paul had "written before" the mind's eye of every one of the Galatians that Christ had died for their sakes, and that—in the bloody death of His crucifixion—they were now justified (cp Rom. 5:8,9). It was ever the burden of Paul's ministry to declaim the word recorded in Romans 8:32, which is: "Surely He Who spares not His own Son, but gives Him up for us all, how shall He not together with Him, also, be graciously granting us all?" (cp Gal.4:4). This is the truth which Paul vividly outlined and clearly set forth concerning "Christ crucified," graphically presenting it before the eyes of the Galatians.

3:2,5 tidings [hearing] of faith. Akoê literally means "hearing" (e.g., Mark 7:35). Sometimes, however, where it was noted that it was used metonymically of "that which is heard" (e.g., Matt.24:6; Rom.10:17), the Concordant Version renders it "tidings," in reference to the message itself which is associated with the "hearing" thereof. This clearly appears to be the sense as well in Galatians 3, verses 2 and 5, in the phrase, ex akoê pisteos. This is so, for, in the nature of the case, the Galatians got the spirit out of the tidings (or "message") of faith, which they heard and believed, the glad-tidings of Christ which are "of faith," i.e., which pertain or relate to faith, the faith of Christ for our faith (cp Rom.1:17; 3:22).

3:6-9 as Abraham believes God. There is a foundational agreement in kind between Abraham's calling and faith and our own calling and faith. Similarly, since the most righteous thing that any man can do is to believe God's own word, when we ourselves also, even as Abraham, believe the word of His promise, our so doing is reckoned to us (put to our account) "for [i.e., "into"] righteousness" (Rom.4: 22-24). God appraises our believing as being among (and so, thus He accounts it "into") that class of deeds which He deems righteous. Even though faith extends no "rights" to its possessors, and is itself a gracious gift, it is nonetheless considered righteous by God Himself, besides being full of practical value for ourselves.

We are to know, "consequently, that those of faith, these are sons of Abraham" (3:7). Our faith does not make God's promise true; instead, it finds it true. Faith's acceptance of the divine promise does not entitle its bearer to the promise's blessing; rather, it convicts its possessor of the truth of the promise's blessing. Faith has no value whatsoever as "legal tender." It simply acknowledges that which was already true prior to and wholly apart from its subsequent acceptance thereof. It is not that we will obtain the blessing, "if we will believe it true." It is instead, that we will be blessed; and, we believe that this is true.

Since the scripture, "perceiving before" that God is justifying the nations by faith, it therefore, prototypically, "brings before" an evangel to Abraham, declaring that, "In you shall all the nations be blessed." "So that," those of faith are being blessed together with believing Abraham.

Our being "blessed together" with Abraham is on the common ground of faith, according to grace (Rom.4:16). It is not that our blessing "together" with him affords us the identical future allotment which God has appointed for Abraham. Similarly, while God will grant us eonian life even if we should be persisting in sin (cf Rom.5:20-6:1), no such principle obtained in the case of Abraham, concerning whom law-obedience later received a vital place unto the realization of the blessing (cf Gen.26:5), its certainty in grace notwithstanding. This is so, even though Abraham's blessing also, even as our own, ultimately depended upon God alone.

3:10 under a curse. There are only two conceivable sources of blessing: (1) divine grace; and (2) human works of law [or, "law works"]. Only one of these, however, divine grace, is a viable source of blessing. The other, works of law, since it is infirm through the flesh (Rom.8:3), has been rendered ineffectual. That being so, whoever are "out of" law works are under a curse. This is because, "Accursed is everyone who is not remaining in all things written in the scroll of the law to do them" (3:10; cit. Deut.27:26; cp 28:15).

3:11-14 the Righteous One. It is evident that no one is being justified in law. It is less evident that no one can be justified, in the absolute sense of being made righteous, by their believing. Yet there is only one way by which anyone can be made righteous, and that is by the faith of Jesus Christ (which is primarily in view in verses 14,23 and 26 in the words "the faith"), Who becomes a curse for our sakes. The first and primary Subject of Habakkuk 2:4 is Christ, Who is the Righteous One (cf Isa.53:11; Acts 7:53; 22:14), Who came and lived by faith unto the death of the cross, and is living now in resurrection, no longer dying, but living to God (Rom.6:9,10). Yet in a secondary sense, we who are believing this evangel concerning Jesus Christ, are, like Abraham, reckoned righteous, and are living in faith. DHH

3:13 Christ reclaims us. It is not the province of law to justify, but to condemn. Effectually, the law merely says, "He who heeds my precepts shall find life in so doing"; which life no one ever finds since no one ever heeds its precepts (cf Lev.18:5; cp Luke 10:28). Like evil, law, too, is transitory. It lasts only until God's purpose through its agency has been realized. Those who, like Abraham, are reckoned righteous (Gal.3:6), owe this not to law, much less to themselves, but to grace. Life comes to them not out of their imperfect (and so disqualified) law-obedience, but out of the faith of Jesus Christ, in becoming a curse for our sakes, that it may accord with grace.

3:16 which is Christ. Paul tells us here that the promises spoken to Abraham were spoken also "to his Seed . . .which is Christ." The exact words Paul uses, "to you . . .and your seed," appear in the promise of Genesis 13:15, and in context the word "seed" (which is in the singular) could (and does) well refer collectively to the whole of the countless descendants of Abraham who will enjoy the allotment of the land, mentioned in verse 16. (See also Genesis 12:3,7; 17:8,9; 24:7.). Yet whether or not Abraham understood it so, or most everyone who heard these words through the centuries before Paul understood it so, we are to hear in this word SEED a reference to Christ, and indeed give special prominence to this application. God directed His promise of the land and of the blessings connected with it, including the blessing of being a blessing, not only to Abraham and his descendants, but most importantly to Christ, Whose faith and obedience to the cross is the basis of the fulfillment of God's promises, indeed the whole of His purpose beyond the allotment of the land and embracing the "world" as Paul says in Romans 4:13 and ultimately the secret of God's will, to head up all in the Christ (Eph.1:9,10). The application of the word "seed" to Abraham's descendants is correct, but in a secondary way to its application to Christ. Like Habakkuk 2:4, Genesis 13:15 (and parallel passages) is in its primary significance, Messianic. DHH

3:19 On behalf of transgressions. "Law changes sin from a mere mistake to the overstepping of a divine command. It enhances the sinfulness of sin. Transgression is sin against a known law, entailing not only the usual penalties, but the added displeasure of God against one who defies His precepts . . . . The promises Abraham received [which, incidentally, subsequently, came to be] in connection with the law, were unconditional; [ultimately speaking], dependent only on God's faithfulness. They were given without any reference to the law and [thus] do not depend on any legal observance for fulfillment." AEK

Charin ("on behalf," CV) is the accusative form of "grace," and is used as a preposition with the genitive case ("of transgressions").

The Authorized Version, at least as interpreted by some, is very misleading here in its rendering "because of transgressions." The words "because of" have led some to imagine that transgression obtained prior to Moses; and that the reference here is merely to ceremonial laws which were temporarily added by Moses to an already extant timeless moral code (namely, to a code which, under Moses, was merely formalized as the "Ten Commandments"). All of this is perfectly false (as well as artful and unreasonable); yet it is instructive to note the lengths to which some will go in order to impose the law upon believers today.

The idea of the Greek word, charin, is that of an act done with the objective of somehow bringing favor (i.e., some type of benefit or advantage) to the object in view (cp Titus 1:5,11). This is just what the entrance of the law afforded to transgression. Hence the law was given on behalf of the resultant transgressions which came into being through the law. Where no law is, neither is there transgression (Rom.4:15); yet the bestowal of law gives rise to its violation, which is transgression. Transgression owes its very existence to law, and cannot exist apart from it. Thus, on behalf of transgressions, "law came in by the way, that the offense should be increasing" (Rom.5:20).

until the Seed should come. Thus, on behalf of transgressions, the law was added (yet incidentally so, with respect to the original promises made to Abraham) until the Seed should come. Insofar as Paul and those of his fellow Israelites to whom this evangel had been granted are concerned, the law had become their escort to Christ. Now at the coming of the faith (through the advent of Christ; cp 2 Tim.1:10), such ones ("we;" Gal.3:25) are no longer under an escort. Thus, whoever—among those who are in view in this context; namely, among those who are blessed according to Paul's evangel—are baptized into Christ put on Christ, in Whom—with respect to Paul's evangel and insofar as it is concerned—there is no Jew nor yet Greek, nor any other distinction, for all, thus blessed are one in Christ Jesus (Gal.3:27,28).

Thus, in a figure, we become "of Abraham's seed;" that is, literally, we become enjoyers of an allotment according to promise (Gal.3:29). (It is not "the" allotment, or "the" promise; the definite article does not appear in the Greek).

In service, or in the Lord, the slave was still a slave, the sexes were still recognized; but—under Paul's evangel—in Christ, in Whom we are complete (Col.2:10), all physical distinctions vanish. By faith, all who are called according to the Pauline evangel (cp Gal.1:6-9) enter into the same high place of privilege, and are blessed with the common promise and righteousness of which this evangel consists. Thus, we may be having peace toward God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, since all of the evangel's blessings are graciously granted to us, through promise, in Him.

4:4 come under law. Christ Himself was "under law." "Come of a woman," He "became" (in the sense of His practice and experience) "under law" That is, practically speaking, He became subject to (or "under," cp Matt. 8:8,9) its jurisdiction. The expression "under law" occurs nine times in the New Testament (Rom.6:14,15; 1 Cor. 9:20; Gal.3:23; 4:4,5,21; 5:18; Heb.7:11). In every case, its usage makes evident that the sense is that of jurisdiction, authority or power (cp 1 Cor.15:56).

4:4-6 place of a son. Under Paul's evangel, none are "slaves" any longer; instead, all are sons; indeed, all are sons of God. We are all sons of God in Christ Jesus, through faith (Gal. 3:26); accordingly, we have "the place of a son" as well.

In the phrase "the place of a son," "son" is a figure of speech. Literally, the place of a son signifies a place of great significance and worth, near and dear to the father's heart.

Thus each one of us has a place of great significance and worth, near and dear to the heart of the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Consequently, God delegates the spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying "Abba! Father!" It is the spirit of God's Son (cp Rom.8:9) which cries out within us, testifying that God Himself is our beloved Father. It is by the power of this spirit that we may concur in and affirm this testimony.

Whether we ourselves are male or female, we are all "sons" of God. In accordance with the evangel, all of its recipients are "sons" and all enjoy the "place of" a son. That is, we all "enjoy" this position in the sense that it is our possession, whether or not we enjoy it in the sense of enlightened, joyful discernment concerning it.

4:9 turning about again . . . to slave again anew. As previously rendered, the words "turning back" have led some to suppose that the Galatians were returning to the observance of idolatrous days or festivals. This is an impossible claim indeed, for the Galatians were being deceived not by idolatrous customs in Christian garb, but by Judaizing deceivers who were zealous for works of law, who hated the festivals of the nations with a passion (cf Gal. 1:13,14; 2:11). Indeed, the Galatians themselves wanted to be under law (Gal.4:21), and the law strictly prohibited the service of Yahweh Elohim according to the customs of the nations in the service of their gods (Deut.12: 30-32).

The verb, epistrephō, ON-TURN, does not signify a reversion to a former practice, but simply a turning in the opposite direction of one's present course. For example, in Lystra, by bringing the evangel to the throngs "to turn [them] back" from their idolatrous ways "to the living God" (Acts 14: 15), Paul was by no means intimating that they were formerly servants of the living God (cp 15:19; 26:20). While it is true that epistrepho is sometimes idiomatically rendered "turn[ing] back," the idea of a reversion to a former course once engaged in by the person(s) in view, is not its meaning or even its sense, as such (even though in some contexts such an idea is incidentally present). Epistrephō is often rendered "turn about" (e.g., Acts 16:18; 28:27), which more strictly represents its essence in English, and as the CV will now render it here.

The word, again (palin). however, does refer to a reversion. Its reference however, is not that of a reversion to a former practice (such as to the observance of a certain form of idolatry), but of a reversion to a former practical condition (viz., to a condition of slavery, albeit in a new form).

The common English usage of anew (viz., "once more" or "again") is not the essence of the Greek word anōthen (UP-PLACE). The idea is not that of a repetition of something former. Yet since this thought, incidentally, is present in both Galatians 4:9 and John 3:3,7 (which are the only passages in which anōthen is translated "anew"), this English word was chosen as the most expedient rendering in each of these texts. If we are to use the word "anew," we should take the phrase "slave again anew" in the sense of "revert to slavery once again" (albeit through a new means of bondage), not "become once again enslaved to the same specific practices to which one was formerly in bondage"

Anōthen (UP-PLACE) is often rendered "from above" (in space; cp Matt.27:51; John 3:1), as well as "from the very first" (in time; cp Luke 1:3; Acts 26:5). Obviously, in Galatians 4:9 it is used in reference to time. The sense is, from the outset—"from the very first"—once the Galatians became disposed to "keep the law," they freely enslaved themselves to its bondage.

4:12 In nothing do you injure me. In denying the evangel, the Galatians did not injure Paul, even though they had become hostile to his message and now sought to repudiate it. By calling attention to the apostle's omission of law observance through their endeavors to heed its precepts, they did not make him unworthy before God. Instead, through their apostasy, they only injured themselves. Paul remains complete in Christ, whatever they may do. Actually, the Galatians themselves remain complete in Christ as well, even if their service in the Lord should be most unworthy, being out of harmony with the evangel and contrary to the apostle's teachings.

4:17 jealous over you. The Greek verb from which the English terms "jealous" and "zealous" are derived, is zeloō) (BOIL). Jealous and zealous, very likely, were once the same in English. Though zeloō admits of many connotations (hence these two English derivatives, each one itself having a number of definitions), its essence is perhaps most accurately signified by the word "enthuse"

The Galatians' deceivers were "enthusiastic" Christians! They were not only generally enthusiastic (intense, eager and zealous), but they were enthusiastic toward the Galatians in particular. They paid attention to the Galatians! Perhaps they effected their delusion as well "through compliments and adulation" (cp Rom.16:18). In any case, it is evident that the Galatians were favorably impressed by their ways and that this played a significant part in the Galatians, resultant delusion.

The Galatians' deceivers wanted to "debar" the Galatians from their, erstwhile-enjoyed, happy and fond association with Paul (cf Gal.4:13-15), even as from Paul's message of sinner-justifying grace apart from law (cf Gal.1:6; 2:16). This in itself is unspeakably wrong. Yet the apostle adds that, not only was this so, but that they were motivated to do so out of a longing for the Galatians to "be jealous over them" (Gal.4:17).

That is, they were enthusiastic and zealous over the Galatians because they wanted the Galatians to be enthusiastic and zealous over them. Accordingly, their zeal also incorporated the characteristic which is expressed by the English "jealous," for it is evident that they viewed Paul more as a competitor than as an esteemed brother. Indeed, they must have denied his faithful apostleship (whether explicitly or implicitly; cp Gal.1:1,11), for it would seem impossible for them at once to affirm it, while repudiating his teaching.

4:19 Little children mine. The Galatians may be foolish, ungrateful and immature, they may fancy that Paul is their enemy because of his "lawless" message of grace, yet to the apostle, they remain his beloved "little children" ("little-offsprings OF-ME," CONCORDANT GREEK TEXT sublinear, p.549).

4:21-31 Tell me. If the Galatians wished to become such ardent devotees of the law, Paul would ask them only to comply with its own dictate (viz., "Cast out this maid and her son"; Gen.21:10), as recorded in the story of Hagar and Sarah, of Ishmael and Isaac. Essentially, the story teaches that works of the flesh, under a system of bondage, rather than being the key to God's allotment, are the lock which debars entrance into God's allotment.

The allotment which the Galatian believers longed for (even as we ourselves who are believing today) was salvation out of this present wicked eon (cf Gal.1:4), and salvation into glorious life and joy, in the presence of Christ Himself, in the oncoming eons.

Paul would have us know that God has promised this allotment to us, doing so in His grace. He chose us for it before the disruption of the world (Eph.1:4), in accord with His own purpose and the grace which is given to us in Christ Jesus before times eonian (2 Tim.1:9). Accordingly, He has designated us beforehand for it (cf Rom.8:29), having not appointed us to indignation, but to the procuring of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ (1 Thess.5:9).

The allotment of life eonian is our expectation, not merely our hope, for it is God's gracious gift to us (cp Titus 3:7; Rom.6:23). Thus it is that Paul declares that we who now are blessed according to his evangel, even as Abraham, Sarah and Isaac of old, are "enjoyers of the allotment according to the promise" (Gal.3:29). That is, we are enjoyers of the allotment which God has for us according to the promise which He has made to us (cp Titus 1:1,2).

This is the evangel of our salvation. The evangel is not at all the foolish notion to the effect that if (and only if) we will keep the law satisfactorily (or otherwise engage in sufficient upright behavior) we then will be granted eonian life.

5:1 Christ frees us. In Christ Jesus, Who has become to us wisdom from God, besides righteousness and holiness and deliverance (1 Cor.1:30,31), we are complete (Col.2:10). Therefore, in Him, in the benefits afforded us through His sacrificial death, we are free from any need to be "justified in law" (cf Gal.5:4). Christ is the "consummation" of "law for righteousness" (Rom.10:4). Obeying law in order to become righteous is something which is quite impossible for mortals (Rom.3:9,10; 8:3,7). In spirit, "law for righteousness" must ever point to Christ, in Whom alone its goal is realized (cp Rom.8:3,4). Only in Him is that which the law sought actually achieved. Through the one righteous response of Christ, life's justifying comes into all mankind (Rom.5:18). Through Him alone, this entire vast company shall be constituted righteous (Rom.5:19).

Strictly (since the dative case is used, together with the definite article), it is, "Into this freedom Christ frees us"! This freedom, allegorically speaking, is the freedom of being "not the children of the maid, but of the free woman" (4:31), which is to say, the freedom of Isaac; the freedom of being children of promise (4:28), according to grace.

5:2,3 if you should be circumcising. The words "if you should be circumcising, Christ will benefit you nothing," must not be wrenched from their context; much less are they to be understood categorically, for this would contradict not only the entire tenor of the epistle, but the very evangel itself. Paul speaks relatively, in relation to justification in law. The sense is, If you should be circumcising (in the interests of justification), Christ will benefit you nothing in justification. Thus, Christ—or Circumcision: which shall it be?

5:4 Exempted from Christ' Even as the words, "if you should be circumcising, Christ will benefit you nothing," are to be understood in relation to justification, the phrase, "Exempted from Christ," is likewise to be understood in this same connection. Accordingly, the word "Christ," herein, is used metonymically, in reference to His benefits, and that in the sense of one's own recognition thereof. The sense is, inherent to the view of one holding such a perspective, Those who are being justified in law, were thereby exempted from being justified in Christ. This is simply to say that it follows from the position that one is justified in law, that one is not justified in Christ. One precludes the other. Thus, in one's own perception, one "nullifies" or "makes unproductive" (as the Greek word translated here "exempted" is elsewhere rendered) the work of Christ in justification. Hence, in nullifying the true benefits of Christ, the Galatians repudiated the grace of God (cp 2:21).

You fall out of grace. Indeed, this is just what one does who seeks a right standing before God by means of law, even if he should freely acknowledge the sacrificial death of Christ on behalf of his sins. In one's own recognition, one falls out of grace, not by practicing sin, but by falling into law. In truth, however, simply because it is grace, it is impossible for one to remove himself from its blessing, even by the darkest of deeds.

"Falling from grace,' is not, as usually supposed, a loss of the benefits of Christ's salvation through breaking the law, but is rather a loss of a realization of those benefits through attempting to keep the law. He who falls into sin does not forfeit the grace of God. Blessed to relate, grace abounds in such a case (cf Rom.6:1). But he who seeks to establish his own salvation by works has no need of the grace of God . . . . thus repudiates grace. He falls out of the sphere where grace operates. AEK

5:5 awaiting the expectation of righteousness by faith. Until the day of Christ's advent, we, in spirit, "as if present" (cp 1 Cor.5:3), are awaiting the expectation of righteousness [i.e., of justification], and we are doing so by faith centered in the faith of Christ.

Faith, operating through love, alone is that which avails. Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision—nor any other human deed either of obeying or of omitting to obey law—avails anything at all, in Christ Jesus. It is in Christ Jesus alone that all aspects of salvation are achieved, "through the blood of His cross."

What is achieved in Christ, cannot be forfeited by the human. Hence all such entreaties, such as that of 1 Corinthians 10:24, should simply be understood as that which is expedient or edifying, pleasing to God and beneficial to man. Though all such words of entreaty of our apostle have a vital place in our service (even as the counsel of all necessarily universally-applicable words of wisdom throughout all Scripture), even so, no scriptural entreaty of uprightness at all, however important, has any place whatsoever in our justification, in which we are complete in Christ.

5:11 the snare of the cross of Christ. If Paul had continued to herald circumcision, the snare of the cross of Christ would have been nullified. A "snare" skandalon is "a means of tripping or a cause of falling" (Keyword Concordance, p.275). The glorious truth associated with Christ's cross becomes just this to many, by means of which they trip, and fall into opposing error. That truth is the revelation that salvation is in grace and through Christ alone. This scandalizes both human pride and fleshly ethics, by which most are enslaved.

The evangel is simply unacceptable to those who wish to boast in something of themselves—something that they have done. In most circles today, "accepting Christ" (or alternatively, obeying Him as Lord) has supplanted first-century circumcision as the fancied "requirement" for salvation. Among the exponents of such views today, just as surely as among the circumcisionists of Galatia, thus the snare of the cross is nullified. By denying its truth, they remove its offense.

5:16-18 Walk in spirit. The spirit, ultimately speaking, is not controlled by the flesh; it is rather that the spirit must control the flesh. The spirit is not a "tool" in the hands of the flesh, the flesh having lordship over the spirit. The spirit is rather the power which must control "sin's flesh" (Rom.8:3) within the fleshly creature. It must ever be remembered that the flesh will dominate—it will dominate us—wherever God does not dominate the flesh. Therefore, we rely on God and not ourselves, having no confidence in the flesh.

5:22,23 fruit of the spirit. "The flesh acts; the spirit bears fruit, delicious not only to us but to God. Fruit is not the result of mechanical effort but the natural expression of life and growth. If we love others we will need no legal restrictions to keep us from injuring them. Law is a useless encumbrance to those who walk after the spirit. They need no promptings to do good and are above the penalties imposed on evil doers." AEK.

against such things there is no law. Since the Galatians wanted to be under law (4:21), Paul dryly informs them that there is no law against either love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, or self-control. Since there is no law against any of these things, why not seek to manifest them, giving time and effort to their cultivation instead of to biting and devouring (5:15)?

5:24-26 those of Christ Jesus crucify the flesh. All those"of Christ Jesus" crucify the flesh in some measure. The flesh may be far from dead; but, at whatever rate, as we grow in the growth of God (cf Col.2:19), we progress in the crucifixion of the flesh. This is simply what is so. However limited and imperfect, a new disposition and a new walk is something that we have; it is not something that we ourselves create. Its presence is to be accounted for by "the spirit's law of life in Christ Jesus" (Rom.8:2). We do well, then, to cease from all "vainglorious[ness]," believing and behaving as if the essential reason for our holiness were something of ourselves. Vain glorying only produces "challenging and envy" (5:26), not "God's administration which is in faith" (1 Tim.1:4b).

observing the elements. If it should be that we "may be living in spirit," which is to say, if it should be our experience to be manifesting the fruit of the spirit (cp 5:22-25), we will find that in spirit, we may also be (i.e., we shall also be) observing the elements (5:25). "The elements," refers to the particulars of the law (cp 4:3; Acts 21:24b). In the phrase, "in spirit, we may be observing the elements also," the words "in spirit" are an appositive explaining the sense which Paul has in mind in which the Galatians will, when living in spirit, at once, also be observing the elements. Then, besides exhibiting the fruit of the spirit, they will be "observing the law," indeed, though only figuratively, in its spirit or intent. Ideally, the goal of the law was to instill in any who would truly maintain it, these very same holy virtues which Paul rehearses in 5:22,23 (cp Lev.19:2; Rom.8:3). In actuality, however, such noble characteristics can only come into existence as fruit of the spirit, not as the force of law acting upon the flesh, which only makes matters worse (Rom.7:7-13).

Law is not laid down for the just, yet it is for the lawless and insubordinate (1 Tim.1:9), which sometimes includes believers in their practical affairs. We need to be mindful of the rules, that we might be "competing lawfully" (2 Tim.2:5), contending the ideal contest, so as to finish our career faithfully (cp 2 Tim.4:7). Even so, law cannot subject the flesh; and, in the measure that we are influenced by the spirit, law becomes redundant.

6:2 Bear one another's burdens. Since the Galatians are so taken with the idea of law, Paul says to them, "Bear one another's burdens [that is, ease the 'heaviness' of one another's loads], and thus fill up 'the law of Christ.'" Each one must indeed be bearing his own load (6:5), according to his own character and circumstances. But if we would fulfill "the law of Christ," here, we would seek to ease the other party's burden in it all by centering our attention not upon our displeasure with him but upon what will help him, even as make his situation less difficult to endure.

6:8 reaping life eonian. The literal, future allotment of eonian life is our expectation in grace (cp Titus 3:7; Eph. 2:5-7), and will be granted even where there is persistence in sin (cf Rom.5:20-6:1). Therefore, the "reaping" of "life eonian," here in Galatians 6:8, which speaks of an attainment as the result of works, must be identified not with future, life eonian itself, but, through the figure of metonmy, with that which is associated with it even now. It is one's faithful relationship to the only true God, as well as with His Son, our Lord Jesus Christ: "Now it is eonian life that they may know You, the only true God, and Him Whom You commission, Jesus Christ" (John 17:3). In this same sense, Paul sought to be attaining to the resurrection that is out from among the dead" (Phil.3:11), entreating Timothy similarly to "get hold of eonian life" (1 Tim.6:12).

6:12 persecuted for the cross of Christ Jesus. The Greek word translated "persecution" (diōgmos, CHASing), as a verb diōkō, is translated not only "persecute" but "pursue." It is used both of positive pursuing (e.g., 1 Thess. 5:15) and of negative "chasing" (as here, in 5:11 and 6:12). Such "chasing" may be overt or covert, subtle or obvious, even as slight or extreme. Those who take an open stand for the truth of the evangel, however, will, in whatever way or degree, be "persecuted" for so doing.

The significance of the cross as to the individual sinner concerns not so much what the sinner has done, but what the sinner is. One who sins, sins because he is a sinner. It is because he is such an awful person that he has done such awful things! The lusts of the flesh, collectively (even if not, perhaps, in some points, individually), are his lusts! If he is less guilty than others of certain of the more socially unacceptable works of the flesh, he is still quite guilty himself of various of the more socially acceptable fleshly desires.

The desire of the flesh is a terrible thing. This is so not only in its acknowledged perversions such as rape or murder, but in its perversions which, in its own perverseness, it deems only "minor shortcomings." These include sins such as self-exaltation, coveting, and ostentation, not to mention vanity, impatience, unkindness, strife, and anger.

How one may compare to other people is not the point. Every sinner himself is such a terrible sinner that none other than Christ Himself had to die for that sinner alone, let the sins and needs of others be what they will.

Further, every sinner himself is such a terrible sinner that his justification, hence, his salvation, would seem to be impossible. And, unless God should take the most extreme measures at unspeakably great cost both to Himself and to His Son, every sinner is such a terrible sinner that indeed his salvation would be impossible.

To speak as a human, By our sins, we have made ourselves the worst imaginable nuisance to God and caused Him an unfathomable measure of trouble. How would you like it if you had to give up your most precious child—the only one who had truly loved you and been obedient to you—to death, even a death of crucifixion? And most especially, how would you like it if you had to do this because it was the only way to ransom the rest of your children out of the terrible plight which had befallen them due to their own foolish wickedness?

Thus the significance of the cross, in respect to the sinner, is that such were our deserts. It is we who are deserving of death (cp Rom.1:32), not Christ. To say that crucifixion was the Roman death penalty, not the Mosaic, misses the point. The point is that the sufferings of the cross comprised the death which God Himself appointed unto His Son in His death for sinners (cf Acts 4:27,28). If some swift, painless, and shameless form of euthanasia performed in private might have sufficed, doubtlessly it would have been employed. No; to ransom such as ourselves, nothing less than an ignominious and public, literally *excruc*iating (i.e., "from the cross") death would suffice.

In relation to the sinner, considered as such, this is the significance of the cross. Since it is so exceedingly uncomplimentary of the flesh, however, the flesh does not care for such a message at all. The believer, while actively believing under the influence of God's spirit, loves the word of the cross; for it at once serves to humble him and to exalt his God even as His vast love. Yet let that same believer be removed from vital influences of the spirit and left to himself, which is to say to his own flesh, and he will once again yield to whatever desires of the flesh happen to be his peculiar portion.

6:14 not boasting. Boasting is not confined to overt bragging, but includes all inward glorying and exulting as well, according to a boastful spirit (1 Cor.4:7; cp Prov.6:17a, "exalted eyes"). Preachers continually praise their converts for making their "decision for Christ." They are taught to think well of themselves for having used their "free will" aright in "accepting Christ," unlike so many others who have not done so. Indeed, if it is something ultimately of man himself alone which determines whether one enjoys eternal bliss or is subjected to eternal misery, how could one not, even if only inwardly, extol his own greatness for an achievement of such stupendous importance?

6:15 a new creation. In relation to that which God achieves in grace through Christ Jesus, what is true of circumcision is true of all law: it is nothing. Instead, in Christ Jesus, what is everything, is the new creation which God achieves for all through the blood of Christ's cross.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

BEING THE SECOND NUMBER OF VOLUME ONE HUNDRED EIGHT

IN THIS ISSUE we present the first eleven chapters of our revised CONCORDANT VERSION OF 1 CORINTHIANS, in its present status (pp.51-68).

In "The Word of the Cross" (pp.69-83) by John Essex, the author declares: "The glory with which God graces His Son because of His obedience unto the death of the cross, is such that it not only exalts Christ above all else in the universe, but also brings all creation into recognition and acceptance of this fact. Every knee will bow to Him, every tongue will acclaim Him as Lord."

The brief devotional word "The Holy Spirit" (p.84) by A. E. Knoch, reminds us that "first of all, God gives us His spirit, preliminary to His further blessings. Thus we are enabled to perceive that which is being graciously given to us by God (1 Cor.2:10-13). This is the channel through which His love has found entrance into our hearts. Only thus can we rejoice in trials, afflictions and distresses."

"The Evangel in Romans" (pp.85-88) by Anthony Nungesser, which centers upon the question "Why is there so much evil in the world?" provides the following response to this selfsame inquiry: "Man, without divine illumination, is incapable of properly addressing this question. Paul, in Romans, gives us the Divine side of the answer to evil, its origin and eradication from the universe. In Romans chapter 8, the apostle pulls back the curtain, so to speak, and tells us concerning God doing something on purpose, doing something the creation did not volunteer for. He also tells us concerning God's goal to bring the creation into the glorious freedom of the children of God (Rom.8:19-21). This reveals to us that God is right in what He does. The end truly does justify the means!"

In "Christ Crucified" (pp.89-96) by Dean Hough, the theme is Christ's death for the sake of sinners as the manifestation of God's righteousness (cf Rom.3:21,22): "On the basis of Christ's death (which is for all), God is openly displayed as righteous in justifying the irreverent one (Rom. 3:26; 4:5). In Christ's death the old humanity is put to death, so that all will ultimately be vivified in Christ and constituted righteous (1 Cor.15:22; Rom.5:19) . . . .

"What is done is that Christ dies for the sake of all, and consequently all die. In 2 Corinthians 5:14, Paul uses a 'fact verb' ('dies') rather than a 'time verb,' such as 'died' or 'has died.' We know that Christ's death is in the past, but here and in many other references to it, Paul puts the stress on the timeless fact of Christ's death together with the timeless fact of its significance for mankind. The death of Christ Jesus is the death of the old humanity, of all sinners, apart from consideration of its realization in time. The evangel is a fact for us to believe, a fact that will be experienced in God's appointed time."

We must acknowledge that our response to this evangel of God, too often, is far from ideal. This is because in ourselves we are flesh, and "the disposition of the flesh is enmity to God, for it is not subject to the law of God, for neither is it able" (Rom.8:7). Our situation is thus: "the flesh is lusting against the spirit, yet the spirit against the flesh. Now these are opposing one another, lest you should be doing whatever you may want" (Gal.5:17).

How we rejoice, then, that ". . . the saving grace of God . . . [is] training us that, disowning irreverence and worldly desires, we should be living sanely and justly and devoutly in the current eon" (Titus 2:11,12). This is to say that a sane, just, and devout walk is dependent upon and the result of the training of God's saving grace.

Thus may we "be learning to preside over ideal acts for necessary needs, that [we] may not be unfruitful" (Titus 3:14).

PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS (1)
(Chapters 1-11)

1 Paul, a called apostle of Christ Jesus, through God's will, and Sosthenes, a ·brother, [2] to the ecclesia of ·God ·which ˡis in Corinth, ˚hallowed° in Christ Jesus, called saints, together with all in every place ·who are invoking° the Name of our ·Lord Jesus Christ, both theirs and ours:

[3] Grace to ⁼you and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

[4] I am thanking my ·God always concerning ⁼you on over the grace of ·God ·which is ⁻being given ⁼you in Christ Jesus, [5] t for in everything are ⁼you enriched in Him, in e all expression and e all knowledge, [6] according as the testimony of ·Christ is confirmed among ⁼you, [7] so that ⁼you are not ˡdeficient° in n any grace, awaiting° the unveiling of our ·Lord Jesus Christ, [8] Who will be confirming ⁼you also until the consummation, unimpeachable in the day of our ·Lord Jesus Christ. [9] Faithful is ·God, through Whom ⁼you are called into the fellowship of His ·Son, Jesus Christ, our ·Lord.

[10] y Now I am entreating ⁼you, brethren, through the Name of our ·Lord Jesus Christ, that all may be saying the same thing, and there may be no schisms among ⁼you, y but ⁼you may be ˚attuned° t to the same mind and t to the same opinion. [11] For it is made evident to me concerning ⁼you, my brethren, by ·those of Chloe, that there are strifes among ⁼you. [12] y Now I am saying this, that each of ⁼you is saying, I´ indeed am of Paul, yet, I of Apollos, yet, I of Cephas, yet, I of Christ. [13] ·Christ is ˚parted°! Not Paul is crucified [oe]for =your sakes! Or into the name of Paul are =you baptized? 14 I am thanking ·God that I baptize not one of =you except Crispus and Gaius, 15 lest anyone may say that =you are baptized into my ·name. 16 Yet I baptize the household of Stephanas also. Furthermore, I am not °aware if I baptize any other. 17 For ·Christ does not commission me to be baptizing, but to be bringing the evangel°, not in wisdom of word, lest the cross of ·Christ may be made void.

18 For the word ·of the cross is stupidity indeed to ·those who are perishing°, yet to us ·who are being saved° it is God's power. 19 For it is °written°,

> I shall be destroying the wisdom of the wise,
> And the understanding of the intelligent > shall I be repudiating. Is 29:14 (LXX)

20 Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the discusser of this ·eon? Does not ·God make stupid the wisdom of this ·world? 21 For since, in fact, in the wisdom of ·God, the world through ·wisdom knows not ·God, ·God delights, through the stupidity of the heralding, to save ·those who are believing, 22 since, in fact, + Jews signs are requesting, and Greeks wisdom are seeking, 23 yet we´ are heralding Christ °crucified°, to Jews indeed a snare, yet to the nations stupidity; 24 yet to [s]those ·who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ is God's power and God's wisdom, 25 [t]for the stupidity of ·God is wiser than ·human beings, and the weakness of ·God is stronger than ·human beings.

26 For =you are observing =your ·calling, brethren, that there are not many =wise according to the flesh; not many =powerful, not many =noble, 27 but the =stupid of the world ·God chooses°, that He may be disgracing the =wise, and the =weak of the world ·God chooses°, that He may be disgracing the =strong, 28 and the =ignoble and the °=con- temptible° of the world ·God chooses°, and ·those which [l]are not, that He should discard ·those which [l]are, 29 so that no flesh at [e]all should boast° in ·God's sight. 30 Yet =you´, [o] of Him, are in Christ Jesus, Who becomes to us wisdom from God, besides righteousness and holiness and deliverance, 31 that according as it is °written°, He ·who is boasting°, in the Lord let him be boasting°. Jr 9:24

2 And I´, ¯coming to[d] =you, brethren, come not [ac]with superiority of word or of wisdom, announcing to =you the testimony of ·God, 2 for I decide not to °perceive anything among =you except Jesus Christ and Him °crucified°. 3 And I´ come° to be [td]with =you in weakness and in fear and in much trembling, 4 and my ·word and my ·heralding are not [i]with the persuasive words of human wisdom, but [i]with demonstration of spirit and of power, 5 that =your ·faith may not be in the wisdom of ·human beings but in God's power.

6 Yet wisdom are we speaking among the mature, yet a wisdom not of this ·eon, neither of the chief men of this ·eon, ·who are being discarded°, 7 but we are speaking God's wisdom in a secret, ·wisdom which [l]has been concealed°, which ·God designates before—before the eons, [io]for our glory, 8 which not one of the chief men of this ·eon °knows, for if they know, they would not crucify the Lord of ·glory. 9 But according as it is °written°,

> Those things which the eye does not perceive,
> And the ear does not hear,
> And which do not ascend on the heart of humanity— > Whatever ·God makes ready for ·those > who are loving Him. Is 64:4; 65:17

10 Yet to us ·God reveals them through His ·spirit, for the spirit is searching all, +even the depths of ·God.

11 For is any of =humanity °acquainted with ·those things which are ·human except the spirit of ·humanity ·which is in it? Thus also, ˙those things which are of ˙God noᵗ one ˚knows, except the spirit of ˙God. 12 ʸNow we´ obtain, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit ˙which is ᵒ of ˙God, that we may perceive ˙those things which are ⁻being graciously given to us by ˙God, 13 which we are speaking also, not ⁱwith words taught by human wisdom, but ⁱwith those taught by the spirit, matching spiritual blessings with spiritual words.

14 ʸNow the soulish human is not receiving° ˙those things which are of the spirit of ˙God, for they are stupidity to him, and he is not ˡable° to know them, seeing that they are spiritually ˡexamined°. 15 ʸNow he ˙who is spiritual is indeed examining all, yet he´ is being examined° by noᵗ one. 16 For ᵃwho knows the mind of the Lord? Who will be redirecting Him?Is 40:13,14 (LXX)* Yet we´ ˡhave the mind of Christ.

3 And I´, brethren, am not able to speak to ⁼you as to ⁼spiritual, but as to fleshly, as to minors in Christ. 2 Milk I give ⁼you to drink, not solid food, for not as yet were ⁼you able°. ᵇᵗNay still, not ʸeven now are ⁼you ˡable°, 3 for ⁼you are still fleshly. For whereᵉ there is jealousy and strife among ⁼you, are ⁼you not fleshly and walking in accord with humanity? 4 For whenever anyone may be saying, I´ indeed am of Paul, yet ᵈanother, I, of Apollos, will he not be fleshly?

5 ᵃWhat then is Apollos? ʸNow ᵃwhat is Paul? Servants are they, through whom ⁼you believe, and as the Lord gives to each. 6 I´ plant, Apollos irrigates, but ˙God makes it grow up. 7 So that, neither is he ˙who is planting anything, nor he ˙who is irrigating, but God ˙Who makes it ˡgrow up. 8 ʸNow he ˙who is planting and he ˙who is irrigating are for one thing. Yet each will be getting° his ˙own wages according to his ˙own toil. 9 For God's fellow workers are we. God's farm, God's building, are ⁼you.

10 According to the grace of ˙God ˙which is ⁻being granted to me, as a wise foreman I lay a foundation, yet another is building on it. Yet let each one ˡbeware how he is building on it. 11 For other foundation ˡcan° noᵗ one lay beside ˙that which is ˡlaid°, which is Jesus Christ. 12 ʸNow if anyone is building ᵒⁿ on this ˙foundation gold and silver, precious stones, wood, grass, straw, 13 each one's ˙work will ˡbecome° apparent, for the day will ˡmake it evident, ᵗfor it is being revealed° ⁱby fire. And the fire, it´ will be testing each one's ˙work—what kind it is. 14 If anyone's ˙work will be remaining which he builds on it, he will ˡget° wages. 15 If anyone's ˙work shall be ˡburned° up, it will be ˡforfeited, yet he´ shall be ˡsaved, yet thus, as through fire.

16 Are ⁼you not ˚aware that ⁼you are a temple of God and the spirit of ˙God is making its home in ⁼you? 17 If anyone is corrupting the temple of ˙God, ˙God will be corrupting him, for the temple of ˙God is holy, whichᵃ ⁼you´ are.

18 Let no one be deluding himself. If anyone among ⁼you is presuming to be wise in this ˙eon, let him become° stupid, that he may become° wise, 19 for the wisdom of this ˙world is stupidity ᵇwith ˙God. For it is ˚written°, ˙He is clutching° the wise in their ˙craftiness.Jb 5:13* 20 And again, The Lord ˡknows the reasonings of the wise, that they are vain.Ps 94:11* 21 So that, let no one be boasting° in human beings, for all is ⁼yours, 22 whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or the ˚present, or that which is impending—all is ⁼yours, 23 yet ⁼you are Christ's, yet Christ is God's.

4 Thus let a human be reckoning° with us—as deputies of Christ, and administrators of God's secrets. 2 Here, furthermore, it is being sought° in ˙administrators that any such may be found faithful. 3 ʸNow to me it is ⁱᵒ the least trifle that I may be examined by ⁼you or by humanity's day. But neither am I examining myself. 4 For of nothing am I ˚conscious° as to myself, but not ⁱby this am I ˚justified°. ʸNow He ˙Who is examining me is the Lord. 5 So that, be not judging anything before the season, till the Lord

6 *ʸ*Now these things, brethren, I transfer in a figure *ᵢₒ*to myself and Apollos because of ⁼you, that in us ⁼you may learn not ˙to be ˡdisposed above what is ˚written˚, that ⁼you may not be ˡpuffed˚ up, one over the one, against the *ᵈ*other. 7 For *ᵃ*who is making you to discriminate? ʸNow *ᵃ*what ˡhave you which you do not obtain? ʸNow if you obtain it also, *ᵃ*why are you boasting˚ as though not ¯obtaining? 8 Already are ⁼you ˚sated˚, already are ⁼you rich, apart from us ⁼you reign. We are weak, yet ⁼you are strong. ⁼You are glorious, yet we are dishonored. 11 Until the ᵃᵗ present hour we are hungering also and thirsting, and are ˡnaked and are ˡbuffeted˚ and ˡunsettled; 12 and we are toiling, working˚ with our ˙own hands. 14 Not to be abashing ⁼you am I writing these things, but as my children beloved am I admonishing you. 15 For if ⁼you should be having ten thousand escorts in Christ, *ᵇᵗ*nevertheless not many fathers, for in Christ Jesus, through the evangel, I´ beget ⁼you. 16 I am entreating ⁼you, then, ˡbecome˚ imitators of me. 17 Therefore I send to ⁼you Timothy, who is my beloved and faithful child in the Lord, who will be reminding ⁼you of my ˙ways ˙which are in Christ Jesus, according as I am teaching everywhere in every ecclesia.

18 *ʸ*Now *ᵃ*some are puffed up as though I were not coming˚ toᵈ* ⁼you. 19 Yet I shall be coming˚ toᵈ* ⁼you swiftly, if ever the Lord should will, and I will ˡknow˚, not the word of ˙those who are ˚puffed˚ up, but the power. 20 For not in word is the kingdom of ˙God, but in power. 21 *ᵃ*What are ⁼you wanting? *ⁱ*With a rod may I come toᵈ* ⁼you, or in love *ᵇˢ*and a spirit of meekness?

For He is averring, The two will be [io] one flesh.[Gn 2:24] 17 [y]Now he ·who [ljoins° the Lord is one spirit. 18 [lFlee from ·prostitution. The penalty of every sin, whatsoever a human should do, is outside of the body, yet he ·who is committing prostitution is sinning [io]against his ·own body. 19 Or are =you not °aware that =your ·body is a temple of the holy spirit in =you, which =you [lhave from ·God, and =you are not your [sf]own? 20 For =you are bought with a price. By all means glorify ·God in =your ·body.

7 1 [y]Now concerning what =you write to me: It is ideal for a [h]man not to be touching° a woman. 2 Yet because of ·prostitutions, let each man [lhave a ·wife for himself and each woman [lhave her ·own husband. 3 Let the husband [lrender to the wife her ·due, yet likewise the wife also to the husband. 4 The wife has not the [ljurisdiction of her ·own body, but the husband, yet likewise the husband also has not the [ljurisdiction of his ·own body, but the wife. 5 Do not [ldeprive one another, except [a]sometime it should be [o]by agreement [td]for a period, that =you should have leisure for ·prayer, and =you may be [on] the same again, lest ·Satan may be trying =you because of =your ·incontinence. 6 [y]Now this I am saying [ac]as a concession, not [ac]as an injunction. 7 For I [lwant all human beings to be as I myself also, but each [lhas his own gracious gift [o]from God, [w]one indeed thus, yet [w]one thus.

8 [y]Now I am saying to the unmarried and the widows, that it is ideal for them if ever they should remain +even as I. 9 Yet if they are not controlling° themselves, let them marry, for it is better to marry than to be on [lfire°.

10 *y*Now to the °married I am charging, not I, but the Lord: A wife is not to be separated from her husband. 11 Yet if she should be separated also, let her ˡremain unmarried or be conciliated to her ˙husband. And a husband is not to ˡleave his wife.

12 *y*Now to the rest am I´ *sa*speaking, not the Lord. If any brother ˡhas an unbelieving wife, and she´ ˡapproves of making a home with him, let him not ˡleave her. 13 And a wife who*a* ˡhas an unbelieving husband, and he´ ˡapproves of making a home with her, let her not ˡleave her ˙husband. 14 For the unbelieving ˙husband is °hallowed° *i*by the wife, and the unbelieving ˙wife is °hallowed° *i*by the brother, else consequently ⁼your ˙children are unclean. Yet now they are holy. 15 Yet if the unbeliever is separating°, let him ˡseparate°. A ˙brother or a ˙sister is not °enslaved° in ˙such a case. *y*Now ˙God has called us in peace. 16 For of *a*what are you °aware, wife—if will you be saving your ˙husband—or of *a*what are you °aware, husband—if will you be saving your ˙wife—17 except as the Lord parts it to each?

Each as ˙God has called him, thus let him be walking. And thus am I prescribing° in all the ecclesias. 18 Is anyone called having been circumcised°? Let him not be ˡde-circumcised°. Is anyone °called° in uncircumcision? Let him not ˡcircumcise°. 19 ˙Circumcision is nothing, and ˙uncircumcision is nothing, but the keeping of the precepts of God. 20 Each one in the calling in which he is called, in this let him be remaining. 21 Are you called a slave? Let it not be causing you care. But if you are ˡable° to become° free also, use it rather. 22 For, in the Lord, he ˙who is ⁻being called a slave is the Lord's freedman. Likewise, he ˙who is ⁻being called, being free, is a slave of Christ. 23 With a price are ⁼you bought. Do not ˡbecome° the slaves of human beings. 24 Each one, in what he is called, brethren, in this let him ˡremain *b*with God.

25 *y*Now concerning the celibates or virgins, I ˡhave no*t* injunction of the Lord. Yet an opinion am I giving, as one who ˡhas enjoyed mercy° by the Lord to be faithful. 26 I am inferring then this ideal to be ˡinherent, because of the °present necessity, *t*for it is ideal for humanity ˙to be thus. 27 You are °bound° to a wife? Do not ˡseek to be loosed. You have been loosed° from a wife? Do not ˡseek a wife. 28 Yet if you ever should marry, also, you do not sin. And if the virgin should marry, she does not sin. Yet affliction in the flesh will ˙such be having. Yet I´ am sparing° ⁼you.

29 *y*Now this I am averring, brethren, the era is °limited°; that ˙furthermore, ˙those also having wives may be as not having them, 30 and ˙those lamenting as not lamenting, and ˙those rejoicing as not rejoicing, and ˙those buying as not retaining, 31 and ˙those using° this ˙world as not using° it up. For the fashion of this ˙world is passing by.

32 *y*Now I ˡwant ⁼you to be without worry. The unmarried one is ˡsolicitous about the things of the Lord, how he should please the Lord. 33 Yet he ˙who marries is ˡsolicitous about the things of the world, how he should please his ˙wife, 34 and is °parted°. The unmarried ˙woman as well as the virgin: the unmarried one is ˡsolicitous about the things of the Lord, that she may be holy in ˙body as well as in ˙spirit, yet she ˙who marries is ˡsolicitous about the things of the world, how she should please her ˙husband. 35 *y*Now this I am saying *td*for ⁼your *s*own ˙expedience, not that I should cast a noose *on*over ⁼you, but *td*for ˙that which is respectable and assiduous—to be undistractedly for the Lord.

36 *y*Now if anyone is inferring it to be ˡindecent *on*for his ˙virgin, if she should be over her meridian, and thus it ˡought to ˡoccur°, what he ˡwill, let him ˡdo. He is not sinning. Let them ˡmarry. 37 Yet he who °stands settled in his ˙heart, having no necessity, yet ˡhas authority *c*as to his ˙own will, and has decided this in his ˙own heart (to be keeping his*sf* ˙virgin) ideally will be doing. 38 So that he also ˙who is taking his*sf* ˙virgin in marriage, ideally will be doing, yet he ˙who is not taking out in marriage will be doing better.

39 A wife is ˚bound˚ by law on for whatever time her ˙husband is living. Yet if the husband should be put to repose, she is free to be married to whom she ˡwill, only in the Lord. 40 Yet happier is she if ever she should remain thus, according to my ˙opinion. y Now I ˡpresume that I also ˡhave God's spirit.

8 y Now concerning the idol sacrifices: We are ˚aware that we all ˡhave knowledge. ˙Knowledge is puffing up, yet ˙love is building up. 2 If anyone is presuming to ˚know anything, he knows not as yet according as he ˡmust know. 3 y Now if anyone is loving ˙God, this one is ˚known˚ by Him. 4 Then concerning the feeding on the idol sacrifices: We are ˚aware that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is noth* d other God except One. 5 For ⁺even if so be that there are those being termed˚ gods, whether in heaven or on earth, even as there are many gods and many lords, 6 bt nevertheless for us there is one God, the Father, out of Whom ˙all is, and we io for Him, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through Whom ˙all is, and we through Him. 7 But not in all is there ˙this knowledge. y Now a some, ˙used hitherto to the idol, are eating of it as an idol sacrifice, and their ˙conscience, being weak, is being polluted˚. 8 y Now food will not give us a standing with ˙God; neither if we should not eat are we made ˡdeficient˚, nor if we should eat are we superabounding in this.

9 y Now ˡbeware lest somehow this ˙right of ⁼yours may become˚ a stumbling block to the weak. 10 For if anyone should p see you, ˙who ˡhas knowledge, lying˚ down in an idol's shrine, will not the conscience of him who ˡis weak be ˡinured io to the eating of the idol sacrifices? 11 For the ˡweak one is perishing˚ also i by your ˙knowledge; the brother because of whom Christ dies. 12 y Now in thus sinning io against ˙brethren, and beating their ˡweak ˙conscience, ⁼you are sinning io against Christ. 13 Wherefore, if food is snaring my ˙brother, I may under no circumstances eat ⁼meat io for the eon, lest I should snare my ˙brother.

9 Am I not free? Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus our ˙Lord? Are ⁼you´ not my ˙work in the Lord? 2 If to others I am not an apostle, bt nevertheless I surely am to ⁼you! For you´ are the seal of my ˙apostleship in the Lord.

3 My ˙defense to ˙those examining me is this: 4 ˡHave we no right at nt all to eat and drink? 5 ˡHave we no right at nt all to be leading about a sister as a wife, ⁺even as the rest of the apostles and the brothers of the Lord and Cephas? 6 Or ˡhave only I and Barnabas not* right not to be working˚? 7 a Who is warring˚ at any time supplying his own rations? a Who is planting a vineyard and not eating o of its ˙fruit? Or a who is tending a flock and not eating o of the milk of the flock?

8 Not according to a human am I speaking these things. Or is the law not also saying these things? 9 For in the law of Moses it is ˚written˚: You shall not ˡmuzzle the threshing ox. Not for ˙oxen is the ˡcare of ˙God! 10 Or is He undoubtedly saying it because of us? Because of us, for it is written that the ˡplower ˡought to be plowing on in expectation, and the ˡthresher to ˡpartake of his ˙expectation. 11 If, on in expectation, we´ sow the ⁼spiritual in ⁼you, is it a great thing if we´ shall ˡreap of ⁼your ˙fleshly things? 12 If others are partaking of ˙this right from ⁼you, are not rather we? bt Nevertheless we do not use˚ this ˙right, but we are forgoing all, lest we may give any hindrance to the evangel of ˙Christ.

13 Are ⁼you not ˚aware that the ˡworkers˚ at the sacred things are eating of the things o of the sanctuary? ˙Those settling beside the altar have their ˡportion˚ with the altar. 14 Thus the Lord also prescribes that ˙those who are announcing the evangel are to be living o of the evangel. 15 Yet I´ do not use˚ nt any of these things. y Now I do not write these things that it may become° thus i·with me, for it is my ideal rather to die, than that anyone shall be making my ·boast void.

16 For if I should be bringing the evangel°, it is not for me to boast in, for necessity is lying° on me, for it were woe to me if I should not bring the evangel°! 17 For if I am engaging in this voluntarily, I ˡhave wages, yet if involuntarily, I have been entrusted° with an administration. 18 a·What then is my ·wage? That, in bringing the evangel°, I should place the evangel without expense, so io·as not ·to use° up my ·authority in the evangel.

19 For being free o of all, I enslave myself to all, that I should gain the more. 20 And I become° to the Jews as a Jew, that I should gain Jews; to ·those under law as under law (not being s·myself under law), that I should gain ·those under law; 21 to ·those without law as without law (not being without God's law, but legally Christ's), that I should gain ·those without law. 22 I become° as weak to the weak, that I should gain the weak. To ·all have I become all, that I should undoubtedly save a·some. 23 y·Now all am I doing because of the evangel, that I may become° a joint participant of it.

24 Are ⁼you not ˚aware that ·those racing in a stadium are indeed all racing, yet one is obtaining the prize? Thus be racing that you may grasp it. 25 y·Now every ·ˡcontender° is controlling° himself in all things; t·they indeed then, that they may obtain a corruptible wreath, yet we an incorruptible. 26 Now then, thus am I´ racing, not as dubious, thus am I boxing, not as punching the air, 27 but I am belaboring my ·body and leading it into slavery, lest somehow, when ⁻heralding to others, I s·myself may become° disqualified.

10 For I do not ˡwant ⁼you to be ˡignorant, brethren, that our ·fathers all were under the cloud, and all pass th through the sea, 2 and all are baptized into ·Moses in the cloud and in the sea, 3 and all eat the same spiritual food, 4 and all drink the same spiritual drink, for they drank o of the spiritual Rock which ˡfollowed. y·Now the Rock was ·Christ.

5 But not in the majority of them does ·God delight, for they are strewn along in the wilderness. 6 y·Now these things become types of us, io·for us not ·to be lusters after evil things, according as t·they´ also lust. 7 Nor yet be becoming° idolaters, according as a·some of them, even as it is ˚written°, Seated are the people to eat and drink, and they rise to ˡsport. Ex 32:6 8 Nor yet may we be committing prostitution, according as a·some of them commit prostitution, and fall in one day twenty-three thousand. Nu 25:1-9 9 Nor yet may we be putting the Lord on trial, according as a·some of them put Him on trial, and perished° by ·serpents. Nu 21:4-6 10 Nor yet be murmuring even as a·some of them murmur, and perish° by the exterminator.

11 y·Now all ⁼this befalls t·them typically. Yet it is written td·for our admonition, io·to whom the consummations of the eons have attained. 12 So that, let him ·who is supposing he ˚stands ˡbeware that he should not fall. 13 Not* trial has taken ⁼you except what is human. y·Now faithful is ·God, Who will not be leaving ⁼you to be tried above what ⁼you are ˡable°, but, together with the trial, will be making the sequel also, ·to enable° ⁼you to ˡundergo it.

14 Wherefore, my beloved, ˡflee from ·idolatry. 15 As to the prudent am I saying it. Judge ⁼you´ what I am averring. 16 The cup of ·blessing which we are blessing, is it not the communion of the blood of ·Christ? The bread which we are breaking, is it not the communion of the body of ·Christ? 17 t·For we, ·who are many, are one bread, one body, for we ·all are partaking o of the one bread.

18 ˡObserve ·Israel according to the flesh. Are not ·those eating the sacrifices participants with the altar? 19 a·What then am I averring? That an idol sacrifice is anything? Or that an idol is anything? [20] But that that which the nations are sacrificing, they are sacrificing to demons and not to God. [y]Now I do not [l]want [=]you to [l]become[°] participants with the demons. [21] [=]You [l]can[°] not [l]drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons. [=]You [l]can[°] not be partaking of the table of the Lord and the table of demons. [22] Or are we provoking the Lord to jealousy? Not stronger than He are we!

[23] All is [l]allowed me, but not all is [l]expedient. All is [l]allowed me, but not all is edifying. [24] Let no one be seeking the welfare of himself, but ·that of [·d]another. [25] Everything ·that is [l]sold[°] [i]at the meat market be eating, examining nothing because of ·conscience. [26] For the Lord's is the earth and ·that which fills it.[Ps 24:1]

[27] If anyone of the unbelievers is inviting [=]you, and [=]you [l]want to [l]go[°], be eating everything ·that is [l]placed[°] before [=]you, examining nothing because of ·conscience. [28] Yet if anyone should say to [=]you, This is a sacred sacrifice, do not [l]eat, because of that one ·who divulges it, and ·conscience. [29] Yet conscience, I am saying, not ·that of yourself, but ·that of [·d]another. For why is my ·freedom being decided[°] by another's conscience? [30] If I′, with gratitude, am partaking, [a]why am I being calumniated[°] [ov]for that for which I′ am giving thanks? [31] Then whether [=]you are eating or drinking, or anything [=]you are doing, [l]do all [io]for the glory of God. [32] And [l]become[°] not a stumbling block to Jews as well as to Greeks and to the ecclesia of ·God, [33] according as I′ also am pleasing all in all things, not seeking my [sf]own ·expedience, but ·that of the many, that they may be saved. 11 [l]Become[°] imitators of me, according as I also am of Christ.

[2] [y]Now I am applauding [=]you that [=]you [°]remember[°] all of mine, and are retaining the traditions according as I give them over to [=]you. [3] [y]Now I [l]want [=]you to be aware that the Head of every man is ·Christ, yet the head of the woman is the man, yet the Head of ·Christ is ·God.

[4] Every man praying[°] or prophesying having aught [ag]on his head, is disgracing his ·Head. [5] Yet every woman praying[°] or prophesying with uncovered ·head is disgracing her ·head, for it is one and the same as ·being [°]shaven[°]. [6] For if a woman is not covering[°], let her be shorn[°] also. [y]Now if it is a shame for a woman ·to be shorn[°] or shaven[°], let her be covering[°]. [7] For a man indeed [l]ought not to be covering[°] his ·head, being inherently the image and glory of God. Yet the woman is the glory of the man. [8] For man is not out of woman, but woman out of man. [9] For also, man is not created because of the woman, but woman because of the man. [10] Therefore the woman [l]ought to [l]have authority [on]over her ·head because of the messengers. [11] However, neither is woman apart from man, nor man apart from woman, in the Lord. [12] For even as the woman is out of the man, thus the man also is through the woman, yet ·all is [o] of ·God.

[13] Judge in yourselves[s]: Is it becoming in a woman to be praying[°] to ·God uncovered? [14] Is not [y]even ·nature [s]itself teaching [=]you that if a man indeed should have [l]tresses, it is a dishonor to him, [15] yet if a woman should have [l]tresses, it is her glory, seeing that ·tresses have been given[°] her instead of clothing? [16] [y]Now if anyone is presuming to be rivalrous, we′ [l]have no[t] such usage, neither the ecclesias of ·God.

[17] [y]Now in giving this charge I am not applauding, [t]for [=]you are coming[°] together, not [io]for the better, but [io]for ·discomfiture. [18] For first indeed at [=]your coming[°] together in the ecclesia, I am hearing of schisms inhering among [=]you, and [a]some part I am believing. [19] For it [l]must be that there are sects also among [=]you, that ·those also who are qualified may become[°] apparent among [=]you.

[20] Then, at [=]your coming[°] together [on]in the same place, it is not to eat the Lord's dinner, 21 for each one is getting his ˙own dinner before in the eating, and w˙one indeed is ˡhungry, yet w˙one is ˡdrunk. 22 For ˡhave ˣyou no homes at nt˙all io˙in ˙which to ˡeat and ˡdrink? Or are ˣyou despising the ecclesia of ˙God, and mortifying ˙those who ˡhave nothing? a˙What may I say to ˣyou? Should I applaud ˣyou in this? I am not applauding.

23 For I′ accept from the Lord, what I give over also to ˣyou, that the Lord Jesus, in the night in which He was given° up, takes bread, 24 and ⁻giving thanks, breaks it and says, This is My ˙body, ˙ˡbroken° ov˙for ˣyour sakes. This ˡdo io˙for a ˙recollection of Me.

25 Similarly, the cup also, after ˙dining, saying, This ˙cup is the new covenant in My ˙blood. This ˡdo, as often as ˣyou m are drinking, io˙for a ˙recollection of Me. 26 For as often as ˣyou m are eating this ˙bread and drinking this ˙cup, ˣyou are announcing the Lord's ˙death until w He should come.

27 So that, whoever m˙should be eating the bread or drinking the cup of the Lord unworthily, will be liable for the body and the blood of the Lord. 28 y˙Now let a human ˡtest himself first, and thus let him ˡeat o of the bread and ˡdrink o of the cup. 29 For he ˙who is eating and drinking unworthily is eating and drinking judgment to himself, not discriminating the body of the Lord. 30 Therefore many among ˣyou are infirm and ailing, and a considerable number are reposing°. 31 For if we adjudicated ourselves, we would not be judged°. 32 Yet, being judged°, we are being disciplined° by the Lord, that we may not be condemned tg˙with the world.

33 So that, my brethren, when coming° together io ˙to eat, be waiting° for one another. 34 y˙Now if anyone may be ˡhungry, let him ˡeat i˙at home, that ˣyou may not be coming° together io˙for judgment. y˙Now the rest I shall be prescribing° as soon as I should come.

THE WORD OF THE CROSS

For the word of the cross is stupidity indeed to those who are perishing, yet to us who are being saved it is God's power (1 Cor.1:18).

SHALL we, too, be writing stupidity and be penning utter foolishness? Does not the apostle Paul describe our subject as "stupidity indeed"? Have we not confirmation of this in the writings and sayings of many who profess to be wise in the world? Do not most of them expose their lack of interest in the theme by ignoring it completely!

Yes, Paul describes "the word of the cross" as "stupidity indeed to those who are perishing," but then he adds by way of contrast, "yet to us who are being saved it is the power of God." And then the apostle proceeds, in perhaps the most scathing terms since Jesus lashed the scribes and Pharisees, to denounce the wisdom of the supposedly wise men of this eon, who seek in their own ways, and often without reference to God at all, to settle the great problems that only God can resolve. They seek salvation through science, and peace through philosophy; God provides both through the cross. But let us see what Paul says:

"For it is written, I shall be destroying the wisdom of the wise, and the understanding of the intelligent shall I be repudiating. Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the discusser of this eon? Does not God make stupid the wisdom of this world? For since, in fact, in the wisdom of God, the world through wisdom knows not God, God delights, through the stupidity of the heralding, to save those who are believing, since, in fact, Jews signs are requesting, and Greeks wisdom are seeking, yet we are heralding Christ crucified, to Jews, indeed, a snare, yet to the nations stupidity, yet to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God, for the stupidity of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men" (1 Cor.1:19-25).

Now what does all this mean? There was some reason why humanity as a whole could not easily accept the teaching of Paul concerning the cross. The Jews, who were highly religious, viewed the matter with suspicion—to them the cross was a snare. The nations who were highly cultured, viewed it with disdain—to them the cross was stupidity. We may see why later. But for the moment let us realize this, that though Paul occasionally speaks of "my evangel," as in Romans 2:16, he never claims to be the author of it. Quite the contrary. In the very first verse of his Roman epistle, he explains that he has been severed, or separated, from the rest to proclaim the evangel of God, which, in verse 16 of the same chapter, he declares to be "God's power for salvation to everyone who is believing—to the Jew first and to the Greek as well."

Yes, to those who are called, whether Jew or Greek, this evangel, which has for its keystone the word of the cross, is both the power of God and the wisdom of God, and it is something separate and distinct from anything that had been proclaimed before. It is fundamental to the purpose of God, and yet there are some peculiar things about this teaching of the cross.

For instance, if the cross is so important a feature of God's operations as Paul maintains, how is it that John never refers to it in his later writings? There is no mention of the cross in any of his three epistles, nor in the book of Revelation, the Unveiling of Jesus Christ, which he also wrote. True, we find allusions to "the blood of Christ" and "the blood of the Lambkin," but the cross is not mentioned. Why, again, has Peter, in his two letters, nothing to say about the cross of Christ? Or James? Or Jude? If the word of the cross is as important as Paul suggests, how is it that all these others (who, after all, were contemporary with Paul) seem to ignore it?

This is a question which all believers must face up to. It implies—it must imply—that Paul was giving a different message from the rest. If, as we surely believe, Peter, James, John and Jude all spoke as they were moved by the holy Spirit, then, without doubt, they too would have been impelled to speak of the cross if it had been essential to their messages. We are forced to conclude that there is one great difference at least between the evangel as proclaimed by Paul, and that proclaimed by Peter, James, John and Jude, and that this distinction is to be found in their relationship and attitude to the cross of Christ.

For look how freely and emphatically Paul speaks of the cross. In 1 Corinthians 1:17 he expresses a concern lest, in his own preaching, the cross of Christ should be made void; and in the next verse he describes the word of the cross as the power of God to those who are being saved. A little later, in verse 23, he infers that, in his preaching of "Christ crucified," he is in fact proclaiming "Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God." Again, in the second chapter, he affirms his decision "not to perceive anything among you except Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." And yet Peter, James, John and Jude have nothing to say about the cross of Christ.

To put the matter simply, we would suggest that Peter, John, James and Jude are writing to a people who have not yet come to the cross of Christ, and therefore they find no occasion to mention it. Paul, on the other hand, is addressing a message to some who have reached the cross, and, indeed, have continued further with it. Therefore, he refers to it freely. Peter and those with him are looking forward to the millennial reign of Christ in which many glorious things will be happening, particularly in relation to Israel and through Israel to the rest of humanity, but a time in which, nevertheless, the effects of what was accomplished on the cross will not be observed. After all, Jesus presented Himself to Israel as their King, and proclaimed and practiced the evangel of the Kingdom, before ever He was crucified. Paul takes us by faith into a time beyond the Millennium—into the fifth eon, the Day of God—an era in which the effects of the cross will be fully operative. And—wonder of wonders and grace beyond measure—he even invites us to enjoy the benefits of those effects over one thousand years in advance—now. This we do in spirit, and by faith. To find out what these benefits are—what the message of the cross really is—we must look at what Paul has to say about it.

THE OLD HUMANITY CRUCIFIED

Now you may be surprised to learn that the word "cross" never occurs in Paul's great epistle to the Romans—the first of his writings as they appear in our versions. In a letter which deals with such fundamental matters as justification, conciliation, and God's sovereignty, one might have thought that a mention of the cross would be indispensable. It is certainly there by implication, but the word "cross" itself is absent. It is implied in the one usage of the verb form, "crucify," and this, in its context, is significant, for it gives us the real clue to the meaning of the message of the cross. This is what Paul says:

"What, then, shall we declare? That we may be persisting in sin that grace should be increasing? May it not be coming to that! We, who died to sin, how shall we still be living in it? Or are you ignorant that whoever are baptized into Christ Jesus, are baptized into His death? We, then, were entombed together with Him through baptism into death, that, even as Christ was roused from among the dead through the glory of the Father, thus we also should be walking in newness of life. For if we have become planted together in the likeness of His death, nevertheless we shall be of the resurrection also, knowing this, that our old humanity was crucified together with Him, that the body of Sin may be nullified, for us by no means to be still slaving for Sin, for one who dies has been justified from Sin" (Rom.6:1-7).

"Knowing this, that our old humanity was crucified together with Him, that the body of Sin may be nullified"—that is, brought to nought. Paul is simply telling us that there is no place for this body of Sin in the evangel of salvation which he is proclaiming. He confirms this in his letters to the Corinthians and Galatians. Let us look at Corinthians first.

The brethren at Corinth had acquired a not very enviable reputation on account of their panderings to the vices and lusts of the flesh. This was evidenced by their petty quarreling, by their strifes and divisions among themselves, and even by other practices that had been heard of among them. It is as a counter to all this that Paul, when he writes to them, lays such stress on the significance of the cross. "The word of the cross," he declares is "the power of God"; "Christ crucified," the "power of God and the wisdom of God." Far from pandering to the passions of the old humanity, tied to a dying flesh, they should have been thinking in terms of a new humanity, which comes with a new creation. "If anyone is in Christ," Paul tells them in his second letter, "there is a new creation: the primitive passed by. Lo! There has come new!" (2 Cor.5:17).

The new creation is something entirely of God, and shows forth His power and His wisdom. In His sight, the old humanity of a believer in Christ has had its day. It is regarded as being crucified on the same cross as that on which God's Son was crucified. The Corinthians should have seen it that way. And so, too, should we look upon our bodies of Sin. They cannot help our spiritual life in any way; rather, they only hinder. They cannot contribute one iota of merit towards our salvation; they cannot even in the most minute degree please God. No dying body can, and these are, in fact, dying all the time, as every ache and pain testifies. Then why not reckon them as being dead already! In the words of Romans 6:11, "Be reckoning yourselves to be dead, indeed, to Sin, yet living to God in Christ Jesus, our Lord."

But to be living in Christ implies a new creation. What a privilege, indeed, that God counts us as living to Him, even while we are physically retarded by these bodies of humiliation; but that is only because His Son dealt with the problem of sin in the flesh once and for all time on the cross, and our bodies of Sin are reckoned by God as having been crucified on the same cross.

The Galatian case is rather different from that of the Corinthians. Their fault lay in trying to exalt the flesh, to give it an honor and a prominence to which it was not entitled. They sought to enforce the law of Moses on the basis that the flesh ought to be able to justify itself by keeping the law. Paul had to point out that "by works of law shall no flesh at all be justified" (Gal.2:16). Far from bringing credit to the flesh, the law only made sin in the flesh more manifest. Every additional commandment was one more to break. He asks them a direct question, "Undertaking in spirit, are you now being completed in flesh?" (Gal.3:3). The works of the flesh are given as adultery, wantonness, enmities, strifes, jealousies, dissentions, etc.; the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control. "Those of Christ Jesus," says Paul, "crucify the flesh with its passions and lusts" (Gal.5:24).

The Galatians were even being pressed to return to circumcision—the ritual which God had established with Abraham— but Paul counters this by saying that it had now become merely a means of glorifying the flesh. And then he adds, "Now may it not be mine to be boasting, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world. For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is anything, but a new creation." (Gal.6:14,15).

Again, a new creation. The word of the cross demands a new creation. Peter, James, John and Jude have nothing to say about this. They are looking for a new birth, in conformity with the words of Jesus to Nicodemus, "You must be begotten anew" (John 3:7). They are looking for a new birth within the framework of Israel's promises (cf Isa. 66:8); this is a vastly different thing from a new creation outside of Israel's promises. The new birth is a national blessing to fit Israel for the Kingdom, the thousand-year reign of Christ on earth; the new creation is an individual blessing, and transports us in spirit past the millennial eon into the day of God, and fits us for our celestial destiny.

When Paul speaks of a new creation, he means "new" in every sense—new absolutely. This is not the case with Israel during the millennial eon, for Israel is but a nation reborn, of the same stock as the nation originally born at Sinai. In fact, the promises originally made to Israel at Sinai are repeated to the regenerated nation by Peter in his first epistle, when he calls them a "royal priesthood," a "holy nation." During the thousand years they will serve humanity as a priestly nation, fulfilling the functions originally assigned to them at Sinai, but which were lost to the old nation through its repeated idolatry.

But in spite of the new birth, and in spite of all that the regenerated nation of Israel can do during the millennial eon, let us not forget that it all ends in a tremendous rebellion against God, when Satan is loosed out of his prison, and he comes to deceive all nations which are in the four corners of the earth, to be mobilizing them for battle, their number being as the sand of the sea. This tremendous event is followed by the judgment of the great white throne, and in Revelation 20:11 we read that from the face of Him Who sits upon the throne, earth and heaven flee, and no place is found for them. They just cannot abide in the presence of the absolute righteousness and purity of the majestic Occupant of the throne. And John goes on to describe how all those who appear before the throne are judged in accord with their acts, and are condemned. This is the final condemnation of the flesh, and all that has been done in the flesh. But this is not the end, for John next perceives "a new heaven and a new earth, for the former heaven and the former earth pass away." And all the sorrow and mourning and misery connected with them pass away, too, for He Who is sitting upon the throne declares that He is making all new. This is in line with what Isaiah had prophesied centuries earlier when he said, "For behold Me creating new heavens and a new earth, and the former shall not be remembered, nor shall they come up on the heart" (Isa.65:17, CV).

This is the new creation, which John perceives only at the end of his visions, but to which Paul is pointing from the very beginning of his writings. The great point to be noted is that there is a complete break with the old. Nothing is carried over. And so it is, too, with the advance application of the new creation, as it affects a believer in Christ in this day of grace. "The primitive [the old] is passed by. Lo! There has come new."

The cross demands a complete break with the old, and provides the way for the provision of a glorious alternative in the new. To those who are not prepared to make this break, the word of the cross is just stupidity; for in clinging to the old, they must perforce be like the Corinthians, and pander to the desires of the flesh, or like the Galatians, and give the flesh an importance to which it is not entitled. It is in these two factors that many sincere believers, who are also religionists, become enemies of the cross of Christ.

But to see the full effects of the cross, and to appreciate its message in even greater grandeur, we must now turn to the prison letters of Paul.

A TRILOGY FROM PRISON

It used to be a practice among Greek writers to enter literary competitions in which they had to submit what was termed a trilogy, that is, three pieces with themes related to each other. Generally these were tragedies. Only a few specimens are now extant. But no trilogy submitted by any Greek writer for a competition could even remotely approach in grandeur the wonderful trio of letters written by Paul, which have come down to us as the epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians. We have compared them to a Greek trilogy only because we wish to emphasize that they should be regarded as a trio, with themes that are connected, and not as individual messages. There is, of course, nothing of a tragedy about them. On the contrary, their grandeur lies in the fact that they expand our conception of God's purpose to include the whole universe. Whereas earlier writings, not excluding those of Paul, have their settings on earth, the prison letters usher us straight into the vastnesses of the celestial realms. Outside of the prison letters, we have God's salvation extended to all mankind; inside the prison letters, it reaches out to include heaven as well.

Now, one of the most interesting features of the prison letters is that in each one we have a remarkable description of Christ. The wider scope of these letters makes these descriptions necessary, and, as we examine them, we find that they are connected in a wonderful way. Let us do this, taking the Colossian account first.

Here we find Christ in His relationship to the motive behind all God's operations. God's purpose was conceived in love, which finds its first and greatest expression in "the Son of His love" (Col.1:13). It is as the Son of God's love that Christ is presented to us in this epistle, where He is also declared to be "the Image of the invisible God, Firstborn of every creature, for in Him is all created, that in the heavens and that on the earth, the visible and the invisible, whether thrones, or lordships, or sovereignties, or authorities, all is created through Him and for Him, and He is before all, and all has its cohesion in Him."

Here we are among the heights indeed. These are the mountain peaks—the Himalayas of the Scriptures. And we are among the heights again when we come to the Ephesian description of Christ, for there He is portrayed as being seated at the right hand of God, among the celestials, "up over every sovereignty and authority and power and lordship, and every name that is named, not only in this eon, but also in that which is impending." It is in this account that Christ is given "as Head over all, to the ecclesia which is His body, the complement of the One Who is completing the all in all" (Eph.1:20-23). So, in Ephesians, we have Christ portrayed in His relationship to the ecclesia, the medium through which God's purpose is to be accomplished.

But what about the Philippian account? The description of Christ takes us again into the heights. On the one hand, we have Him "inherently in the form of God" and deeming it "not pillaging to be equal with God," and on the other hand, we have Him highly exalted, and graced "with the name that is above every name." No heights can be higher than these, but between them, what do we find? A deep chasm, an almost bottomless rift, at the foot of which lies the cross. For He Who was in the form of God emptied Himself of all His pristine glory to take upon Himself the form of a slave, coming to be in the likeness of humanity, and having done that, descended the valley still farther by humbling Himself and "becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil.2:5-9).

In this Philippian portrayal of Christ, we see Him in His relationship to the means by which God's purpose is to be accomplished. That means is the cross, and here the theme of the cross takes on a more profound significance. For the depths of a valley can best be appreciated from a vantage point on the heights, for then we can look straight down into the gulf below. That is exactly what we do in the letter to the Philippians. We endeavor to place ourselves (mentally) in the position that Christ occupied when He was in the form of God, and then, peering down, try to comprehend all that is included in the death of the cross. It is not just the death of Christ that counts, but all that goes with it—all that was attached to the cross—the degradation, the shame, the ignominy, the opprobrium, and above all the separation from God. For the cross was an execution stake for malefactors and murderers, and carried with it a curse.

If you really want to see what is implied in the term, "Christ crucified," which Paul was so determined to preach to the Corinthians, go to the Philippian epistle. No two words can be wider apart, yet they are brought together. Christ, the Anointed of God, once on the heights in the form of God, and deeming it not pillaging to be equal with God, yet now crucified, cursed among the malefactors at the bottom of the abyss. Cursed (Gal.3:13) because it was to the cross that He nailed the old humanity with all its sin and wickedness, thereby settling the problem of sin once and for all. Truly, the depths of the Philippian epistle are the depths of love!

Now, what about the effects of the cross?

The Philippian account gives us the effects of the cross on Christ Himself. "Wherefore, also," continues the apostle—that is, because He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross—"God highly exalts Him, and graces Him with the name that is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should be bowing, celestial and terrestrial and subterranean, and every tongue should be acclaiming that Jesus Christ is Lord, for the glory of God, the Father." Praise be to God!

The glory with which God graces His Son because of His obedience unto the death of the cross, is such that it not only exalts Christ above all else in the universe, but also brings all creation into recognition and acceptance of this fact. Every knee will bow to Him, every tongue will acclaim Him as Lord. All in earth and heaven will ultimately rejoice in Him as their Saviour, for it is at the name of Jesus that every knee will bow. Truly He will see the travail of His soul and be satisfied. And God too will be satisfied, for the acclaim that will be given to His Son is in accord with His own will and purpose, and will redound to His own great glory, for the Son is the One in Whom He constantly delights.

The Ephesian letter gives us also the effect of the cross on the ecclesia. It has a peace-making influence, settling differences between members. At the time Paul was writing, the most vital difference was that which divided the nation of Israel from the rest of humanity. This was a fleshly difference, inaugurated by God through the covenant which He made with Abraham, and marked by the rite of circumcision. For many centuries Israel had been the favored nation, and will be again during the coming millennial era. But see what Paul says in Ephesians 2, verses 11-18:

"Wherefore, remember that once you, the nations in flesh—who are termed 'Uncircumcision' by those termed 'Circumcision,' in flesh, made by hands—that you were, in that era, apart from Christ, being alienated from the citizenship of Israel, and guests of the promise covenants, having no expectation, and without God in the world. Yet now, in Christ Jesus, you, who once are far off, are become near by the blood of Christ. For He is our Peace, Who makes both one, and razes the central wall of the barrier (the enmity in His flesh), nullifying the law of precepts in decrees, that He should be creating the two, in Himself, into one new humanity, making peace; and should be reconciling both in one body to God through the cross, killing the enmity in it. And, coming, He brings the evangel of peace to you, those afar, and peace to those near, for through Him we both have had the access, in one spirit, to the Father."

There are those today who would strive to make the unity of the church. The unity was made nearly two thousand years ago—on the cross! Ephesians goes on to ask us to keep the unity of the spirit with the tie of peace. Ephesians emphasizes unities—one . . . one . . . one! One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one expectation, and so on (Eph.4:4,5). And if the cross effectively kills the racial enmity between Israel and the nations, so that those of either group can be at peace with each other in the ecclesia, we may be sure that it equally effectively kills all other fleshly enmities. In the flesh we may be of different nationalities, different colors, different sexes, yes, even of different sects, but if we are called believers, members of that one ecclesia which exists today, the ecclesia which is His body, we should recognize that the cross kills all these barriers to unity, and try to live as an example to the universe, doing our utmost to keep the unity of the spirit with the tie of peace.

Let us then be done with idle words, with thoughtless remarks, with petty complaints, with unnecessary criticisms, with everything that might hurt or offend, for such things are of the flesh, and tend to destroy peace. It is necessary that we should remain in the flesh for the time being, for we have a mission of peace in the world. As ambassadors for Christ, we preach conciliation (2 Cor. 5:20). God is holding out the hand of friendship to all who will grasp it. But how can we preach peace--how can we be true ambassadors of the Prince of peace—if we allow strifes to arise among ourselves? Discords are evidences of the old humanity reasserting itself; by just so much as we give encouragement to the flesh do we become enemies of the cross of Christ. Let us never forget that the term "enemies of the cross" is used of those who are not walking according to the model offered by Paul (Phil.3:18,19). It was against a background of dissentions among such brethren that Paul preached his word of the cross (1 Cor.3:3,4).

The prison letters abound with advice as to how we should conduct ourselves, and rightly so, for we are God's achievement, being created in Christ Jesus for good works, and what is being accomplished in the ecclesia today is but a sample, a demonstration, of what will be accomplished throughout the universe tomorrow. Colossians opens up the field, and gives the widest possible application of the message of the cross, extending its effect to the whole of God's creations. Here we read:

"And He [Christ] is the head of the body, the ecclesia, Who is Sovereign, Firstborn from among the dead, that in all He may be becoming first, for in Him the entire complement delights to dwell, and through Him to reconcile all to Him (making peace through the blood of His cross), through Him, whether those on the earth or those in the heavens" (Col.1:18-20).

UNIVERSAL RECONCILIATION

This is the scripture which truly proclaims universal reconciliation. It is achieved through the blood of the cross. Because the One, Who was above all, descended to the point where He was below all; because the One, Who created all, humbled Himself to the point where He was accursed for all; the effects of the cross can, and will, be extended to incorporate every one of God's creation. For in that curse is included all the sin, all the iniquity, all the unrighteousness, that have plagued heaven and earth throughout the eons; in that curse is included all the enmity and alienation that have stood between God and His creatures; and they are crucified for all time!

This is the triumphant peace-making achievement of the love of God operating in the Son of His love. It is God's power for salvation, untouched and untainted by human effort, and it is all-sufficient, all-conquering, all-embracing, all-satisfying, and all-glorifying to God.

This is the Word of the Cross!

John H. Essex

THE MANNER OF CHRIST'S DEATH

The word of the cross has a far deeper significance than the death of Christ for our sins. It brings before us the manner of His death. The curse of the law was attached to such a death. It brought down the curse of God. On the human side, however, it showed what human religion and human wisdom can do. When God's Image was present among men they not only failed to appreciate Him, but displayed the innate hatred of their carnal religious hearts by dooming Him to the death of the vilest criminal. He Who spoke as never man spoke should have been welcomed by the wise men of the world, but they showed the essential stupidity of human wisdom by gibbeting the embodiment of all wisdom upon the ignominious cross. Yet God has made that scene of weakness and shame the brightest exhibition of His power and glory. Though it seems to sound the depths of powerless infamy, it eclipses all the power and wisdom of humanity. The word of the cross is still despised, but its proclamation is salvation to all who believe. The height and summit of human wisdom cannot reach to the divine folly.

THE HOLY SPIRIT

GOD'S LOVE has been poured out in our hearts through the holy spirit which is being given to us (Rom.5:5). Here is the spring of all true happiness.

It is the way of love to give. But God's spiritual blessings cannot be entertained except by His own spirit. Our spirits can grasp the things pertaining to humanity, but divine affairs lie beyond that sphere. And so, first of all, God gives us His spirit, preliminary to His further blessings. Thus we are enabled to perceive that which is being graciously given to us by God (1 Cor.2:10-13).

This is the channel through which His love has found entrance into our hearts. Only thus can we rejoice in trials, afflictions and distresses. Apart from its balmy strength they seem far more than we can bear. When the issue stands in doubt, the dread of future ill breeds death. But when we rest assured that His almighty power is guided by a heart whose every pulse beats thoughts of love to us, then we can bear with patience every test. And as we endure the storms in this, His strength, we become established, like the enduring oak whose sturdy trunk has drawn its strength from adverse winds. And so, stripped of that which pleases us below, our eyes turn upward and we rejoice in expectation. Not only that sorrows will then cease, and sighing flee away, but that we shall yet be all that we desire; yes, all that He desires, so that His love will find even in us a fit recompense and rest. O, to be like Him! to be with Him! We will satiate our hearts with Him.

THE EVANGEL IN ROMANS

PAUL'S epistle to the Romans answers questions which have dogged mankind for millennia. Unenlightened man asks: "Why is there so much evil in the world? and why does God—if there even is a God—do nothing about it?" Many are the philosophers who have tried and fallen far short in tackling this problem. Mankind asks: "With all the death in the world, how can God be righteous? Why doesn't He put an end to all the suffering and evil now?" Evil, sin and death, their source and ultimate removal, are dealt with in the Roman epistle.

First of all, Romans deals with God's evangel (1:1) concerning His Son (1:3). Those words, about God's evangel concerning His Son, which Paul wrote at the beginning of Romans were not meant to fill up space on parchment. Rather, they set the tone for the rest of the entire epistle. For instance, a musician looks at the very beginning of a particular song to see what key it is in along with the timing. He knows the key and timing affect the entire song. He doesn't start just anywhere in the song and hope it comes out okay. He starts at the very beginning. This is where we must start, at the very beginning of Romans, in order to see how it affects the rest of the epistle. In the very beginning of the Roman epistle, we are told this is God's evangel concerning His Son. It is God's good news concerning what His Son has accomplished for all mankind through His death, entombment and resurrection, and, in fact, accomplished for the entire creation. The apostle Paul greatly enlarges the scope of influence in the evangel, beyond its impact on humanity. In Romans chapters 1 though 5, he deals with the way in which all mankind are recipients of what two men did. In chapter 8 he broadens the scope of influence. He wrote: "The creation itself, also, shall be freed from the slavery of corruption into the glorious freedom of the children of God" (Rom 8:21). Oh glorious revelation! This future freedom, which we enjoy but a taste of now, will be glorious indeed! In this evangel, God's righteousness is being revealed (1:17).

Paul lays the groundwork in Romans 1:18 to 3:20, by showing both Jews and Greeks to be all under sin. All avoid Him. All sin and are wanting of the glory of God. But why is this so? Why is it that all sin and are in need of God's glory? Also, if Paul had ended his treatise at this point, how would this have revealed God's evangel, the good news, concerning His Son? How would this reveal God's righteousness? Paul surely would have failed his objective. He would have ended where philosophers end. But thankfully, God, in Whom all wisdom and knowledge are hid, has graciously given us the answer to the problem:

Yet now, apart from law, God's righteousness is °manifest° (being attested° by the law and the prophets), yet God's righteousness through Jesus Christ's faith io for all, and on all ·who are believing . . . (Rom.3:21, 22).

Christ's faith in going to the cross, fully relying on God to fix these problems, dying and putting the old humanity to death, and being roused out of death displays God's righteousness. God is right in what He does!

In Romans chapter 5 and verse 12, Paul explains concerning Adam and how sin entered the world, and also how death entered into all mankind on which all sinned. Had he ended at this point, where would be the full evangel? Where would be the good news from God concerning His Son? How would this reveal His righteousness? Rather, Paul builds up to verses eighteen and nineteen.

Two men, one act which each man did, and two outcomes affecting all mankind. For once a divine revelation which far surpasses the so-called wisdom of the sages and philosophers! This is the happy evangel concerning God's Son! Finally we see the outcome for humanity which God will get due to the obedience of His Son! What an incredible sacrifice it was to set things straight!

Therefore, even as through one human ·sin enters into the world, and through ·sin ·death, and thus ·death passes through into all =mankind, on which all sin—

Consequently then, as it is through one offense io for all =mankind io for condemnation, thus also it is through one righteous response io for all =mankind io for life's justifying. For even as through the disobedience of the one human the many are constituted sinners, thus also through the obedience of the One the many shall be !constituted righteous (Rom.5:12, 18, 19).

Why is there so much evil in the world? Man, without divine illumination, is incapable of properly addressing this question. Paul, in Romans, gives us the Divine side of the answer to evil, it's origin and eradication from the universe. In Romans chapter 8, the apostle pulls back the curtain, so to speak, and tells us concerning God doing something on purpose, doing something the creation did not volunteer for. He also tells us concerning God's goal to bring the creation into the glorious freedom of the children of God (Rom.8:19-21). This reveals to us that God is right in what He does. The end truly does justify the means!

For to ·vanity is the creation subjected, not voluntarily, but because of Him ·Who subjects it, on in expectation that the creation itself also shall be !freed from the slavery of ·corruption into the glorious ·freedom of the children of ·God (Rom.8:20, 21).

He really is "working all together for good" (8:28). Most atheists I have ever communicated with, focus only on the evil in the world. They are fixated on the evil which is wrecking lives. Their mantra is that there cannot be a God due to all the evil. They fail to see the forest for the trees. However, God desires us to come into a fuller appreciation of His evangel concerning His Son.

In Romans 9 through 11, Paul writes concerning the problem with Israel. He writes of vessels of mercy and indignation. What is the answer to his sorrow and unintermittent pain? Where is the evangel concerning the vessels of indignation? Where is the evangel of good news with regard to the problem of Israel? If we stop reading at the end of chapter ten we see no good news. Thankfully God has revealed to us the good to be brought out of all this in chapter 11:29-36:

For unregretted are the graces and the calling of ˙God. For even as you´ once are stubborn toward ˙God, yet now are shown mercy at their ˙stubbornness, thus these also are now stubborn to this ˙mercy of yours, that now they´ also may be shown mercy. For ˙God locks up ˙all together [io]in stubbornness that He should be merciful to ˙all.

O, the depth of the riches and the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How inscrutable are His ˙judgments, and untraceable His ˙ways! For [a]who knows the mind of the Lord? or [a]who becomes[◦] His adviser? or [a]who gives to Him first, and it will be [l]repaid him? seeing that out of Him and through Him and [io]for Him is ˙all: to Him be the glory [io]for the eons! Amen!

Yes, God truly is righteous! This righteousness is revealed through Jesus Christ's faith. Had there been no cross, there could be no justification of God concerning His ways with mankind or His ways with all creation, nor of all He does. And of course, there could be no life's justifying of all mankind.

CHRIST CRUCIFIED

GOD'S EVANGEL concerning His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, which Paul brings to us in Romans, is carried forward in 1 Corinthians as "the word of the cross," proclaiming "Christ crucified" (1:18,23) and culminating in the exultant words: "Christ has been roused from among the dead" (15:20). Christ's faith, which is explicitly worded in Romans 5:8 as His death for the sake of sinners, is the manifestation of God's righteousness (Rom.3:21,22). On the basis of Christ's death (which is for all), God is openly displayed as righteous in justifying the irreverent one (Rom.3:26; 4:5). In Christ's death the old humanity is put to death, so that all will ultimately be vivified in Christ and constituted righteous (1 Cor.15:22; Rom.5:19).

Now in the opening chapters of 1 Corinthians this message of the death of Christ for sinners is identified specifically as God's power (also brought out in Romans 1:16) and God's wisdom.

God's power and God's wisdom are put in contrast to human power and human wisdom. That God's evangel should be based on the cursed and indeed God-forsaken crucifixion of His Son is not at all what human power would have sought for salvation, or human wisdom would ever have imagined as a means for our deliverance from sin and death.

THE WISDOM OF GOD

Christ crucified is God's wisdom, the wisdom of God in which His power operates for salvation. This is boldly and openly proclaimed now in God's evangel. But long ago, in the beginning of the book of beginnings, it was introduced, yet as a shadow, in the account of God's response to and correction of the nakedness of Adam and Eve. It is this message that Abel heeded and Cain entirely ignored, as we see in Genesis chapter 4.

Yet in the third chapter (verses 17-19) we hear also, a message that is loud and clear. Yahweh Elohim told Adam:

Cursed is the ground on your account;
In grief shall you eat of it all the days of your life.
Thorn and weed shall it sprout for you,
And you will eat the herbage of the field.
By the sweat of your brow shall you eat your bread,
Until you return to the ground,
for from it were you taken,
For soil you are, and to soil you shall return.

But this was not a message of God's wisdom for salvation. This is a reflection of the condition of humanity from which we need to be saved. Rather, it is in Genesis 3:21 where the wisdom of God for salvation is expressed, though indirectly, calling for a gift of faith:

And Yahweh Elohim made for Adam and his wife tunics of skin and clothed them.

The earlier passage was concerned with what the human would have to do. The second was concerned with what God did. Cain concentrated on the first and imagined that it spoke of a pathway to deliverance. "God helps those who help themselves." But Abel was given grace to hear and believe the shocking message in the words of Genesis 3:21 (cf Heb.11:4). In God's wisdom the nakedness of the human who was doomed to return to the soil was covered by God's own doing alone, and His doing (which is not even mentioned, but is certainly to be assumed) was the slaying of an innocent animal! The message was that it would take a specific death to deal with the dying process of humanity. And, as we now know, that death provides more than a covering; together with resurrection it results ultimately in a new creation in which all are constituted righteous.

Consequently, when Cain brought an approach present to God it was a sample of the fruit of his sweat and grief in toiling in the field against the opposition of thorn and weed. It was a gift to God calling for His approval, and it was a matter of human boasting. Cain's labor was necessary, and in that sense it was, like obedience to law, right and good (cf Rom.7:12). But it did not contribute anything to his deliverance from sin and death. What Cain thought was wisdom was blindness and stupidity, as events bore out. Thus Cain becomes the type of the "wisdom" of humanity in the rejection of the reclining sacrifice at the portal (Gen.4:6) and the murder of his brother (Gen.4:8). In rejecting the type of "Christ crucified," he becomes the type of the forces of human wisdom and power involved in the crucifying of the Christ.

Yet when Abel (whose name means "Vanity," or "Transitoriness") brings an approach present to God it is in recognition of God's solution to human nakedness recounted in Genesis 3:21. It focuses attention on God's doing, and not on his own. It is in recognition of the wisdom and power of God for what is needed, and what is righteous. Thus Abel's present is a type of Christ, and he himself becomes a type of Christ crucified in his death.

WISDOM COMING FROM GOD

In 1 Corinthians 1:18-25 our attention is solidly focused on God and His wisdom and power in the crucifixion of His Son. From verses 26-29 we see that we ourselves are reflections of Abel who typifies "that which is not" (cf 1 Cor.1:28), so that there can be no doubt whatsoever that we are saved in grace, not at all of ourselves (cf Eph. 2:8,9). And now we come to 1 Corinthians 1:30, where we read that we are in Christ Jesus Who becomes to us wisdom from God, besides righteousness and holiness and deliverance.

In perceiving that God works good for all by means of the apparent weakness and stupidity of giving His Son to the death of the cross we are brought into the highest realm of wisdom. The word of the cross is that message which makes God's wisdom known. It tells of an operation of wisdom that truly works in securing righteousness, holiness and deliverance for mankind, and in becoming the expression of God's love. The wise of this eon, like Cain, are continually coming up with schemes for the betterment of humanity, one scheme replacing another when it fails. But all schemes of human wisdom fail because we are sinners who can only miss the mark of goodness to which we aim in our imaginations. Even those schemes which are called "Christian" are characterized by the works of the flesh, because the reliance is always on the flesh, on what the human must do, rather than on what God does in the giving of His Son concerning sin (Rom.8:3).

What is done is that Christ dies for the sake of all, and consequently all die. In 2 Corinthians 5:14, Paul uses a "fact verb" ("dies") rather than a "time verb," such as "died" or "has died." We know that Christ's death is in the past, but here and in many other references to it, Paul puts the stress on the timeless fact of Christ's death together with the timeless fact of its significance for mankind. The death of Christ Jesus is the death of the old humanity, of all sinners, apart from consideration of its realization in time. The evangel is a fact for us to believe, a fact that will be experienced in God's appointed time. The elimination of the corrupt and failing human race is a necessity that God, in

His wisdom, recognizes, indeed purposes before the eons, and which He deals with in the greatest of wisdom. This wisdom gets rid of the old powerfully and effectively, but does so in such a way that humanity, and all that is created in Christ will come forth in life as a new creation in Christ.

This is the wisdom of God, and to believe it is to receive wisdom from God. This is the wisdom that truly brings grace ("joy") and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ (1 Cor.1:3). It is a wisdom that does not puff us up, for it exposes our own ignorance and weakness, and is entirely centered on what God does in and through His Son. The one who submissively listens to (the root meaning of "obey" is UNDER-HEAR) God's evangel of grace and peace, of deliverance through Christ Jesus, justification in His blood, and conciliation through His death, is one who has been given wisdom from God in His grace.

RIGHTEOUSNESS COMING FROM GOD

But more than this, Christ Jesus has become to us righteousness from God! God's righteousness, that is, the righteousness of God, is made manifest through Jesus Christ's faith (Rom.3:21,22). It is made known through Christ crucified. And this righteousness of God which is made manifest is that He is the Justifier (the "Righteous-fier") of the human being (the sinner, the irreverent one, the enemy of God) by means of Jesus's faith (Rom.3:26; 4:5), His death on the cursed tree. Therefore, in reference to us who are believing, we already stand before God justified, and shall be so in every way in our very being, when we are vivified in Christ and constituted righteous. Christ crucified is the One through Whom this righteousness comes to us from God. There is no other way to literal justification, the blessing of being made righteous. Our believing is the channel through which God reckons righteousness to us, but only God's giving of His beloved Son as the Anti-type of the sin offering (cf 2 Cor.5:21) can make an irreverent sinner righteous.

HOLINESS COMING FROM GOD

God has set us apart from the rest of humanity, set apart to Him. This holiness is in Christ, a matter of identification, or inclusion in Him in His death and resurrection. In Romans 6:3,4 this is expressed as baptism into Christ Jesus and into His death, an operation of grace, not of ourselves or by another human. It is an operation of the spirit of God and in spirit, even as our membership in the body of Christ: "For in one spirit also we all are baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free, and all are made to imbibe one spirit" (1 Cor.12:13). We are not made holy by our own actions, holy as they may be. Holiness is from God by means of His spirit.

Hence, we are saints (holies).This is a blessing we have in Christ, in spirit; it is not perceived at present by our physical sense organs and experienced in our flesh, but it affects us in powerful ways as we take account of the word of the cross. Only the crucifixion of Christ as it is accepted and believed can bring about that spiritual and exotic fruit which combines the traits of love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness and self-control (Gal.5:22,23) into one. This will be fully endowed within us in the future, and is being instilled in us now as an earnest (cf 2 Cor.1:22). Holiness from God is already ours in our position before Him, in Christ, and cannot be taken away from us.

Nevertheless we do not always live in accord with this position, or rather, we do not ever live today fully in accord with this position. Yet it is our security and strength in the current era to be aware of this position, and to reckon it as so (cf Rom.6:11). And, like Paul, we would be pursuing toward that which shall be (cf Phil.3:7-16).

"Be pursuing love" (1 Cor.14:1).

DELIVERANCE COMING FROM GOD

In accord with holiness and included in justification, is our deliverance (AV, "redemption"), and this also is from God through Christ crucified. It is our deliverance in Christ from all human weakness and failure and stupidity in flesh, which we all have from Adam downward. In flesh we are mortals who are wanting of the glory of God (Rom.3:23). In Christ we stand justified before God. Therefore Paul has written in Romans 3:24,27,

Being justified gratuitously in [God's] grace, through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus, . . . where then is boasting?

God Himself has provided this deliverance. He has done so by means of the crucifixion of His Son. We had no part in this except to be blessed by it. It is gratuitous, and it is in God's grace. In spirit, we are delivered, removed and rescued from what we still are in flesh, corrupt and corrupting, infirm and irreverent, and never able to be justified in God's sight by works of the holy and righteous law.

There is only one way to be delivered from death and sin into life and righteousness, and that is by Christ crucified.

"WISDOM WE ARE SPEAKING"

Like Greeks in general (1 Cor.1:22), some among the Corinthians were evidently seeking wisdom beyond the word of the cross. Yet in every way Paul sought to keep their attention on Jesus Christ, and Him crucified (1 Cor.2:2), so that their faith would not be in the wisdom of human beings, but in the power of God (2:5).

Consequently, when Paul turns around and declares, "Yet wisdom are we speaking among the mature" (1 Cor.2:6), he does not mean that he is leaving the evangel of Christ

Crucified for a more "spiritual" message. For the word of the cross is the foundation of all spiritual truth. And in believing it we are exhibiting one of the greatest of spiritual endowments for us today (1 Cor.13:13). No believer can be growing into maturity without retaining that evangel which he or she first accepted as a minor in Christ. Where we all begin is with the evangel that "Christ dies for our sins" (1 Cor.15:1,3). And this is where we must stay in order to grow into maturity.

In speaking to the mature of God's wisdom in a secret (1 Cor.2:6,7), Paul was not telling them of some mystical revelation that takes their mind away from the stark and fundamental fact of the crucifixion of Christ for their sins. The secret of our future bodily change (1 Cor.15:51,52) is built on the fact that Christ Who dies for our sins has been roused from among the dead. He had not been alive in some "other" life; He was dead, for He was crucified. And then He was roused. In accord with this, and because of this, those who believe this will be roused from death (or at least from the dying condition in which we presently exist) and changed in body, living to God as Christ is living to God. Indeed the death of Christ puts an end to all death, for in Christ all shall be vivified (1 Cor.15:22).

So also, for example, the secrets made known in Ephesians are extensions of the deliverance which is through Christ's blood (Eph.1:7).

In believing the word of the cross, "we obtain, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that we may perceive that which is being graciously given to us by God" (1 Cor.2:12). In believing "Christ crucified" we are given an earnest of "the mind of Christ" (1 Cor. 2:16), the mind that puts the will of God above His own will and, in His crucifixion, opens up to us the mind and wisdom of God.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

EDITORIAL

We continue here with the presentation of the CVNT of 1 Corinthians, now centering on chapters 12 through 14, with comments from the writings of A. E. Knoch and James Coram. As I contend in my own article on 1 Corinthians 2:16 all that Paul writes in these later chapters is built solidly on the evangel summarized in the words, "Christ crucified." It is on the basis of this message that God, Who is operating all in all (12:6) places believers in the body of Christ (12:18,28). The apportioning of spiritual endowments is not the same today as it was when Paul wrote this epistle, but it remains the same that what is given is from God by His spirit, and that it comes from Him on the foundation of the word of the cross.

PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS (1)

12 [y]Now concerning the spiritual endowments, brethren, I do not [l]want [=]you to be [l]ignorant. 2 [=]You are [°]aware that when [=]you were of the nations, you were [l]led[°] away to[d] the voiceless [·]idols, as ever [=]you were led[°]. 3 Wherefore I am making known to [=]you that no[t] one, speaking [t]by God's spirit, is saying: Anathema is Jesus. 4 [y]Now there are apportionments of graces, yet the same spirit, 5 and there are apportionments of services, and the same Lord, 6 and there are apportionments of operations, yet the same God ·Who is operating ·all in all.

7 [y]Now to each one is being given[°] the manifestation of the spirit, with a view to[d] ˙expedience. 8 For to[w] one indeed, through the spirit, is being given° the word of wisdom, yet to another the word of knowledge, according to the same spirit, 9 yet to [d]another faith, [i]by the same spirit, yet to another the graces of healing, [i]by the one spirit, 10 yet to another operations of powerful deeds, yet to another prophecy, yet to another discrimination of spirits, yet to [d]another species of languages, yet to another translation of languages. 11 [y]Now all these ˙one and the same spirit is operating, apportioning to each his own, according as He is intending°.

12 For even as the body is one and ˡhas many members, yet all the members of the one ˙body, being many, are one body, thus also is the Christ. 13 For in one spirit also we´ all are baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free, and all are made to imbibe one spirit.

SPIRITUAL GIFTS FOR TODAY

THE transcendent nature of the present outflow of God's favor corresponds with the exaltation of Christ among the celestials. Because He is "up above all the heavens" (Eph. 4:10), we are raised to the heights supreme. It is not, indeed, as the English may suggest, that He is located in space at a point outside of and beyond the universe, for that is a palpable absurdity. As to space, the universe is made up of the earth and the heavens. The more accurate Greek makes it of the heavens, for He is the highest of the celestial hosts, not as to space, but as to dignity and glory. There can be no higher exaltation. He is up over all who are of the heavens, that He shall be completing all (Eph.4:10, CV).

He Who descended into the lower parts of the earth has now ascended to the highest heavens. Just as the celestial aspect of the secret of Christ is the basis of the secret administration, so now also, the completeness of Christ's sweep of all creation is the basis of our maturity. A complete revelation raises us to the plane of adults. Being associated with Christ in His headship of the whole universe the believers now have attained their majority.

The inauguration of the present administration of God's grace brought many changes with it. This called for an adjusting of the saints, in the language of inspiration (Eph. 4:12). It is figuratively presented as the change from minority to manhood (Eph.4:13; 1 Cor.13:10). The new celestial destiny severed the saints from earthly, physical blessing, which they had enjoyed as guests of Israel's covenants. The new status of the nations demanded that their spiritual growth be completed, so that they may truly be the complements of Christ among the celestials.

The spiritual manifestations of so-called "gifts" give us a graphic illustration of the changes involved. The twelfth chapter of first Corinthians shows what the nations had before the secret was revealed. The fourth of Ephesians tells us what gifts are ours today. There are great changes. Most of the early gifts were dropped in this adjustment. They are no longer needed. Two new ones were added. Three are carried over. Of the gifts which enter this administration, apostles, prophets, and teachers were known before. They link us with the past. Evangelists and pastors are unique, for they had not been classed as gifts before.

The accompanying lists of the spiritual endowments given in Paul's ministry will help us to compare and study these "gifts." First we have the nine gifts which were temporary expedients during the transitional era between the Pentecostal administration and the present. These are individual manifestations of the spirit. Next we have eight corporate endowments, connected with membership in the body of Christ. These are arranged in the order of their rank. Note particularly that the first three—apostles, prophets, and teachers—are found again in Ephesians. Then we have a special list of those which were to be discarded by the incoming of maturity. The last column gives us the facts in Ephesians. First we have the list of those given for adjusting the saints. Finally we find that two of these are confined to the foundation. This leaves three spiritual endowments for the ecclesia today—evangelists, pastors, and teachers.

It is worth every effort needed to clear up the relation between the gifts in first Corinthians and Ephesians. Two extreme and opposing positions are based on untenable views of this relation. A large number of zealous believers claim that all of the gifts may still be appropriated by faith and that many are in exercise today. As in Corinth, they emphasize the gift of "tongues." Healing is also pressed. On the other hand, some cut off Corinthians entirely, claiming that we have absolutely no connection with them. We are told that the dispensation of the mystery is unique, and is neither a blend nor a development of Corinthians, but a newly created thing, far above all. In contrast with both of these positions, the Scriptures, both in Corinthians and Ephesians, illustrate the relation between the two by the figures of minority and maturity. This is the key to the subject.

This figure avoids both extremes. It is in harmony with the fact that some of the gifts were present in the past which are ours today. It agrees with the setting aside of the lesser gifts and the retention of the greater. It accords with the character of the gifts which have been retained and those which have been repudiated. Paul and others were apostles and teachers in Corinthians and remained such in Ephesians. They were not reappointed, as though their previous services were not recognized. The figure of a new creation is not in point here. A man is not recreated when he reaches maturity. Some things remain as they were. Others are dropped because they are suited only to minority.

The believers among the nations had been enjoying some things, as the guests of Israel's promise covenants, which find no appropriate place among the spiritual, celestial blessings which characterize the present grace. Perhaps if such a change should be brought about in these days we would call it a reorganization. If a great business should change the sphere of its operations and the character of its products, some of its machinery would become useless and be discarded. Its system of doing business would be revised to suit the new conditions. So it was when this charter of our faith was first given. Some things were entirely dropped, others merely modified. Physical benefits vanished. Earthly disabilities disappeared. In Paul's preparatory epistles the believers are seen in the period of adolescence. They verge upon manhood. Some of the gifts given them at that time were the relics of childhood. Others were intended to develop them into manhood. The youth learns to talk and to care for his physical frame. These are represented by the gifts of healing and "tongues." The principal task of adolescence is the schooling and training for the duties of life. It is concerned with self-development, not with the care of others or the duties of maturity.

GIFTS FOR EXPEDIENCE

The manifestations of the spirit, given to the Corinthians, were expedients (1 Cor.12:7). Let us not miss this inspired characterization, which assures us that they were not ideal, permanent endowments, but only temporary measures to fill a lack which has since been supplied. "Now to each one is being given the manifestation of the spirit, with a view to expedience." The Authorized Version rendering, "profit" is misleading, though of course it is not untrue. Expedients are resorted to because they are profitable or helpful for a time. This word, sumpherō, they translate profit seven times, and seven times expedient. Another word, oninêmi, means profit. The loss of an eye or a hand can hardly be called profitable, though it may be expedient (Matt.5:29,30). It was expedient for the Lord to go away (John 16:7). Absence is not His permanent condition. All is allowed us, but not all is expedient (1 Cor.6:12). In every occurrence there is but a transient advantage gained by expedience.

This is confirmed by the fact that none of these endowments are reaffirmed in Ephesians. They are suited to the times of transition which introduced the present grace. It is put beyond all question by the further fact that all three of the gifts which are definitely discarded are found in this list of expedient spiritual endowments (1 Cor.12:7-10). These are prophecy, languages, and knowledge (13:8). They were necessary at that time, but such expedients are no longer needed since the present administration has been fully established. Instead of giving a few individuals supernatural fragments of information, God has completed the whole circle of knowledge in His latest revelation. This is open to all. Now each believer has access to all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, in Christ.

The more we know of the transitional era which accompanied Paul's early ministries, the more we see the necessity of temporary spiritual manifestations to tide the believers over into the present grace. Although we now have a record of this period in Paul's earlier epistles, as well as the full revelation which closed it, how few of the believers are really clear about it! Since early times the church has found this period prolific in confusion, for few understood that it was not a permanent part of the present. If this is so, how difficult must it have been for those who lived in those changing times to keep step with God's operations!

There was no finally formulated system of truth, as we now have it in Ephesians. God was still occupied with Israel. If we lived in an era in which God was winding up one system of truth while He was unfolding another, there would be more excuse for confusion than there is. They needed temporary help to tide them over the time of transition.

The expedients are of two different kinds. Some linked them on to the kingdom and the powers of the coming eon. These were powerful deeds, healing, languages and translation. These will find their fullest fulfillment in the millennium. Humanly speaking, if Israel had not rejected the Messiah in Acts, these gifts would have flourished more and more, yet they would be exercised only in subordination to Israel. They could not continue when Israel was set aside. The other gifts linked them to the approaching change, when Israel should be rejected. Without knowing what was in store for them, they would naturally fall into folly and ignorance. Hence some were specially endowed with knowledge and wisdom. Their faith would fail, as did that of so many in Israel, as the kingdom receded. There was need of the gift of prophecy, to receive direct word from God. Spirits must be discriminated, lest they be led contrary to God's intention. All of these gifts are displayed in Paul's epistles to them. All of the other group were found exemplified in the narrative of Acts, which begins with a special exhibition of "tongues" and ends with a notable example of healing (28:8).

But do we not need all of these things today? As our blessings are spiritual, among the celestials, we cannot claim the physical endowments of the coming eon. Instead of healing we are given grace for our infirmities. Instead of power we are promised weakness (2 Cor.12:9). Languages are directly denied to an era of maturity (1 Cor.13:8). Wisdom and knowledge, faith, and prophecy, and the discrimination of spirits may be greatly needed today, but they are no longer individual gifts granted miraculously. All the wisdom and knowledge we need is found in the secret now revealed. That is God's final word to us. No gift of prophecy is needed (1 Cor.13:8). And by this completed revelation we may test all spirits. The dispensation in which we now live abrogates all of the spiritual manifestations which the apostle so carefully labeled expedients.

We are not aware that this point has been pressed before. Hence we wish to urge it upon all who believe God. Many lines of reasoning may be developed to show that these gifts are no longer with us, but none should appeal to the man of God as the word here used by the holy spirit. Before we are even told that these gifts existed, their temporary character is asserted. This will be enough for everyone who wishes to believe God. We do not doubt that there are spiritual manifestations today which seem to correspond to the lesser gifts. Such there were even in those days. A special gift was needed to discriminate the spirits. If this endowment existed today it would unhesitatingly class all of these as the work of deceiving spirits. It is an effort to engross the believers with the things of minority in order to keep them from attaining majority, which is the primary object of the real gifts we have today.

Let us note carefully the opposite effect, the direct contrast, between the modern "gifts"—healing and tongues —and those given us by God. The former drag us back to childhood; the latter bring us to manhood. Pastors, evangelists, and teachers are given "toward the adjusting of the saints for the work of dispensing, for the upbuilding of the body of Christ, unto the end that we should all attain to the unity of the faith and of the realization of the son of God, to a mature man, to the measure of the stature of Christ's complement, that we may by no means still be minors, surging hither and thither and being carried about by every wind of teaching . . ." (Eph.4:12-14). Languages are listed by God as the least of all the gifts of minority. True pastors, evangelists and teachers lead in the contrary direction, toward maturity. That is their special function if they are faithful.

MATURE IN CHRIST

There are many methods of testing God's servants today which are without warrant in the Word. Success sometimes signifies failure in God's sight. Here, however, we have God's standard. Here He tells us what He expects. The test we should apply is found in this passage. Do they dispense that which edifies the body of Christ, so that all have one faith and realize their sonship and maturity in Christ? Alas! the very idea of maturity is unknown to many and their ministry is more calculated to make infants out of full-grown believers than to make mature saints out of minors. Let us note that the prime object of the gifts we now possess is to lead the saints beyond the lesser gifts which characterized minority. We are mature in Christ! Let us not relapse into infancy!

YET NOW ARE REMAINING

Strange as it may seem, the principal excellence of the path suited to transcendence (1 Cor.12:31) lies in the lack of the special gifts or graces of which Paul has just been speaking! The more excellent way knows no select endowment of prophecy, or of languages, or of knowledge. These were to cease to function. Only three things are left on the perfect path—faith, expectation, love. These are not special graces for a few, but freely enjoyed by all.

In contrast with the lesser gifts, such as prophecy, languages and knowledge, faith and expectation abide until the glory, when faith will be replaced by sight and expectation by fulfillment. Then only love remains without ceasing. Only love never lapses. It is the supreme, the essential, the never ending grace, the way most excellent.

SPIRITUAL ENDOWMENTS

THE tremendous growth and success of the modern charismatic movement has brought considerable respectability and acceptance to practices which nearly all deemed spurious only a few decades ago. Nonetheless, many outside the movement, perhaps out of fear of the unknown and due to their aversion to activities and mannerisms which often seem strange or distasteful, too often reject its claims out of hand. Others, however, are far too ready to accept its claims, being unduly influenced by the fervor and sincerity of many a "charismatic Christian."

On the one hand, those who are profoundly impressed by the knowledge that practically all of the famous scholars and theologians of centuries past did not speak in tongues deem this fact to be a virtual disproof of the modern custom. To them, it is inconceivable that such a vast body of devout and spiritual believers would have lacked such a gift were it of God.

On the other hand, those who are deeply influenced by their own experiences, having become convinced of the rectitude of such a remarkable and intimately personal phenomenon as tongues-speaking, are nearly always full of confidence concerning the validity of their practice. Even though in most cases it is a learned skill, acquired through instruction and example, it is deemed to be a supernatural divine gift. To its practitioners, the proposition that modern glossolalia constitutes the scriptural gift of languages is generally beyond question. The erstwhile paucity of those possessing the gift is of no moment to the convinced charismatic, for he has tasted for himself and is acquainted with countless others who have done the same. He does not think he is correct; he knows that he is.

In reply to all such imaginings and appeals to man—whether to venerated church history or to exalted contemporary experience—we can only say, "Let no one be boasting in human beings" (1 Cor.3:21). "If we are obtaining the testimony of men, the testimony of God is greater" (1 John 5:9). It is of no consequence whatever, insofar as truth is concerned, whether any certain belief should be popular or unpopular, applauded or condemned among men. Our appeal can only be to the Scriptures themselves.

THE BASIS OF LANGUAGES

Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "Now concerning the spiritual endowments, brethren, I do not want you to be ignorant" (1 Cor.12:1). He begins by reminding them of their own former unbelief and spiritual darkness, saying, "You are aware that when you were of the nations, you were led away to the voiceless idols, as ever you were led. Wherefore I am making known to you that no one, speaking by God's spirit, is saying: Anathema is Jesus. And no one is able to say: Lord is Jesus, except by holy spirit" (1 Cor. 12:2,3). Before God began to enlighten them, the Corinthian believers were just as blind as anyone else, and were therefore to recognize the cause of the glorious change that had occurred in their lives for what it was, the powerful operation of God's holy spirit.

Since the Corinthians, however, were minors in Christ and were fleshly (1 Cor.3:1,2), they were "puffed up, one over the one, against the other" (1 Cor.4:6). Consequently, they did not realize that every good thing they enjoyed, including those things which others among their brethren may not have possessed, was God's gift to them in such a way that any boasting in themselves was completely unwarranted. "Now what have you which you did not obtain? Now if you obtained it also, why are you boasting as though not obtaining?" (1 Cor.4:7).

The apostle Paul makes it plain that all that we have—whether riches, health, success, understanding, self-discipline, willingness, good character, faith or even some special spiritual endowment—is that which we have but received from God. Everything we possess is given to us by God, even those things which we "take" to ourselves through much time and effort. "He Himself gives to all life and breath and all" (Acts 17:25).

When noting the differences between ourselves and others, do we ever stop to think, and then face the fact, that all these things have their own cause? They are all caused to be as they are. Do we realize, then, that it is altogether foolish to be "puffed up" about our own virtues and powers while looking down upon others in their weaknesses and incapacities?

Among the Corinthians, "not all [were] speaking in languages. Not all [were] interpreting" (1 Cor.12:30). Rather than being proud, and imagining that their fellow believers could have had the ability to do so but had somehow failed to supply something of their own toward the acquisition of this power, those who did have a gift of language were to understand that "there are apportionments of graces [OF-GRACE-effects, charis-maton] yet the same spirit, and there are apportionments of services, and the same Lord, and there are apportionments of operations, yet the same God, Who is operating all in all . . . apportioning to each his own, according as He is intending" (1 Cor.12:4-6,11).

At that time, the apostle Paul himself possessed a certain special endowment of language, and exercised it more than any of the Corinthians (1 Cor.14:18). And, as he said concerning another gift, that of continence, "I want all men to be as myself, also, but each has his own gracious gift [charisma] from God, one indeed, thus, yet one thus" (1 Cor.7:7).

The English adjective "charismatic" is from the Greek noun for "grace," charisma, JOY [GRACE]-effect. It speaks of that which is the product of God's favor, not that which is given as a reward or due to qualification. The leaders of the modern religious movement which styles itself the "charismatic" movement, however, while placing much emphasis on speaking in tongues, nearly always insist that "the gift" is readily available to all who will merely do this or that in order to get it. Such also claim that the phenomenon of modern glossolalia is an integral and vital element in a spiritual walk. Indeed, they often thus distinguish themselves from other believers who do not share their views on this theme (or perhaps their related views concerning such things as bodily healing or forms of worship) by speaking of themselves as the dispensers of "the full gospel." Though they may speak of "grace," the fact is that in this matter of tongues, and concerning other endowments as well, they insist that most, if not all, finally depends not upon the grace of God but upon man and his "free will."

Nonetheless, the basis of one's possession of any spiritual endowment—in any era and under any administration—is the all-sufficient grace of God, the endowment itself being possessed by its recipient solely due to His will.

THESE LANGUAGES OF OURS

The Greek word for "tongue," man's principal organ of speech, is glossa, from which our word "glossary" is derived. When it is used literally (e.g., Mark 7:35) it is translated "tongue" in the CV. When it is used figuratively, as a figure of association for the body of words which are common to a community or nation, it is translated "language."

It is beyond question that the "tongues" spoken on the day of Pentecost were normal coherent languages and not unintelligible ecstatic utterances. "And at the fulfillment of the day of Pentecost they [the twelve] were all alike in the same place. And suddenly there came out of heaven a blare, even as of a violent, carrying blast, and it fills the whole house where they were sitting. And seen by them were dividing tongues as if of fire, and one is seated on each one of them. And they are filled with holy spirit, and they begin to speak in different languages, according as the spirit gave them to declaim.

"Now there were dwelling in Jerusalem, Jews, pious men from every nation under heaven. Now when this sound occurs, the multitude came together and was confused, for each one hears them speaking in his own vernacular [dialektos] . . . ." As these Jewish pilgrims themselves declared, concerning what they heard, "[we are] hearing, each in our own vernacular in which we were born" (Acts 2:8), "we are hearing them speaking in these languages of ours of the great things of God" (Acts 2:11).

This passage is the only passage in all the Scripture which actually describes the nature of the gift of languages given by the holy spirit, and its testimony is clear. The only other two occurrences concerning this gift in the book of Acts are in 10:46 and 19:6. There is certainly nothing in either of these passages to show that that which occurred was the giving forth of unintelligible sounds or ecstatic nonlinguistic utterances. To the contrary, since no description is given, it is evident that Luke expects the reader to have prior knowledge of what he means from his explicit description already given in chapter 2.

Like those of Acts 10:46 and 19:6, the new tongues of Mark 16:17 are not described. The entire list of items (Mark 16:17,18), however, are said to be signs, signs of the then-imminent terrestrial kingdom, and refer to miraculous abilities such as those exercised by the apostles. Therefore it is reasonable to assume that the tongues referred to are the miraculous languages described elsewhere, in Acts 2.

Furthermore, the account itself (in Mark 16:20), besides the general record of the book of Acts, makes it evident that the commission spoken of here was fulfilled. Such practices were hardly the norm for ordinary believers even during the period covered by Acts, much less for those living beyond the close of that period.

Despite its length, 1 Corinthians 12-14, the remaining, and longest, portion of Scripture which includes any information concerning the gift of languages, does not state explicitly what the tongues are. Certain passages in 1 Corinthians 14, however, obviously refer to actual languages, while others are simply not definitive. Yet even in these indefinitive passages, it can be demonstrated that actual language fits the context very well. Though in a few such passages some may infer or suppose the presence of ecstatic utterances, since such passages, in fact, are simply indefinitive, it can hardly be proved that even any of these texts must refer to non-linguistic, incommunicative ecstatic sounds and not to actual language.

Therefore, any who engage in non-linguistic utterances purported to be the scriptural gift of languages, do not do so in response to revelation but to speculation. Such "tongues" are not of faith, but only of inference. It follows, then, that their supposed interpretations are merely a "parading of what one has [heard], feignedly [eikê, SIMULATEly], puffed up by his fleshly mind" (cp Col.2:18). Such "interpretations" are by no means a word of the Lord. It is not that the intention is to pretend, but that the action, nonetheless, is imitation or simulated, not genuine.

THE PURPOSE OF LANGUAGES

1 Corinthians 14:22 is the only passage which states what the purpose of the true spiritual endowment of languages is. It is preceded, first of all, by the entreaty, "Brethren, do not become little children in disposition" (1 Cor.14:20a). Regrettably, as the entire tenor of 1 Corinthians 14 makes evident, hitherto, some of the Corinthian believers had indeed been disposed to "showing off" their gift of languages. One should never seek to display even a genuine gift at an inopportune time, inexpediently, or for an unsuitable purpose. Therefore, Paul's counsel is, "in evil be minors, yet in disposition become mature" (1 Cor.14:20b).

The apostle continues on, saying, "In the law it is written that, in different languages and by different lips shall I speak to this people, and neither thus will they be hearkening to Me, the Lord is saying" (1 Cor.14:21). Paul's inspired conclusion then follows, and let us take special note of it: "So that languages are for a sign, not to the believers, but to the unbelievers" (1 Cor.14:22).

It is therefore unscriptural to regard the purpose of tongues as devotional or as a means of private prayer and praise to God. And Paul has already made it clear that languages are not for use in the ecclesia, or assembly: "I thank God that I speak in a language more than all of you. But, in the ecclesia, do I want to speak five words with my mind, that I should instruct others also, or ten thousand words in a language?" (1 Cor.14:18,19).

The passage to which Paul refers is Isaiah 28:11,12. It prophesies destruction upon Israel. The context speaks of God's judgment upon His people due to their unbelief (apparently in reference to the invasion of the Assyrians, who spoke a language foreign to the Israelites). Paul, drawing a certain principle from this passage (which, in itself, deals with an entirely different matter), says, "So that"—because of the the validity of the principle which he has noted in Isaiah 28:11,12—it is evident that God's purpose in the gift of languages which He had given to some of the Corinthians was that their ability to speak in languages different than their own might serve simply as a sign, and at that, not as a sign to the believers themselves, but as a sign to the unbelievers in their locality (1 Cor.14:22).

The general principle which Paul notes in the passage from Isaiah, which he therefore recognizes as also being true in the case of any proper implementation of special languages among the Corinthians, is that whenever God speaks to those who are "in flesh" (Rom.8:9), those who are not energized by His spirit, they will not hearken to His message, regardless of what it may consist of, and even if its means should be most extra-ordinary or even miraculous.

The unbeliever receives a sign, a sign that God gives spiritual endowments, but he does not accept it. A "sign" is simply "an act or circumstance which has a meaning or message" (KEYWORD CONCORDANCE, p.270). Acts 2:4-11, on the day of Pentecost, is a specific instance in which tongues served as a sign to unbelieving onlookers. It seems likely that this was the case as well concerning the prophesied "new languages" of Mark 16:17-20, under Christ's commission to herald the evangel to the entire creation. Paul explains that languages were to continue to serve as a sign to unbelievers through the testimony of the Corinthians.

In all cases, the basic testimony set forth to the lost is that, This Jesus, Who died for men's sins, is the very Christ of God, Whom God raises and exalts to His right hand (cp Acts 2:32,33; 1 Cor.15:3).

It may be that the languages signified as well that the nations would be included among the beneficiaries of the evangel of Christ. Its recipients were not to be confined to the people of Israel, but would include "whosoever the Lord our God should be calling to Him" (cp Acts 2:39). "For thus the Lord has directed us: I have appointed you for 'a light of the nations; for you to be for salvation as far as the limits of the earth.' Now, on hearing this, the nations rejoiced and glorified the word of the Lord, and they believe, whoever were set for life eonian" (cp Acts 13:47,48). Faith is truly the gift of God, granted to His chosen ones. Otherwise, even where God's testimony is wholly beneficent, attended by the miraculous and of the most glorious nature possible, men will still not believe what He says.

As remarkable as it may seem, the purpose of the miraculous languages was to afford a sign to the *un*believer (1 Cor. 14:22a). This reminds us of Philippians 1:28 where Paul explains that whenever unfaithful believers oppose the truth, this is "to them a proof of destruction [or 'loss']."

In the first of these matters, a sign of divine salvation is given to unbelievers! In the second, proof of their error is given to opposing believers! Yet in both cases, because of human stubbornness (cf Rom.11:32), God's testimony serves not to establish man's faith but as a testimony against his unbelief.

To the recalcitrant unbeliever, God's "sign" signifies nothing. To him, "Christ crucified" is either a stumbling block or abject foolishness. Likewise, to the deceived saint, God's "proof" proves nothing, for he already has "the truth," no matter how strongly deluded he may actually be. Yet in each of these matters, to those who have eyes to see, God's sign is significant and His proof is convincing.

We know, then, at least for a time and among certain believers, whether in Jerusalem, Caesarea, Ephesus, or Corinth, that the miraculous languages which attended their testimony to the saving work of Christ thus served as a sign to unbelievers.

Yet what we actually need for ourselves today—and no matter how good certain popular customs may seem—is the fostering (NOURISHMENT) which can only come from "the words of the faith and of the ideal teaching which you have fully followed" (1 Tim.4:6). It is much easier to gain a soulish proficiency in zealous vocalizings while calling these things spiritual than it is to become sound in the faith (Titus 2:2), spiritually endowed so as to be loving our Lord Jesus Christ not only with good intentions, but in incorruption. "Grace be with all who are loving our Lord Jesus Christ in incorruption! Amen!" (Eph.6: 24). J.R.C.

THE DURATION OF LANGUAGES

JUST AS 1 Corinthians 14:22 is the only passage which states the purpose of the gift of languages, 1 Corinthians 13:10 is the only passage that reveals when this gift will cease. Having made mention in 1 Corinthians 12:28 of certain subordinate graces pertaining to "species of languages," Paul states that not all are speaking in these languages or interpreting them. "Yet," he tells the Corinthians, "be zealous for the greater graces" (1 Cor.12:31a), those spiritual endowments which are greater than languages or tongues.

Being zealous for the greater graces, however, should never be identified with any seeking to acquire whatever powers one may vainly imagine to be "available." One should be zealous for those services and servants which God has appointed in the ecclesia, regardless of what one's own allotment may be, and pray for the wisdom and discernment to recognize that which is faithful and true. Any personal ability to "prophesy" (1 Cor.14:1), that is, in one sense or another to serve as God's spokesman, must be genuine and divinely appointed, not self-contrived.

Then, at this juncture, Paul declares, "And still I am showing you a path, suited to transcendence" (1 Cor.12:31b). The term "and" points to something in addition to what he has just said. The word "still" (eti, also rendered "more" in the CV, an adverb of time or degree) indicates that Paul wishes to continue on in order to say more than simply what has gone before concerning the various spiritual endowments which currently obtained among the Corinthians. The sense is, that, within the scope of this present epistle, in addition to expressing the things which he has just stated, he also is showing them something more, namely "a path," one which is "suited to transcendence."

He does so through the agency of the following section of the epistle, which we know as chapter 13. This "more excellent way" is a course which is in contrast to and far advanced beyond that with which the Corinthians were presently acquainted through their various extant spiritual endowments.

This transcendent path obtains (1) during an era which is in contrast to the very time then present in which Paul was writing ("at present"; 1 Cor.13:12, arti, idiomatically, "just now"), and yet (2) in an era in which "faith, expectation [and] love—these three" are "remaining" or continuing on. "Yet now are remaining faith, expectation, love—these three" (1 Cor.13:13). Paul thus uses arti ("at present") in contrast to nun ("now," i.e., ["going on from] now" or "beyond the present period," "an adverb of time in contrast with the past"; KEYWORD CONCORDANCE, p.208).

It is clear, then, that the era in which this "path" may be walked, a path in which faith, expectation and love—these three—remain, is an era which extends beyond the immediate present in which Paul wrote and yet exists prior to the day of Christ's advent. Faith and expectation are of such a nature that they themselves will no longer be needed then, once faith gives way to sight and future expectation becomes present possession.

In 1 Corinthians 13:8-10, Paul says, "Love is never lapsing: yet, whether prophecies, they will be discarded, or languages, they will cease, or knowledge, it will be discarded. For out of an instalment are we know*ing,* and out of an instalment are we prophesy*ing.* Now whenever maturity may be coming, that which is out of an instalment shall be discarded."

It is obvious that prophecies themselves, those revelations of truth made known by God's spokesmen who declared

His word and will, will never be discarded. Though predictive prophecy will be fulfilled, that will hardly warrant its nullification (katargeo, DOWN-UN-ACT, "discard," "nullify," CV), or afford any incentive to discard God's own word. The same is true of knowledge. We can hardly afford to discard what little we know. Are we to anticipate becoming altogether ignorant in the day of Christ's advent, or, alternatively, perhaps to follow such a quest at present? Likewise, all sensible people realize that communication, or even private thought, is impossible apart from language. Undoubtedly then we shall speak by means of language, and assuredly we do so now.

It is not language that is in question but the gift of language which ceases. Prophecy, the word of God and of the Lord, stands, but the gift is discarded. Knowledge is much more abundant than ever before, since the word of God has been completed (cp Col.1:25), but the gift of knowledge itself (supernatural divine endowment apart from previous preparation) is discarded once it is rendered redundant. None of these three expressions in 1 Corinthians 13:8, "prophecies," "languages," or "knowledge," are literal. Each is a figure of speech, the common figure of association termed metonymy in which that which is associated with the subject stands for the subject itself. The sense is that the time will come when those spiritual endowments which are associated with prophecy, language, and knowledge will cease or be discarded.

OUT OF AN INSTALMENT

We are told why this is so in the verse which follows: "For out of an instalment are we knowing, and out of an instalment are we prophesying" (1 Cor.13:9). It is not, as in the Authorized Version, "we know in part," but, "out of an instalment are we know*ing.*" The Greek is ek, out of, not, in, and the incomplete verb form should be rendered "knowing," not "know" The passage does not speak of the Corinthian believers' knowledge, but of the source of their knowledge.

"In that era," insofar as their standing in flesh was concerned, the believers among the nations, "the nations in flesh," were "apart from Christ, being alienated from the citizenship of Israel"; they were "guests of the promise covenants, having no expectation, and [were] without God in the world" (Eph.2:12). After all, the sonship and the glory and the covenants and the legislation and the divine service, were Israel's; whose are the fathers, and out of whom is the Christ according to the flesh (Rom.9:4,5). At that time, neither the revelation of the secret (Eph.3:6) nor of the celestial allotment (Eph.1:3,18) which is for the ecclesia which is Christ's body had been made known. Consequently, the place and destiny of these Gentile believers to whom Paul ministered—entirely apart from the covenant of the law and yet in strict accord with the new revelations which he alone had received from the risen Christ—was most enigmatic (cf 1 Cor.13:12). There was, therefore, a great need for further unfoldings of knowledge to the Corinthians, beyond the limited instalment which Paul had already made known to them, that they might more clearly apprehend their true place and purpose.

Even then, however, the Corinthians were the body of Christ (1 Cor.12:27), for God placed the members, each one of them, in the body (1 Cor.12:18). As Paul said, "in one spirit also we all are baptized into one body . . . and all are made to imbibe one spirit" (1 Cor.12:13). Being baptized in holy spirit (cf Acts 1:5), even at Pentecost, was a separate matter from speaking in languages, which was also granted to the twelve. "And they are filled with holy spirit, and they begin to speak in different languages" (Acts 2:4).

It is perfectly false to equate either baptism in holy spirit, or filling with holy spirit, with speaking in languages. Both "baptism" and "filling" associated with holy spirit may readily be conferred entirely apart from any gift of languages (cp Acts 6:8,10; 7:55; 1 Cor.12:13; Eph.5:18). Conversely, one may well experience modern pseudo "tongues" apart from even the baptism of the spirit, much less its filling, while imagining that he has received both.

At the time 1 Corinthians was written, the spiritual endowments then granted were given to each "with a view to expedience" (1 Cor.12:7). In that era, it was expedient that some should exercise these various abilities associated with prophecy, language and knowledge, for the word of God had not yet fully been made known. Consequently, it was then true that "out of an instalment are we knowing, and out of an instalment are we prophesying" (1 Cor.13:9).

Similarly, it was also true, then, "in that era," that speaking in languages, while in need of strict regulation that all might occur "respectably and in order" (1 Cor.14:40), was not to be forbidden. "So that, my brethren, be [being] zealous to be prophesying, and the speaking in languages do not [be] forbid[ding]" (1 Cor.14:39).

The words "zealous" and "forbid" are in the incomplete verb form (as indicated in the CV by the vertical stroke preceding them). Their reference is to the conduct of the Corinthians at the time then present.

It should also be noted that Paul had by no means instructed every individual believer either to be prophesying or to be speaking in languages. Those to whom God had not given these special graces could hardly exercise gifts which they did not possess. While the Corinthians were to be "zealous for" (cp 1 Cor.14:1,39) all the spiritual endowments that God had truly given, they were not, unlike so many today, to crave, seek after, or plead for personal, supernatural or miraculous powers.

In the Greek, the sense of Paul's words is that the Corinthian believers, at the time then present, were to be being zealous for "the . . . prophesying," and were not to be forbidding "the . . . speaking . . . in languages" in which some were able to engage. That is, all were to be exercising zeal concerning the revelations which God was making known to them through those certain ones among them who were specially graced with the gift of prophecy. Likewise, no one was to be forbidding those who actually had a gracious gift of language from exercising it, even within the ecclesia.

In deference to the immaturity of the Corinthian believers, Paul had granted that, when they came together, if "two, or, at the most, three" wished to speak in a language, they had permission to do so. Yet, if they should thus speak, they were not to make a long, uninterrupted testimony in the language, but only to speak "by instalments"; that is, in brief phrases or sentences, so that someone who was able to "interpret" (i.e., "translate," 1 Cor.12:10) might readily do so for the sake of those hearing (1 Cor.14:27).

While Paul did not wish anyone to forbid those with a gift of language from engaging in a conservative exercise of the gift while within the assembly, he did make his own will, and example, known, saying, "I thank God that I speak in a language more than all of you. But in the ecclesia do I want to speak five words with my mind, that I should instruct others also, or ten thousand words in a language?" (1 Cor.14:18,19). By immediately adding the words, "Brethren, do not become little children in disposition. But in evil be minors, yet in disposition become mature" (1 Cor.14:20), he intimated that it was certainly immature, even for that day, to fail to follow his example with regard to the exercise of this gift.

Just as it is true that certain of the Corinthians once exercised gifts of prophecy, language and knowledge, it is equally true that "whenever the maturity may come, that which is out of an instalment shall be discarded" (1 Cor. 13:10). It is not simply "maturity," but "the" maturity (the Greek contains the definite article). In fact, in the Greek, "maturity" is an adjective, "mature." Therefore, "the mature" is used elliptically, the figure in which that which obviously constitutes the subject at hand is omitted for the sake of good diction, in order to avoid redundancy.

The "maturity," or " mature," even if the definite article did not appear, would have to be in reference to the maturity of the context. And since the definite article does appear, this fact is specifically emphasized, to draw our attention to it.

Similarly, in the Greek, the phrase, "that which is out of an instalment [shall be discarded]," contains merely the definite article, "the," where "that which" appears in the CV for the sake of English idiom. Therefore, in the Greek, this phrase, THE OUT OF-PART (WILL-BE-BEING-DOWN-UN-ACTED), is elliptical as well. It refers to the nullifying of the early, or "out of part" gifts.

The maturity of the context, beyond any doubt, is the maturing (i.e., completing or "*finish*ing") of the agency of "knowing" which has just been referred to in verse 9, the partial revelation which had already been given to the Corinthians. As in verse 12, where he uses "we" and even "I" (though evidently representatively, not necessarily of himself as such), similarly, here in verse 9, when speaking collectively of the ecclesia as a whole, Paul says, "out of an instalment are we knowing, and out of an instalment are we prophesying."

The sense is, Whenever the mature instalment of knowledge is provided, which may then lead to a fuller "knowing," then the gifts of prophecy, language, and knowledge will "cease" or "be discarded."

YET THEN, FACE TO FACE

In preparing the Corinthians for the final unfoldings of his prison epistles, Paul illustrates this change by means of a figure in which a child, when reaching his majority, discards the activities and implements of his minority. "When I was a minor, I spoke as a minor, I was disposed as a minor, I took account of things as a minor. Yet when I have become a man, I have discarded that which is a minor's" (1 Cor.13:11).

This illustration is interjected between the apostle's pronouncement in verse 10, that the mature instalment of knowledge will mean the abrogation of the gifts of verse 8, and the explanation of why this is so in verse 12: "For at present we are observing by means of a mirror, in an enigma, yet then [whenever the maturity may be coming; v.10], face to face. At present I know out of an instalment, yet then I shall recognize according as I am recognized also" (1 Cor.13:12).

The common view of 1 Corinthians 13:8-12 is that it contrasts our present experience with our future glory in resurrection. Now we are supposed to see through a glass darkly, but then we will see face to face and know even as we are known. The apostle, however, is not comparing our experience in this life with that of the next. Rather, he is contrasting the former partial revelation, with the entirety of revelation which will be enjoyed when the finishing instalment of divine truth is made known.

It is not a matter of "now"—continuing on from now, throughout this mortal life—that we today peer through a "glass darkly," but that the body of believers as a whole at the time in which Paul was writing were observing "by means of a mirror" (esoptron, INTO-VIEWER), that is, "in an enigma" (ainigma, ENIGMA). An enigma is that which is baffling or inexplicable. As we mentioned earlier, since what knowledge the Corinthians did have was only derived from a part, or initial instalment of the total revelation which God would provide for the members of Christ's body, any among them who were even somewhat enlightened and yet who longed for additional unfoldings, would have necessarily remained quite perplexed concerning various aspects of their own place and purpose within the divine counsels.

Were they to participate in the kingdom of the heavens and one day stand up in an allotment on the earth along with the prophets of old and all others who were worthy of this through their obedience to the law? If so, how could they enjoy such a place without becoming proselytes or practicing the law's righteousness? These and many related matters made the time then present full of enigma.

Yet, when the mature or finished instalment of knowledge comes, Paul explains that they will then see "face to face." The terminology in this figure (it is in juxtaposition to "by means of a mirror") seems to be based on Numbers 12:8 where the prophets saw "in enigmas" but Moses spoke with Yahweh directly, or "mouth to mouth." "Mouth to mouth am I speaking with him [Moses]," Yahweh declares, "and manifestly, not in enigmas." Even as the figure "face to face" answers to "by means of a mirror," thus also, the literal "recognize according as I am recognized also" answers to "in an enigma."

The phrase "according as" in verse 12, speaks not of degree of recognition, but of kind of recognition. In the Greek, it is one word, the compound kathos (DOWN-AS). It is an adverb not of degree but of kind. Its first element speaks of that which is foundational, what something "comes down to."

Paul's point is a simple one. Whenever God should finish His work of revealing His word, the Corinthians would then be freed from the enigmas which necessarily attend an incomplete revelation. Even as the limitations which befall a man who can only view himself by means of a mirror do not apply to those who can view him directly or face to face, thus also, now that the word of God has been completed, believers today are freed from the enigmas of an incomplete revelation.

What God has said has made it evident that the genuine gift of languages ceased to be exercised and was no longer given once the final instalment of the Pauline revelation was made known. Since that time, scripturally speaking, no one has ever "spoken in tongues."

Let us, then, humbly set aside all forms of contemporary glossolalia, the counterfeit "tongues" of today, that we might be growing and maturing in the transcendent grace of God which is ours in Christ Jesus. J.R.C.

DISCIPLINE IN GRACE

That the the foolish will misuse scriptural truth, does not make it untruth, nor does it make it so that the truth should be undisclosed to them, or otherwise kept a secret. Furthermore, those who are wise, to the degree that they are wise, will not misuse truth, and will instead find its testimony beneficial.

As believers, we are not promised (nor is it entailed) that since we are members of the body of Christ, we will, at least eventually in the course of our present career, repent and become characterized by faithfulness.

Even so, all those "of Christ Jesus" crucify the flesh (cp Gal.5:24). In the grace of God, we indeed "impale" it—thus initiating its eventual death, the fact of its resiliency to death itself notwithstanding.

If (by the "if" of argument) we died together, we shall be living together also (2 Tim.2:11; cp Rom.6:4; Col.3:3). As ones being justified in God's grace, we may be becoming enjoyers, in expectation, of the allotment of life eonian (Titus 3:7).

Yet it is only if we are enduring that we shall be reigning together also (2 Tim.2:12). Those of us whom God deems characterized not by endurance in faithfulness but rather by works of the flesh, shall not have a position, or "tenancy," in the reign of God—notwithstanding the fact that any such ones will nevertheless live under its jurisdiction (cp Gal.5:19-21; Eph.2:4-10).

All of us in our daily lives, sad but true, persist in some measure of sin. It is not irksome (cp Phil.3:1), then, but rather a relief to hear and know that for those under grace, where there is persistence—an ongoing continuance—in sin (as is the case with every one of us), there is a corresponding increase in grace (Rom.5:21). J.R.C.

THE PRIMITIVE PASSED BY

THE PATH "suited to transcendence" (1 Cor.12:31), is the path of truth for believers today. On this pathway, only "faith, expectation, love—these three" are "remaining" (1 Cor.13:13). The gifts of 1 Corinthians 12 as a whole were concerned only with the early period of the ecclesia's development. In that era, that entire complement of spiritual endowments was being given with a view to expedience (1 Cor.12:7), since the word of God had not yet been completed (cf Col.1:25). Yet now the word of God has been completed, through the final Pauline perfection (or "maturity") epistles of Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians. Consequently, since much that was once expedient is no longer appropriate, such provisions have ceased or been discarded.

Now, through the final writings of Paul, we may learn of the change within and full development of his evangel—going "from glory to glory" (cf 2 Cor.3:18). Thus we will be able to discern the truth which is applicable to ourselves today.

Like Peter, in an earlier era and former administration, we too need to be "established in the present truth" (cp 2 Peter 1:12), the truth for our own era and administration. We need to know, "that which concerns [ourselves]" (Col.4:8), that we might "stand mature and fully assured in all the will of God" (Col.4:12).

It should be no cause for alarm that we have found that only some of the specific gifts of 1 Corinthians 12 have been carried over (or rather, reintroduced) into the era of maturity. Through one means or another, God will always give us all that we need, all that is best for us, to accord with the era and the administration. For while we do find that certain gifts, in suitably adjusted form, are indeed transposed into the present administration, no mention is made of any others having been sustained.

As Paul declares, even in the perfection epistle of Ephesians, "[the ascended Christ] gives these, indeed, as apostles, yet these as prophets, yet these as evangelists, yet these as pastors and teachers" (Eph.4:11). This makes it evident that these services are included within God's provision for the ecclesia today, even in the era of maturity, not only in the former era, in which the ecclesia began. Though the provision of these gifts for believers today accords with the presence of these same gifts in the era which preceded the present, the present provision is not necessitated by the former presence.

It is not that any of us are apostles or prophets, but that we are "being built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets," the apostles and prophets of the ecclesia which is Christ's body, "the capstone of the corner being Christ Jesus Himself" (Eph.2:20).

HEALING

"Many will still ask, What of the other gifts, especially healing, which is not specifically said to have ceased? The answer is not far to seek. Physical healing is clearly promised in many a passage, but it has no place in the more excellent way we are considering. Ephesians promises all spiritual blessings among the celestials (Eph.1:3), but there is not a single word as to physical health on the earth. Philippians brings before us three of the most spiritual of God's slaves in this era of transcendent grace. Paul himself had a thorn in the flesh, and could not get rid of this physical infirmity, because it was necessary for the perfection of grace. God's power can only be perfected in infirmity (2 Cor.12:8), and Paul, who healed others, learns the deeper lesson of abiding under the power of Christ. This was after he began to walk the more excellent way.

"Timothy, next to Paul, is the greatest of all the apostles for this era of grace. He, too, treads the path of perfection, and suffers 'often infirmities' for which Paul prescribes a little wine, instead of exercising his gift of healing.

"And now we are told of Epaphroditus, who risked his soul for the saints, and nearly died while he was staying with Paul, to his great sorrow. He was on the more excellent way. No one on the more excellent way ever used the gift of miraculous healing even though he had it (Phil.2:25-30).

"Before Paul received this ministry he was the greatest healer of all the apostles. He more than duplicated all that Peter did. But when the great change came, as Israel's rejection of Messiah became more apparent, he decided no longer to know Christ after the flesh; he gave notice that the signs which accompanied the proclamation of the kingdom would cease, and intimated that God had something much better in store for the saints, not on earth but in the heavens, not in the physical realm, but in the spiritual.

"Knowing Christ according to 'the flesh' (2 Cor.5:16), refers to Christ's flesh not Paul's (cp Rom.9:3-5). Paul certainly would not claim a fleshly knowledge of [i.e., relationship to] Him as the basis of his ministry hitherto. But he had been proclaiming Him as the Messiah of Israel, as to His physical relationship to the Circumcision. Christ was a Jew and lived and died in their land and will restore the kingdom to them on the basis of their physical relationship to Him. Gentile blessing on earth must flow through this channel. Paul had been proclaiming Him as Israel's Messiah. This is 'knowing Christ after the flesh.' Healing and all the other gifts were associated with knowing Christ after the flesh. They continued in connection with that ministry.

"At that point in Paul's career when he wrote the second epistle to the Corinthians, he decided no longer to know Christ after the flesh (2 Cor.5:16). He was entering the more excellent way. Christ according to the flesh corresponds to the 'regeneration' (or 'renascence,' CV), as the kingdom is called (Matt.19:28). Its proclamation leads to the kingdom and the millennium. That will be very good. It will be excellent. But Paul, in spirit, has come to the end of the millennium and enters the new creation (2 Cor. 5:17). The result of no longer knowing Christ according to the flesh is that 'if anyone is in Christ, there is a new creation: the primitive passed by.'

["The primitive" is in the plural, ta archaia, "the primitives," or "THE ORIGINals" The reference with regard to that which is "passed by," is to the beginning, or original economies which were concerned with Christ according to the flesh, along with all their attendant accoutrements. Whatever gifts we may have in common today with the believers of those early eras, even those under Paul's early ministry, are incidental to, not necessitated by, the original gifts' erstwhile presence.

We enjoy the fullness of the "untraceable riches of Christ to the nations," and are enlightened according to "the administration of the secret, which has been concealed from the eons in God, Who creates all, that now [from the time of the revelations of Ephesians onward] may be made known to the sovereignties and authorities among the celestials, through the ecclesia, the multifarious wisdom of God, in accord with the purpose of the eons, which He makes in Christ Jesus, our Lord; in Whom we have boldness and access with confidence, through His faith" (Eph.3:8-12).]

"This is the more excellent way. The new birth leads to millennial blessing of which the gifts were the sign. The new creation introduces us to an unutterably higher sphere of blessing, based on faith, which asks for no signs.

"As Paul gradually entered this path his own health became impaired, he could not cure his dearest friends; he even left one of them, Trophimus, at Miletum, sick. Ask him, in his Roman prison whether the gift of healing has become inoperative. His answer might well be, If it has not, why am I afflicted, and why is Timothy often ill, and what of Trophimus and Epaphroditus? . . .[1]

MERCY AND GRACE FOR TODAY

Though we may hardly expect the miraculous signs associated with Israel's Messianic Kingdom in an era and administration which is completely divorced from it, this is no indication whatever that we may not make our requests known to God (cf Phil.4:6,7). God may well be merciful to us and grant us recovery, even if, like Epaphroditus, we should become "very nigh death" (Phil.2:27). It is not that we today are to rule out any hope of God's mercy and grace with respect to our bodily infirmities merely because the special gift of healing of 1 Corinthians 12 through the hands of certain men, no longer continues. May it not be coming to that! If it is His intention, His decretive will, God will surely deliver us from any ailment—for the time He intends and to the degree He intends—whether through means ordinary or extraordinary. Indeed, in the last analysis, "A man can not get anything if it should not be given him out of heaven" (John 3: 27).

Any today who truly experience the mitigation, remission or removal of pain or disease, enjoy their deliverance only because of God and His powerful operations. This is so regardless of the means that may be employed for this purpose and however questionable certain avenues of relief may be. For God is operating all according to the counsel of His will (Eph.1:11). But this does not mean, if we wish to be faithful, that we should follow after successful "Christian healers" any more than we should consult efficient Eastern oracles.

1. A. E. Knoch, Unsearchable Riches, vol.15, pp.303-305.

The ecclesia which is Christ's body, of which believers today are members, is a uniquely Pauline revelation and is not at all in view in Acts, especially in its earlier portion. Nothing is more mistaken than to claim that the present ecclesia began at Pentecost, or that we should pattern the present church order after the events and practices which come before us in the early chapters of Acts. Consequently, we need not strain our credulity to the breaking point in order to convince ourselves that the charismatic movement of today constitutes a genuine renewal of the teachings and practices of Pentecost. We should by no means expect the miracles and special visitations of the Lord which are recorded in the book of Acts, now that the administration of the secret (Eph.3:9) has come, and the word of God has been completed. Acts is simply a chronicle of the deeds of those whom it concerns, and is written from a Jewish perspective in anticipation of the terrestrial kingdom. It is a continuation of the account of our Lord's ministry as recorded by Luke, and is concerned with Israel's rejection of the evangel of the kingdom.

Even the most zealous "Pentecostal" believers of today who are at all objective, sometimes discount the prophecies, healings and tongues utterances which they themselves witness. This is because the prophecies are often proved false and the healings questionable, even as the tongues of little correspondence to the scriptural examples but of much correspondence to the repetitive, incoherent sounds made by their mentors and associates.

Since many pursue these "gifts" out of a clean heart, having engaged in sincere prayer that they might know the truth, they deem it impossible that the suggestion could perhaps be true that thus they are in the trap of the Adversary. Yet many such brethren see nothing incongruous in confidently insisting that those who differ with them—believers no less sincere than themselves who nonetheless deem these sensational practices spurious—are necessarily deceived by the devil.

Even where significant predictions occasionally prove accurate, this is no indication that any today are actually serving in the capacity of divine prophet. Indeed, "Who is this who speaks and it is coming to be, when my Lord did not instruct? Is not the evil and the good faring forth from the mouth of the Supreme?" (Lam.3:37,38; cp Isa.55:10,11).

As to so-called faith healing, the observations of A. E. Knoch many years ago seem applicable still today: "Some cases can be cured temporarily, but others are beyond its reach. The cases fall into precisely the same groups as other systems of mental healing. Functional diseases or functional complications which usually accompany organic maladies are usually mental in their origin, and can be cured by 'faith,' however induced. It is merely the power of mind over matter.

"Now we must concede that the appeal to God's Word is the strongest possible incentive to faith, and that mental healing under the guise of the miraculous should have far more success than appeals to philosophy or 'science' or merely the power of repetition. These all depend on the fact that there is no organic disease, but only disturbances in the mental control of the body. If we add to this the immense psychological effect of mass meetings, we have one of the most powerful natural means of ameliorating functional disease.

"Everyone knows the vivifying effect of joy and happiness, and the depressing effect of worry. The mental state powerfully influences the action of all the vital organs. Even blindness and paralysis may be caused by purely mental emotions. Such cases as these can be cured by the mental healers of today, and especially by those who seek to operate under the banner of the Bible. But not one of them can accomplish the healing which attested our Lord's messiahship or the nearness of the kingdom in the days of the apostles."[2]

THE SECRET NOW MANIFEST

Prophecy, even as special endowments of preliminary knowledge, prepared for further unfoldings and maturity. Similarly, the amazing gift of languages, once and for all, served as a sign to *un*believers. For it gave evidence to man's unrelenting love of the darkness instead of the light, even where the glorious message of enlightenment was attended by such a stupendous marvel.

The present administration of God's grace, in the language of inspiration, called for an "adjusting of the saints, . . . for the upbuilding of the body of Christ, unto the end that we should all attain to the unity of the faith and of the realization of the son of God, to a mature man, to the measure of the stature of the complement of the Christ" (Eph.4:12,13). The time has come when the apostle is admonishing and teaching so as to be presenting every man mature in Christ Jesus (Col.1:28). This was impossible at the time when 1 Corinthians was penned. Yet later on, Epaphras, struggling for the Colossians in prayer, did so that they might "stand mature and fully assured in all the will of God" (Col.4:12).

It was granted to Paul, for us, "to complete the word of God—the secret which has been concealed from the eons and from the generations, yet now is made manifest to His saints, to whom God wills to make known what are the glorious riches of this secret among the nations, which is: Christ among you, [and] the expectation of glory [which concerns you]" (Col.1:25-27). "Nations" and "you" are both plural, so en ("in" when used with a singular object) should be rendered "among" in English. This does not refer to Christ's presence, by His spirit, within the individual believer (which was not a secret; cf Rom.8:9; Gal.2:20), but to the presence of the Christ of God now (Who, formerly, according to flesh, was associated solely with the nation of Israel) among the very nations themselves: Christ among you!

"Christ, Who never went among the nations before His ascension, met Paul outside the land, on the Damascus road, not as the lowly Jesus, but as the glorified Son of God. Gradually, in spirit, through the apostle's ministries, He unfolds His secret purpose to be to the nations, in spirit, all that He had been to Israel in flesh, and far more. This is the secret: Christ among the nations, a glorious expectation. Not a subordinate place in the earthly kingdom, but a preeminent place in His celestial domains"[3]

As those who recognize that the "primitives" (or "beginning" things) are indeed "passed by," we rejoice in the glorious unfoldings which are given to us now, those revelations which complete the word of God and afford us our position of maturity in which we are complete in Christ (Col.2:10). May God grant that our love might be superabounding still more and more in realization and all sensibility, for us to be testing the things of consequence (Phil.1:9,10). We pray as well for a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the realization of Him, the eyes of our heart having been enlightened, for us to perceive what is the expectation of His calling, and what the riches of the glory of His allotment among the saints (Eph.1:17,18).

We are awaiting Christ's presence by faith, in expectation, and through love. For, as our apostle has said, and we have discovered, "Yet now are remaining faith, expectation, love—these three. Yet the greatest of these is love. Be pursuing love" (1 Cor.13:13; 14:1). J.R.C.

THE MIND OF CHRIST

THE revision of the CONCORDANT VERSION of 1 Corinthians 2:16 reads as follows:

> For who knows the mind of the Lord?
> Who will be redirecting Him?
> Yet we have the mind of Christ.

We who are spiritual, that is, we who have been given the spiritual endowment of faith (cf 1 Cor.13:13), as well as expectation and (greatest of all) love, have a new understanding, a renewed mind, a changed outlook on life and God, and on what is truly of consequence. The mind of Christ is that mind which led Him to empty Himself of all His glories, and humble Himself in obedience to the will of His God and Father unto the death of the cross (cf Matt.26:37-44; Phil.2:5-8). It is revealed here in the words "Christ crucified" (1 Cor.1:23; 2:2). In the death of Christ in suffering and forsakenness, we perceive a mind that focused in faith on every detail of God's word to Him.

Thus to have the mind of Christ is to focus on what God says to us, which is the word of the cross, to listen attentively to ("obey") the message, "Christ crucified." For Christ it was a message of what He must do. For us it is a message of what has been done, and it is this which moves us in our thinking, for joy and peace, and in our doing, which is summed up in the word "love."

The question here, however, is "Who knows the mind of the Lord?" This is an exact quotation from the Septuagint translation of the opening line of Isaiah 40:13 where the Lord (Hebrew, "Yahweh") is seen in His glory as the One Who comforts Jerusalem as their Ruler and Shepherd in the promised kingdom. Yet this glory did not follow the deportation to Babylon and their return after seventy years (as Isaiah's words might have suggested), nor even when, many centuries later, the Coming One was born in the line of David and heralded that kingdom Himself. The comfort comes after Israel receives shelters for every single one of their sins (Isa.40:2 CVOT), not because of their own sufferings, but because the Lord would be the Antitype of the propitiatory shelter sacrifices. The words of Isaiah 53 concerning This One as a Man of pains, smitten of Elohim and humbled, and wounded because of Israel's transgression (Isa.53:3-5) would have to be fulfilled before the words of Isaiah 40:1 would have full force. And even yet Isaiah's prophecy has not come into realization. It is in view of this that attention is drawn in Isaiah 40:13 to the mind (the Hebrew uses the word "spirit" to encompass all that is invisible in us) of the Lord and its impenetrability to the human mind. The mind of the Lord is one that holds fast to the necessity of His humiliation before there can be the enjoyment of His exaltation.

No one can truly know this mind with any depth of understanding apart from the blessing of believing the word of the cross. When our Lord told the disciples clearly that they were going up to Jerusalem, and that all as to the Son of Humanity, written through the prophets would be accomplished, for He would be given up to the nations and be scoffed at and outraged and spat upon, and be scourged and killed, and the third day He would be rising, "they understood none of these things, and this declaration was hid from them, and they knew not what was said" (Luke 18:31-34).

However, while not knowing with understanding what this mind set of Jesus meant, nor how critical it was, Peter heard the words themselves enough to be shocked by them, and he began to rebuke the Lord, saying, "Propitious be it to You, Lord! By no means shall this be for You!" (Matt. 16:21,22). In this he sought to redirect the Lord. Consequently the Lord called Peter His adversary: "Go away behind Me, satan!" (Matt.16:23).

The human mind sees the cross of Christ as stupidity and weakness, but the mind of those who are believing sees it as God's wisdom and God's power (1 Cor.1:18-25). Those who crucified the Lord of glory would not have done so had they truly known what it was about (1 Cor.2:8). Yet, in His grace, God has revealed something of the cross to us and makes known through His spirit some its glorious results, that we may be perceiving them in faith (cf 1 Cor.2:9-13).

Yet even those who have accepted God's evangel concerning His Son will sometimes become captured by their own thoughts of how sin must be dealt with, and, like Peter, they will become enemies of the cross of Christ (Phil.3:18).

Thus, for example, we hear (and sometimes think and say ourselves) that justification is a cooperative endeavor involving more than the death of Christ and our identification with Him, requiring something of ourselves. This is to make the cross of Christ only a partial contribution to deliverance, which. when all is said and done, means there can be no lasting deliverance from sin and death at all.

Even though Peter would have had the Lord change His mind, and others told Him in mocking disbelief to come down from the cross, which indeed He had the power to do, and even though He Himself was brought to cry out in dazed confusion and pain, "My God! My God! Why do You forsake Me?" nevertheless, He was not redirected from His Father's will.

May it be that our minds focus more and more on the word of the cross, on that message of God's wisdom and power and righteousness which centers fully on Christ and what He has done, and not on ourselves. In this is spiritual power for us in our lives, for joy and peace and growth in love.

Accordingly, Paul entreats us in Philippians 2:5-8:

5 For let this ˡdisposition be in you, which is in Christ Jesus also, 6 Who, being ˡinherently in the form of God, deems° it not pillaging ˙to be equal with God, 7 bt˙nevertheless empties Himself, ¯taking the form of a slave, ¯coming° to be in the likeness of human beings, 8 and ¯being found in fashion as a human, He humbles Himself, ¯becoming° obedient unto death, ʸeven the death of the cross.

The AV speaks here of the "mind of Christ," where the CV has the "disposition of Christ." The Greek word rendered "disposition" is not the same as the word "mind" in 1 Corinthians 2:16, but refers to what we call the bent or inclination of the mind. Indeed this is not the human disposition which is directed to pride and boasting and the achievement of comfort and happiness by way of human effort. But in accepting and retaining the word of the cross we are endowed spiritually with a growing measure of this disposition of Christ.

TOGETHER-STEPIZE

Now how is it that we have chosen to use the English verb, "redirect" for the Greek word sumbibazō (TOGETHER-having-STEPize) in 1 Corinthians 2:16? First of all (as we have noticed) it seems undeniable that Paul adopts the words of Isaiah 40:13 as they appear in the Septuagint translation. The opening line of this verse in the Septuagint is: "Who knows (the) mind of (the) Lord?" These very words are used here and also in Romans 11:34. The second line in the Septuagint begins a question (which is expanded in the third line): "And who becomes His counselor [or: adviser]?" and this is quoted in Romans 11:34, but omitted in 1 Corinthians 2:16. Then, in a third line, the Septuagint completes the question concerning a counselor, one "who will be together-stepizing Him," which appears here in 1 Corinthians 2:16 as a question by itself (but omitted in Romans).

When a counselor is in view, the "together-stepizing" is the act of drawing information together in order to direct, or as the case may be, redirect the one being counseled, in the proper or advantageous steps to be taken. No one can do this to the Lord.

This verb is used in the Septuagint nine times. It appears three times in place of the Hebrew verb cause-KNOW (or "inform"); once in place of the Hebrew verb cause-UNDERSTAND (or "give understanding to"); and five times for cause-AIM (or "direct"). In three of these passages it is used as the act of a counselor (Psalm 32:8; Isaiah 40:13; and Isaiah 40:14). Rather than asking "Who will be informing Him?" in Isaiah 40:13, and "Who gives understanding to Him?" in Isaiah 40:14, and "I shall direct you in the way you should go" in Psalm 32:8, as they usually do for these verbs elsewhere, the Septuagint translators employed this rarely used verb, sumbibazō, which, although being closely aligned in meaning, conveys its own nuance of informing one of the steps that should be taken in the present situation.

Since Hebrew and Greek have other verbs for the sense of "direct" and "counsel" and "advise" it seems best to find another term for a concordant version, yet one that conveys the sense suggested by the context. When it comes to the message "Christ crucified," the question, "Who will be redirecting Him?" is in full agreement with the context. No one could redirect Him in His obedience and faithfulness to the cross, and no one today can redirect its significance in relation to sin and death.

Christ crucified is the only solution to sin. And Christ crucified is the only means by which death can be abolished. It is this evangel which exposes the mind of Christ and operates to redirect our minds.

1 Corinthians continues to take up various issues of a practical nature, both concerning our daily living and our assembling with other believers, all of which are built on the word of the cross, "Christ crucified." This word is often stated explicitly, as in 5:7, "our Passover . . . Christ, is sacrificed for our sakes;" in 6:20 and 7:23, "you are bought with a price;" in 8:11 where attention is directed to "the brother, because of whom Christ dies"; in 10:16 concerning the "communion of the blood of Christ" and 11:26 concerning the "announcing [of] the Lord's death until He should come." In all of these Paul is not laying down precepts of law, and certainly not establishing religious rituals, but is encouraging a state of mind and pattern of living in which the message, "Christ crucified," is kept vibrant and powerful before us.

The extended discussion of "spiritual endowments" starting in chapter 12 and culminating with that endowment of love most perfectly displayed by our Lord in His giving of Himself for sinners which is always to be the central theme in our "coming together," leads us to the great evangelistic message of chapter 15. Here the word of the cross, which is "Christ dies for our sins," is seen to include the word declaring, "He has been roused." And this full message is the basis for God to become All in all.

D.H.H.

The following is a tentative CV rendering of the Septuagint Version of Isaiah 40:13, using the verb "redirect" for the verb, sumbibazō:

13 [a]Who knows the mind of the Lord?
And [a]who becomes His counselor,
Who will be redirecting Him?

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

THIS ISSUE of Unsearchable Riches features our revised translation of 1 Corinthians, chapters 15 and 16, with articles centered on chapter 15, surely one of the highlights of Scripture as a whole.

The first three articles are selected from A. E. Knoch's "Studies in 1 Corinthians 15" (available from us in booklet form). This is followed by some thoughts I have been putting together on the relationship of the evangel Paul evangelized with the opening chapters of Genesis. We conclude with Jim Coram's defense of Paul's clear teaching in 1 Corinthians 15:22 that all human beings will ultimately be vivified in Christ.

Not all references to passages in this chapter are worded exactly as in the revised CV given on pages 146-150. Some appear as in the CLNT, and in my own article I go further toward a more literal rendering, and even word my own thoughts as much as possible with simple "fact" verbs. James Coram has replaced renderings of the Greek word, anthrōpos, as "man" by the more exact translation, "human" (and the plural "men" by "human beings"). This may be difficult to get used to at first (just as using the English simple "present tense" as consistently as possible for the Greek "aorist" verbs will often seem awkward), but in time, with continued reading, its advantage of exactitude should become appreciated.

Altogether, such changes are made with the hope that the original wordings in Greek may be conveyed more exactly in English, toward the end that we all may be standing firm in the faith (1 Cor 16:13), and living now more in accord with the faith. D.H.H.

THE EVANGEL

(1 Corinthians 15:1-11)

CHRIST is the solitary subject of the evangel, and three facts concerning Him, all of which took place within the narrow compass of three days, constitute its essence. He died, was entombed, and has been roused. His death was for our sins; His resurrection is evidence of their removal. So simple, yet so sublime, is the message that saves! Who can measure the depths of love which it reveals, or scale the heights of glory which it unveils? It sinks the most august Personage in the whole universe down into the deepest degradation and it carries Him up to the highest heights in the heavens. It concerns God's anointed Saviour and that part of His career which effects our salvation. Apart from these three facts there is no evangel. The death of Christ is sad news, not glad tidings, apart from His resurrection.

To be sure, there is much more to be said as to the effects of His sacrifice Godward and manward. Especially today, as the second epistle of Paul to the Corinthians makes clear, we should herald the conciliation, for God is conciliated in this administration. If we faithfully bear witness to the work of Christ and the influence it has had upon God, then its application to mankind will not fail to accomplish its mission.

A TEACHING EVANGEL

Many a time, in my early efforts to serve my Lord, have I heralded the evangel to the lost. In preparation, I often pondered the opening words of the fifteenth of First Corinthians, and sought to make it the basis of my message. But the bare facts of the evangel are soon stated, and more was needed to fill in its outline. So it was that I gradually took to what was then called a "teaching gospel," and this eventually led to teaching the saints in place of evangelizing sinners. I would heartily commend this "teaching evangel." It seeks to fill out the skeleton here given from other portions of the Word. This is, in fact, suggested by the phrase "in accord with the Scriptures," which is twice used in this condensed outline, as if to show its importance, and to intimate that these brief words are but an epitome of vast fields of truth which are elaborated elsewhere in the Sacred Scrolls. The great subject of sacrifice is involved in His death. And the greater subject of resurrection is implied in His rousing.

CHRIST—THE ANOINTED

Until we know Who it is that died, the evangel will have little meaning or power. In Christendom somewhat is known of His life of humiliation on earth, but how little of His official glories as God's Anointed Prophet and Priest and King! The mere mention of the name "Christ" in any gospel assembly should awaken feelings and thoughts such as the name "Messiah" brings up in an intelligent synagogue of the Jews. The most Blessed Being in the universe, the Image of the Deity, the Channel of all creation, the Effulgence of God's glory, His Beloved Son, the promised Seed of the woman Who will bruise the serpent's head, the Seed of Abraham and David's Heir, the Prophet like Moses and the Priest after the order of Melchizedek, the promised Saviour of the world—such is the One Who died, was entombed, and rose. He should be made known to all as the Lord of life so that they may realize, in some degree, what it meant for Him to die. He should be exalted to His place supreme so that men may get at least a glimpse of His humiliation.

DIED FOR OUR SINS

That such a Christ should die—this is the great marvel. That He, through Whom all life has come, should enter the realms of death, opens up to our gaze the vast vista of God's love, for death could never have touched Him except as a Sacrifice for the sins of others. But here, again, false conceptions of death rob the truth of all reality. Death is no longer an enemy. It is regarded as only a higher form of life. Apart from the physical sufferings, Christendom makes death a portal to glory instead of the gate to shame. Knowing not the high honors of Christ nor the deep disgrace of death they cannot compute the vast distance between them, so cannot realize or appreciate the descent of Christ to the cross or the glory of His resurrection.

IN ACCORD WITH THE SCRIPTURES

To trace the types of Christ which speak of His death for sin is a task by itself, beyond the scope of the present treatise. Before the entrance of sin God provided Him, as a flawless and unspotted Lamb (1 Peter 1:20), Whose precious blood alone could cleanse away the sin that was to come. And when sin actually entered, Yahweh straightway made coats of skins for Adam and his wife, to clothe them (Gen.3:21), and these must have come from animals which died for their sins. Abel brought to Yahweh the firstborn of the flock and of their fat (Gen.4:4). When God chose to dwell among His people Israel He could be approached only through the death of victims on sacrificial altars slain, all of which foretold the death of Christ. Unnumbered multitudes of animals yielded up their souls merely to portray His death for sin. Rivers of blood have flowed merely to point onward to the precious blood of Golgotha.

In every case the shadow had the shape of the reality. There is a marvelous harmony between the types and the august Antitype. Under the ritual of the law, only flawless animals could be offered, so that His flawlessness might be recognized. All of the details of His death were presented typically by the various offerings, especially those for sin, and by the Passover lamb, and the sacrifices on the day of "atonement" or propitiation. I would press upon those who preach or teach the gospel, to dwell upon the way in which His sacrifice fulfilled all that was written of it in the Scriptures. Let not the mere statement suffice. So may we kindle a living faith in God and His Word in breasts that know Him not, should we show how fully the substance satisfies the shadow.

HE WAS ENTOMBED

As an evidence, both of His death and of His resurrection, we must press the fact of His entombment. There must be no question of the reality of His entrance into the death state, or it will react upon the reality of His resurrection. Let us note exactly what is said, for very few in Christendom now believe it. The attack on the great truth of the resurrection begins by setting aside the words, "He was entombed," and putting in their place, "His body was buried, but His soul and spirit were alive outside the tomb." As a matter of fact, few actually believe that He died for our sins. They have no need for the tomb, except as a temporary receptacle for His outer shell, not His real Self.

The reverent student who reads God's account of the creation of mankind will note that Adam was formed of soil from the ground (Gen.2:7). Later this is made still more emphatic. In judging him God said, "By the sweat of your brow shall you eat your bread, until you return to the ground, for from it were you taken. For soil you are, and to soil you shall return" (Gen.3:19). Humanity is not composed of spirits clothed with a mantle of flesh. It has no expression apart from a body. The spirit imparts life and power and makes it a living soul, but, apart from the body, it is not a spirit or a soul. When a man dies he is buried or entombed, not his body merely. If this is not so, resurrection is a farce and deserves the fate which has befallen it. Christendom has repudiated death, so why should it witness to the resurrection? If He was not entombed, neither was He raised.

ROUSED THE THIRD DAY

After Isaac had been taken from Abraham by the command to slay him, he recovered him on the third day (Gen. 22:4; Heb.11:17,18). Joseph was in prison two full years or "years of days" (Gen.41:1), and was released and exalted on the third "years of days." Our Lord Himself referred to Jonah's escape from the fish as a type of His resurrection. Along with the sacrifices which were required to be without corruption, these instances foreshadow the great fact that Christ, though dead, saw no corruption.

Besides this there are other pictures of resurrection, such as the two birds used in the cleansing of the leper in the fourteenth chapter of Leviticus. One bird was not enough to set forth the truth, for it was slain and its blood applied. So another was associated with it by dipping it in the blood of the slain bird. With this token of death upon it, it was set free to fly away into the heavens, a blessed and beautiful exhibition of life beyond suffering and death.

WITNESSES OF HIS RESURRECTION

"The matter shall be confirmed at the mouth of two witnesses or at the mouth of three witnesses" (Deut.19:15). Men are fallible, and may be mistaken, so it was laid down in the law of God that matters of importance should not be determined by the testimony of a single witness. The thought of a double witness is employed in a variety of ways in establishing the most important event which has ever occurred in the history of the earth. He was seen by individuals and by more than five hundred at once. Two of the pillars of the Circumcision saw Him, Cephas and James. He was seen at least twice by the twelve, who would be especially competent to testify, as they had spent so many months with Him before.

Still the most striking and satisfactory testimony of all is that of Paul himself. All of the other witnesses were friends of our Lord and inclined toward His teaching. Saul of Tarsus was His worst enemy. He persecuted those who believed in His resurrection. There cannot be the least suspicion that his testimony is biased in favor of our Lord. He lacked what the Circumcision had, a personal acquaintance with Him before His death, but this is far more than balanced by his enmity, which would dispose him to testify against, not for, the truth.

Though Paul saw Him last after His resurrection, at the same time he saw Him first as a foretaste of His return to earth. He saw Him in glory so bright that it struck him blind. He saw Him as Israel will see Him in the future, not as the disciples saw Him in the past. In the regeneration, when the nation shall be born at once, then the Messiah will appear in His glory, and they will see Him as Paul did on the road to Damascus, returned to earth, surrounded with celestial splendor. Will anyone who sees Him thus need any further evidence of His resurrection? So overwhelming was this proof to Paul that it instantaneously transformed him from a fanatical persecutor to an adoring slave, just as will be the case with Israel in the future. Is not this why he calls himself a premature birth? While Israel is not regenerated, he was, in a figure, because he saw the glorified Christ, Whom none of the others had yet seen.

THE GRACE OF GOD

Paul's whole career, after he had met the Lord in glory, was evidence for the resurrection, for the power of Christ's resurrection wrought in him. And this power came to him through the channel of grace. Let us not miss the emphasis which he places on this, the reigning characteristic of this administration. This he declares, in one of those beautiful examples of divine rhetoric in which lovers of literature delight (15:10):

> Yet in the grace of God I am what I am,
> And His grace, which is in me, does not come to be > for naught,
> But more exceedingly than all of them toil I
> —yet not I,
> But the grace of God which is with me.

It is this grace, operating in God's saints today, which first empowered Paul, which bears witness to a living, glorified Christ, at God's right hand. Later, in the Philippian epistle, Paul expands this thought. Through the power of Christ's resurrection, fellowship in His sufferings, and conformity to His death, he strove to attain to an experience such as will be ours in the resurrection (Phil.3:10,11). The conduct of every saint should be ample evidence that Christ is no longer in the tomb, but is risen and gracious in His glory.

Thus the apostle lays before those who deny the resurrection, the evidence which supports it. He gives the historical testimony of actual witnesses, fully competent to decide, in sufficient numbers and reputation to shut out all deception. No event in the history of the world is better attested. But the evidence is not confined to the past. It is a vital force operating in every true believer. The grace which flows from His glorious resurrection produces a power which should transform our lives so that we may walk as partakers of the power of His resurrection, and living reflectors of His glory.

FROM MORTALITY TO VIVIFICATION
(1 Corinthians 15:20-28)

"ALL IN ALL"—such is the august goal of our God! He will yet be everything to every one of His creatures, as it is fitting that He should be. Nothing less will satisfy His heart or the heart of our Saviour. Nothing less will vindicate His love or form a fit conclusion for the tragedy of the eons. Let us with joy believe it. Let us exult as we receive it! May these three simple syllables, that an infant's lips can lisp, become the very basis of our being, the background of every act, the key to every occurrence, a light in every darkness, a balm for every wound. They are the pole star of all true philosophy, the consummation of all wisdom. They are the heart of the compend of divine revelation, "Out of Him and through Him and for Him is all" (Rom. 11:36), and reflect back upon the dismal story of sin and suffering the bright and beneficent beams of the immanent love of God, for which the darkness and death we now endure is but a fleeting foil.

Christ has been roused from among the dead, and not only so, but He is the Firstfruit of those who are reposing. Just as, each year, a sheaf of grain was waved before Yahweh as a token and promise of the coming crop (Lev. 23:10), so Christ, in His recall from death, was but the beginning, to be followed, in due course, by the whole harvest. All is reckoned as being in the Firstfruit, so that, in another place, the apostle says, "If the firstfruit is holy, the kneading is also" (Rom.11:16). What is true of one is germinally true of all the rest. So that we need only look at Christ to see what God's heart has in store for all the creatures which His hands have made. His vivification is the sample and gives certainty to all the rest.

In his epistle to the Romans, the apostle shows how Christ's work parallels and far more than corrects the one act of Adam, to which is traced the entrance of sin and death (Rom.5:12-19). In fullest accord with this he now develops the same thought in connection with life. In this also, Christ is far more than the equivalent of Adam. Death, as well as sin, came in through the first man. So life, as well as righteousness, comes in through the Second, our Lord Jesus Christ. Indeed, this goes far deeper, for it is death working in us which is the cause of our sin.

Far more than our decease was brought in by Adam, and something which affects our souls much more than the sleep which closes our career. God did not say to Adam, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen.2:17 AV). If He had, Adam would have died the very day in which he was judged. He might then have had no progeny of sinners. In the precise language of the Hebrew, He said, "to die you shall be dying." That is, there would be dying as well as death. As we now know, there is a long process of disintegration, with which we are all acquainted, even though we are accustomed to calling it life.

Ever since Adam sinned, he and his descendants have been dying. Like ripe fruit plucked from the tree, our bloom soon passes away, and we show a slow process of decay. In Adam, all are dying, even while they are still alive. That is the "life" that we inherited from our disobedient parent, which not one of his descendants has ever evaded.

Thus, we read, shall all be vivified. The contrast is not between the crisis of actual death and the resurrection, but between the dying process and a life process, beyond the touch of death.

THE CRISIS OF DEATH

The contrast in this glorious promise is between mortality and immortality, between our present mode of existence and the glory before us. That vivification is far more than resurrection is abundantly evident, for it is for those who have not died as well as for those who repose. Our Lord is not only the Resurrection but the Life (John 11:25). Not only could He call back Lazarus from the tomb to life like that he had before, and thus be his Resurrection, but, in the days to come, He will call Lazarus once again, to a life indissoluble and incorruptible, and thus become his Life.

For death the cure is resurrection, but for dying we need life. The crisis of death is a single act and so is resurrection. Each may occur in an instant of time. This is not before us in this parallel (1 Cor.15:22). The words "are dying" and "shall be vivified" are in the incomplete tense in the Original, which denotes an action in progress. The long drawn-out activity of death in dragging men down to the grave is put in contrast with the endless activity of life in imparting incorruption, power and glory. All who endured the first shall enjoy the second. Here is a message for mankind which should lift it above its misery! Knowing this, we can even enjoy the weakness and humiliation of our present state in anticipation of the glory for which it is the necessary prelude.

THE THREE CLASSES

The three classes of the vivified are distinguished from each other in character and time. Christ is a class by Himself. Then there is the group of faith, those who are His. Thereafter, to complete the "all," come the remainder, who have no special designation, except that, at present, they may not be called His, hence do not believe. This agrees with the classification elsewhere given, where God is called the Saviour of all mankind, especially of believers (1 Tim.4:10).

The time of vivification varies with each class. Christ, as we know, has been beyond the dominion of death ever since His resurrection. "Those who are Christ's" will be vivified at His presence (1 Cor.15:23). This seems to be at the crisis of the eons, between the three evil and the two good ones. As the great object of the apostle here is to show that all will be made alive, he does not give details concerning this second class, or tell us when this presence takes place. The term he uses, the parousia, the BESIDE-BEING, is broad enough to include all that is written elsewhere concerning the coming of Christ to Israel (cf Acts 1:11) and, before that, to us (1 Thess.4:16,17). The main point of this part of Paul's presentation lies in the last word, the consummation.

THE CONSUMMATION

In place of naming, the third class to be vivified the apostle simply tells us that after the vivification of the second class there will be a consummation. He names an event, not the dead who are left. The fate of the third class is so involved in this event, that we need only to understand it in order to be informed of their future. This grand truth seems to be almost unknown in Christendom. Although the very climax and fulfillment of all revelation, it has been eclipsed by human perversions. As a result the god of Christendom has lost the essential attributes of Deity. He is like the foolish man who started to build but could not finish. Theology brings nothing to a conclusion. It attains no definite goal. Sin, suffering, and insubjection are never conquered. God is compelled to work an eternal miracle in order to maintain a never-ending eyesore in His creation, once so subject, so sinless, and so good.

The consummation consists in subjection. Christ Himself will be subject when He has subjected all. Here we have a key to all the evil in the world. It is due to insubjection to God. This is seen clearly in the character of the eons. The evil eons are either anarchistic or under human government. The good are under the scepter of Christ. The very name, the Kingdom, speaks of subordination. Adam's insubjection brought in sin. Christ's obedience and reign will restore all to its proper place beneath the rule of God. This is not an endless, hopeless task which never comes to fruition. It will be accomplished. It will find its finish at the close of the eons. It is the consummation of the eonian times. Intelligent and loving subjection on the part of all His creatures brings us to the goal, God All in all.

Christ will give up the Kingdom to God as Father. These two names reveal to us the object of the eonian times. They show us their root and their fruit. From being creatures of the great Subjector, who have rebelled against His rule, mankind is brought to loving obedience, as children of the Father. If that time could be described as a day, we might call it the day of the Father. Now we have man's day, for man is ruling. Soon will come Yahweh's day, to be followed by the day of God. Then will come the final, the finishing time, the "day" of the Father, in which God becomes the loving Ruler of His own household, and all creation will be one vast family, knowing no subjection except to Him, no laws but filial obedience. The Kingdom will be handed over to God, yet this will transform it into a universal family.

It is the office of Christ, God's Anointed, to bring this about. It is astonishing to note how this is to be done. The method is entirely negative and consists in making certain things inoperative (15:24,26).

It is usually supposed that the universe is so essentially wrong that it requires positive corrective acts to set it right. From this basic revelation it appears that what is needed is the negative abolition of activity in two distinct directions, the cessation of all subjecting powers over and outside of man, and the stopping in man of the force which subjects him to sin. In other words, man is now subject to other men and to the operation of death within him. Make these activities inoperative and he will be subject to God. Man was made by his Creator for subjection to the Deity. This is his normal condition, to which he returns as soon as alien restraining influences have been removed. Add to this negative removal the positive experiences which were his while insubordinate, and we have all that is necessary to make the creatures of God not only obedient, but adoring children of the Father; children to whom He is Everything.

Death is the last enemy to be made inoperative. To many the inclusion of death in a discussion of subjection seems strange and misplaced. This arises from the mistaken idea of death which prevails. Not only do men make the death state one of life, but they fail to grasp the fact which appears at the very forefront of revelation, that death is operating in every descendant of Adam during this life. All are dying. Moreover, that great truth, that death is transmitted (not sin), so that we sin because we are dying, has been obscured by translators and is unknown to theology (Rom. 5:12). But once we understand that all of our insubordination is due to the immanence of death in our members and that we cannot be normally subject so long as it operates in us, then we are prepared to give death the place accorded to it in this discussion.

If we stop the activity of death in humanity it cannot be insubordinate of itself, for it was not only created out of God but for Him. I once wondered why death was the last enemy. Now I know that it must be so, for its abolition by itself would remove all the rest, were they not already abolished. If death (and, as a consequence, sin, which is its fruit) should be made inoperative at the beginning of the thousand years, there could be no reign and no rebellion, for insubjection would be absent. Where all are subject to God all other forms of subjection must vanish. Subjection to anyone but God is abnormal. That is what brought in sin. Its gradual abolition in the eons to come will lead mankind up to the consummation. Make death inoperative and the last vestige of insubjection vanishes. It must be the last enemy because its abolition completely subjects all to God.

The consummation, then, does not follow immediately after the vivification of those who are Christ's. The second class are made alive in order to have a part in the reign of Christ. The end cannot come so long as there is such a thing as reigning. The interval between the second and the third class consists largely in Christ, with His saints, taking over the government of the universe. No rule, however, can exist where there is no insubjection, for no one who is subject to God needs any intermediary sovereignty or authority or power. These, taking the place which belongs to God, are in their very nature abnormal, opposed to God's ultimate, unless they are temporary and retiring, having their own withdrawal as their aim, being merely scaffolding to be removed when its purpose is accomplished. Such is the nature of the rule of Christ. It is not the object but the means. It aims at its own recall.

THE REIGN OF CHRIST

"For He must be reigning until . . ." (1 Cor.15:25).

This passage, because it goes to the very bottom of things, bares to our gaze the true nature of rule. How much disturbance and distress have come to mankind through the operation of human government! From the days of Noah till the present, oppression and tyranny have been the order of the day, wars of aggression and succession have bathed the world in blood, and even the best of governments have left much to be desired. Human government is certainly abnormal. And will the reign of Christ with the saints restore ideal conditions? Is not the rebellion at the end of the thousand years an emphatic denial? The reign will be righteous and good, and will bring much blessing because God will be back of Christ, so that it will approximate the ideal. But evil is not banished from the universe by intermediate rule, but by the gradual and final withdrawal of all rule.

Almost all other rule tends to draw men away from subjection to God. Christ's rule will be devoted to restoring them to the normal. It will continue until all rule is concentrated in His hands. All enemies will be put under His feet.

What is needed to restore all to more than normal perfection is to stop the activity of death. This is done, at the last, by the vivification of all. The dead and the living, all who are still within the clutches of death in any of its manifestations, are made alive. This is the point of this passage. It puts universal life in place of universal death.

This passage affords a splendid lesson in intelligent interpretation. The apostle insists that Christ subjects all under His feet. He proceeds, "Now whenever He may be saying that all is subject, it is evident that it is outside of Him Who subjects all to Him." That which is self-evident and altogether contrary to the object of the whole, need not be stated. Paul need not say, "He subjects all except God." But a most important point arises, which is also self-evident, and that is that there are no other exceptions. And if the word "all" has no other exceptions here, why should it have them in similar connections elsewhere? Nor is it a sign of superior acumen to insist that stones and sticks are not included. Such an objection is only a sign that the objector is not yet fully subject in his mental operations. It suffices to know that, as a result of Christ's reigning, there will be no insubjection left in all the universe, so that He may hand it over to the Father that God may be All in all.

THE RESURRECTON CHANGE
(1 Corinthians 15:50-58)

"Look! a secret to you am I telling! We all indeed shall not be put to repose, yet we all shall be changed" (1 Cor.15:51). This is the secret of the resurrection. It reveals the one feature which will distinguish our vivification from that of the Circumcision. It declares that our bodies will not be raised soilish but celestial, not with blood, but vivified directly by spirit. The soil and air are mediums through which the power which comes from the sun is supplied to our bodies. In our new bodies these will not be needed. Life will flow to us directly from its divine source, and abundantly, unhampered by the means of supply.

The change will come "in an instant, in the twinkle of an eye, at the last trump. For He will be trumpeting, and the dead will be roused incorruptible, and we shall be changed" (1 Cor.15:52). Here we have the same prior expectancy (Eph.1:12) which was revealed first to the Thessalonians. Here are the two classes, the survivors and the reposing, and the Lord Himself descends with the trumpet of God (1 Thess.4:15,16). In Thessalonians all is colored by the consolation which the apostle wished to impart. Here it is concerned with the change which the secret reveals. There we find that the dead will be roused first, so that they and the living will be snatched away together in clouds. Here we learn that it will all be the work of an instant, in the time it takes an eyelid to raise or lower, not even during the short period in which the trumpet will be blown, but at the last blast.

"For He will be trumpeting, and the dead will be roused incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Again we notice the order, for it agrees with the previous word, that the dead in Christ shall be rising first (1 Thess.4:16). Paul conforms fully in every way to his former revelation. He simply enlarges upon that side of it which deals with our bodies. Here he uses a remarkable phrase which is the equivalent of vivification. The words "roused incorruptible" assure us of unending life. Two things are predicated of the body, sensation and incorruptibility. They are aptly chosen, for they assure us that the changed body, though bloodless, will have a soul, and, though once corrupted, will never return to decay again. Incorruptibility is especially used of the dead, for the opposite has been their lot. "This corruptible must put on incorruption."

"This mortal must put on immortality." This is a word for the living. The process of dying must be replaced by deathlessness. It would be much to be assured that we should never die, but this is infinitely more. Mortality is not merely the possibility of death but the actual process, which loads our whole lives with sickness and with sin. Who would care to live endlessly in dire decrepitude? What we need is deliverance from the enduring of death in our experience, not merely freedom from the dread of death in the future. And this is our expectation! Death may, indeed, relieve us of our daily distress, and put us to repose, yet we do not wish oblivion but life. We want our bodies changed from mortality to immortality, from soulish and soilish, to spiritual and celestial. Such is our constant longing and ardent expectation.

DEATH SWALLOWED UP BY VICTORY

"Now, whenever this corruptible should be putting on incorruption and this mortal should be putting on immortality, then shall come to pass the word which is written:

Swallowed up is death by Victory.
Where is your victory, Death?
Where is your sting, Death?"

Although this statement has immediate application to our change, it is well to note the precise wording, for it has a much wider scope. It reads, not, "when" but "whenever." Every time there is vivification will this note of victory ascend. And it is not "fulfilled" but "come to pass," for the fulfillment occurs only at the consummation, when death finally and fully ceases to operate. Many false conclusions have been hastily deduced by not observing the precise introductory words in each reference to previous revelation. This statement includes more than our vivification in its embrace. It concludes the whole subject and stretches forward to the consummation.

Death is presented here in its two aspects, as operating in us and stinging us, and, when we expire, as having the victory over us. Both aspects are dealt with in vivification. We will no longer be dying and we will never die. There will be no present pain nor future victory. No one needs to ask where death's sting is today, for each one of us has it festering in his own flesh. No one needs to inquire for death's victory, for the earth has become a charnel-house, full of dead men's bones.

DEATH'S STING

"Now the sting of death is sin . . . ." This is a difficult statement to understand before we grasp the fact that sin is due to death operating in us. The rendering of the Authorized Version in Romans 5:12, "for that all have sinned," instead of "on which all sin," completely reverses the true relationship. The state of dying would be unutterably more bearable if it did not make us sinners. It is not the dying that hurts, but sin, which is its sting. If sin were absent, even death would lose its painfulness and much of its dishonor. This is also the solution of the question. How shall we be made sinless in the resurrection? Nothing is said of this in the Scriptures, because it is self-evident that, if sin is due to dying, it will be unknown where there is abundant life. Vivification is the sovereign cure for sin. So it was with our Saviour. Sin He could not, for in Him was life. Even if it was not indissoluble before His death, yet it was abundant, and no one could take it from Him. He laid it down of Himself. At the very end, in a loud voice, He committed His spirit to God. In Him was no sin because the life He had direct from God swallowed up the inheritance of mortality and death which He had from Adam through His mother.

THE LAW, THE POWER OF SIN

"Now the power of sin is the law" (1 Cor.15:56).

If the law could have given life, it would have enabled those who received it to fulfill it. In Romans seven the apostle lays down the principle that, apart from law, Sin is dead. He lived, apart from law once, but the precept revived Sin. The law, ostensibly given for the preservation of life, became his death. There is no vivification through the law! It abets Sin and spreads death.

Over both of these, both Sin and the Law, the companions of Death, we have a present victory in spirit, as set forth in Paul's Roman letter. This is a blessed foretaste of our great and glorious victory over Death itself when our change comes. The world celebrates its great victories of arms after they occur, as perforce it must. But it is far better to enjoy them beforehand, in the times of defeat and death, for then the tidings of success are most needed and appreciated. It is our privilege to celebrate the most illustrious of all victories, over the greatest and the latest of all our enemies long before it actually occurs.

SETTLED AND UNMOVABLE

"So that, my beloved brethren, become settled, unmovable, superabounding in the work of the Lord always, being aware that your toil is not for naught in the Lord" (1 Cor.15:58). The present conquests of Death, through Sin and the Law, may make us uneasy, restless, agitated, spasmodic, desultory and wavering in our work for the Lord, unless we are enabled to look forward to the coming victory. With this in view we need not worry about the outcome. That is certain, sure, and glorious! Contrary to all appearances, our toil is not in vain. All of our longings and aspirations will be fulfilled. If God has given us the heart of an evangelist who would like to see every single soul saved, our longing will yet be satisfied. If we desire to perfect the saints in the knowledge of God, this will be accomplished. In the certainty of final victory, let us be steady, undeviating, and full of zeal.

GOD IS ABLE

In conclusion, we need not be concerned about the resurrection, how it will be brought about and what it will accomplish, as though it were a work of man, or as if God had exhausted His resources. We cannot even understand His wonders in nature. God is able to fulfill all the pleasure of His will, and He will give each one that which pleases Him. He Who raised our Saviour from the deepest depths of degradation and death up to the highest pinnacle of immortality and glory, in order that He may administer the celestial realms and prepare them for the consummation, when God will be reconciled to all, He loves us and will give us immortality and glory celestial so that we may share in the mighty task of revealing His grace and love to the whole creation, so that every creature in the realms celestial may find in Him their All. CHRIST DIES

IN Scripture as a whole, the evangel that Christ dies and is roused is the connection between creation and God becoming All in all. We can see this in the following series of texts, expressed primarily with fact verbs and rendered somewhat more literally than in our printed, idiomatic versions.

1. Elohim creates the heavens and the earth (Gen.1:1).
2. The earth becomes a chaos and vacant, and darkness is over the face of the abyss. And the spirit of Elohim is vibrating over the face of the waters (Gen.1:2).
3. Elohim is creating humanity in His image; in the image of Elohim He creates it: male and female He creates them (Gen.1:27).
4. Through one human sin enters into the world, and through sin death, and thus death passes through into all humanity, on which all sin (Rom.5:12).
5. Christ dies over our sins (1 Cor.15:3).
6. [God] rouses Christ (1 Cor.15:15).
7. [God] subjects all to [Christ]. Now whenever all may be subjected to Him, then the Son Himself also shall be subjected to Him Who subjects all to Him, that God may be All in all (1 Cor.15:27,28).

GOD CREATES

The fact is that the heavens and the earth do not cause themselves to come into being. Anyone who knows anything about the world in which we live, both the earth and the vast worlds beyond, knows that there has to be extraordinary wisdom and power behind its existence. The Hebrew title, Elohim, is a plural signifying two or more. The Hebrew verb is a singular and speaks of an act of One Who acts through the One Who is the Image of the invisible God, Firstborn of every creature, in Whom all else is created (Col.1:15-17). For us there is one God, the Father, out of Whom all is, and we for Him, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through Whom all is, and we through Him (1 Cor.8:6).

By all means let us investigate into the marvelous ways and arrangements of the universe as far as we possibly can. And let us do so scientifically. But unless we accept that God is its Source (through the one Mediator; 1 Tim.2:6), we will never be able to know that what is has meaning.

THE EARTH BECOMES

The second fact in our list is that the earth which God creates becomes a chaos and vacant. The immediate cause for this disruption is not given, only the fact that a complete lack of order and life develops. Furthermore, darkness is over the face of the abyss.[1]

We may not assume that this disruption is outside of God's purpose, for He is working all in accord with the counsel of His will (Eph.1:11). Nevertheless chaos is not His goal in creation: "For thus says Yahweh, Creator of the heavens; He is the One, Elohim, the Former of the earth and its Maker, He Himself establishes it; He does not create it a chaos, He forms it to be indwelt" (Isa.45:18).

Consequently, expressed first by a participle ("vibrating") and followed by a series, mostly consisting of ongoing action verbs ("is saying," "is becoming," "is seeing," "is separating" etc.), we learn of Elohim's activity in bringing the disrupted earth back to order with light and separation of parts and the bringing forth of life. And because of the evil of chaos, vacancy and darkness, His creating and restoring activity is being seen, by the immense contrast, as good, even that which is very good.

1. The rendering, "submerged chaos," used in the 1957 CV edition is possible (or perhaps "sea of chaos"), but even the word "abyss" may suggest the sense of a thick, impenetrable mixture of gases, liquids and solids covering the earth.

ELOHIM CREATES HUMANITY

The culminating activity in Genesis 1 is that "Elohim is creating humanity in His image, in the image of Elohim." Then, immediately this is expressed by the verb "create" repeated in its fact form: He [Elohim] creates it [humanity], male and female He creates them (Gen.1:27). Here is a new and very momentous act. It corresponds in fundamental importance to the opening fact: Elohim creates the heavens and the earth.

SIN AND DEATH ENTER

This act of the creation of humanity is described in more detail in Genesis 2:7 by the ongoing action verbs "is forming," "is blowing," and "is becoming." So also the determinative events of Genesis 3 are mostly worded the same way: "Yahweh Elohim is instructing" (2:16), "The serpent is saying" (3:1), "the woman is seeing, is taking, is giving" and "he [Adam] is eating" (3:6). But all that happens there is summed up by Paul in Romans 5:12 by means of fact verbs. Through one human the chaos of sin enters into the world, and through it comes the vacancy and darkness of death which passes through into all humanity, on which all the descendants of Adam sin. We all fail to hit the mark of perfection.

Unlike Genesis 1:2 the immediate cause of this disruption is revealed as the Adversary. He is the one who brings over humanity a jurisdiction of darkness (cf Col.1:13).

But where is God in all this? Does He not know? Or has He been outmaneuvered? May it not come to that! Out of Him and through Him and for Him is all (Rom. 11:36)! He is operating all in accord with the counsel of His will (Eph.1:11). The Seed of the woman will come and nullify the headship and authority of the one who has the might of death. And this will be done through Christ's shed blood, foreknown before the disruption of the world (1 Peter 1:20), through His death, followed by His vivified life (cf Gen.3:15; Heb.2:14; 1 Cor.15:24,25).

This brings us to the evangel which is evangelized to us in 1 Corinthians 15 and expressed by fact verbs:

CHRIST DIES

The chaos and vacancy and darkness of Genesis 1:2 is replaced by the power of God's vibrating spirit which operates in connection with His words of Genesis 1:3-30, but the evil is not destroyed; it is not abolished. It crops up again, and it is still here. It must be done away with to a finality. And the only way for that to be done is the way God does it, by a reversal of the evil, a complete reversal of sin and death, by the operation of God in and through His Son, Jesus Christ our Lord.

He is made to be Sin. He dies. In that He dies He dies over[2] all of us who are sinners and over our sins, as the following texts from Paul's epistles testify:

2. The Concordant standard for the Greek preposition [h]uper is OVER. When followed by a genitive noun or pronoun this is generally translated "for the sake of" in the CV. But sometimes in such constructions [h]uper is translated "over"(see for example, 2 Cor. 5:12; 7:4, "boasting over you"). This opens up a connection with the two uses of "over" (Hebrew, literally ON; Septuagint, literally ON-UP, an adverb, rendered variously, upon or over or above) in Genesis 1:2. Here we may see that the darkness over the chaotic abyss foreshadows the death of Christ; and the spirit vibrating over the waters foreshadows His resurrection, rousing and vivification.

"For Christ, while we are still infirm, still in accord with the era, over the irreverent dies" (Rom.5:6).

"God is commending this love of His to us, seeing that, while we are still sinners, Christ dies over us" (Rom.5:8).

"Surely He Who spares not His own Son, but gives Him up over us, how shall He not, together with Him, also be graciously granting us all?" (Rom.8:32).

"Do not, by your food, destroy that one over whom Christ dies" (Rom.14:15).

The Lord Jesus, in the night in which He was given up, takes bread, and giving thanks breaks it and says, This is My body, broken over you" (1 Cor.11:24).

"Christ dies over our sins in accord with the scriptures" (1 Cor.15:3).

"For the love of Christ is constraining us, judging this, that if One dies over all, consequently all die. And He dies over all that those who are living should by no means still be living to themselves, but to the One Who dies and is being roused over them" (2 Cor.5:14,15).

"For the One not knowing sin, He makes to be Sin [as a sin offering] over us that we may become God's righteousness in Him" (2 Cor.5:21).

"Now that which I am now living in flesh, I am living in faith, the faith of the Son of God, Who loves me, and gives Himself up over me" (Gal.2:20).

"Christ reclaims us from the curse of the law, Who becomes a curse over us" (Gal.3:13).

"Be walking in love, according as Christ also loves you, and gives Himself up over us, an approach present and a sacrifice to God" (Eph.5:2).

"Husbands, be loving your wives according as Christ also loves the ecclesia, and gives Himself up over it" (Eph.5:25).

"For God does not appoint us to indignation, but to the procuring of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ, the One Who dies over us" (1 Thess.5:9,10).

"For there is one God, and one Mediator of God and humanity, a Human, Christ Jesus, the One Who gives Himself a Correspondent Ransom over all" (1 Tim.2:5,6).

". . . anticipating that happy expectation, even the advent of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, Who gives Himself up over us" (Titus 2:14).

These passages are our joy and peace. The evangel is the power of God for salvation to everyone who is believing.

In the ultimate sense God does all that His evangel proclaims; He loves and spares not and gives up and makes to be Sin.

Consequently, it is as the Image of the invisible God, that Christ loves and gives Himself up in faithfulness and obedience. Christ dies over us who are sinners, which means He dies over all, for all are sinners. He dies over our sins, which means He dies over every sin of every sinner, for He could not die over the believer's sins without dying for the sins of all humanity.

Yet in a special sense (cf 1 Tim.4:9,10) He dies over us who are believing for present and eonian salvation. We are those of whom it can be said already that He foreknows and designates beforehand, and calls, and justifies and glorifies (Rom.8:29,30; cp Eph.1:3-12).

All of this is so because Christ dies over us, but also because God rouses Him from among the dead.

THE ROUSING AND SUBJECTING

It is because of the fact that Christ dies exactly and faithfully as God wills, that all die in His death. And it is because of the facts that Christ dies and God rouses Him that all are vivified in Him. And it is because of the facts that Christ dies, and God rouses Him and subjects all to Him, that all is seen as very, very good. And on these bases Christ subjects Himself to God that He may be All in all.

CRUCIAL QUESTIONS ABOUT RESURRECTION

We have been asked to reply to a book entitled Crucial Questions About Hell.[1] For the most part, the author simply makes a case for eternal punishment and Hell such as will appeal to and, we suppose, satisfy the so-called evangelical public. Will all who die in unbelief, including those who have never heard the gospel, experience the horrors of an orthodox Hell for all eternity? According to the author, they will indeed.

Remarkably however, Mr. Fernando only considers the vital scriptural points at issue in this controversy quite cursorily. For example, his treatment of 1 Corinthians 15:22 is not even two pages in length. But at its end he concludes, "the second 'all' in these two texts [the other text being Romans 5:18] refers to all those who are in Christ, and that only includes those who believe" (p.58).

By this he means to say that even though the apostle Paul declares that "all" shall be vivified, we are to understand the "all" to be only all those who accept Christ and believe during their present lifetime.

WHO ARE "THE ALL"?

Verse 22, however, informs us of nothing of the kind! Instead, the purpose of verse 22 is to tell us why it is so that "through a human came death, [and] through a Human, also, comes the resurrection of the dead" (verse 21). The text explains that this is so, "for even as, in Adam, all are dying, thus also, in Christ, shall all be vivified" (verse 22). The antecedent, then, for "all" in both clauses of verse 22, is "human[s]" (from the word "HUMAN" in both respective clauses of verse 21). Therefore, the elliptical noun to be supplied following "all" in both clauses of verse 22 ("in Adam, all . . .", "in Christ, all . . .") is "humans"—all "humanity," all human beings.

The theme which is in view throughout this entire section, to which Paul makes the extended reply of verses 20-28, is that of the universal forlornness of all human beings if there is no resurrection of the dead (cp vss.12, 19). Further, it is in the context not merely of believers, but of all human beings (v.19), in which Paul declares that Christ is the Firstfruit of those who are reposing (v.21). "Repose" is the figure of euphemism by which, in gentleness, we make mention of the dead who are lying in their graves. Those who died in unbelief are lying in their graves quite as much as those who died in faith. Hence it is vain to claim that "the reposing" are confined to dead believers. Clearly, the expression comprises all the dead, not merely those of a certain class.

Let us rehearse again the theme that is in view and the considerations attending it. The overriding theme is the universal hopelessness of all human beings apart from resurrection. Yet the marvelous point to note is that while it is indeed the case that, considered in themselves, the dead are utterly hopeless, Christ is the Firstfruit (cp Acts 26:23) of a company which comprises all the dead! Christ, in vivified glory, is the Firstfruit of the "reposing," that is, of the dead. "Firstfruit" speaks of the first fruit to ripen and be presented to God (cp Lev.23:10). If the firstfruit is holy, so are the rest (cf Rom.11:16). A tree bears only one kind of fruit (cp Matt.7:17,18; 12:33). The fruit that death's tree, utterly powerless in itself, will nonetheless yet bear by the hand of the Almighty, finds its Exemplar in Christ's glorious resurrection. "The reposing" are those who will yet constitute fruit for God such as is exampled in the victorious resurrection of Christ Himself.

"FOR EVEN AS . . . THUS ALSO"

Christ is the Firstfruit of those who are reposing, "for since, in fact, through a human came death, through a Human, also, comes the resurrection of the dead" (v.21). Notice, the subject is not the resurrection of some certain company among the dead; it is rather simply the resurrection of "the dead" (literally, the "standing up of dead ones"). It is the case that through a human came death, and that through a Human, also, comes the resurrection of the dead, "for even as, in Adam, all are dying, thus also, in Christ, shall all be vivified" (v.22).

The theme, the hopelessness of human beings apart from resurrection, is established in verses 12-19. The fact that Christ has been roused out from among those who are dead as the Firstfruit of the ones "having been reposed" (literal rendering), is declared in verse 20. That in verses 21 and 22 Paul's subject continues to be all mankind, is made evident by the overall logical flow of the text. And, that this is and necessarily continues to be the true range of his subject, is protected against all intelligent denial by the subject-maintaining causal conjunctions "for" at the beginning of both verse 21 and 22.

The fact is that the noun "human" appearing in both clauses of verse 21, constitutes the identification of the elliptical adjective "all" appearing in both clauses of verse 22. This makes the scope of the "all" in both clauses of verse 22, all humans.

To claim that at least in the second "all" of verse 22 (the all who will be vivified), this refers not to all humans but only to all who believe and even then only to all who believe during this life, is to do extreme violence both to the text and the context. The apostle Paul says no such thing; nor, certainly, does he say anything from which such a notion would follow. To the contrary, what he does say here precludes any such notion.

Rather, what actually follows from what Paul plainly declares, is that other passages of Scripture are being misinterpreted if from one's understanding of other texts, one has concluded that only those who believe during this life will be saved.

The author of Critical Questions About Hell, freely acknowledges that "if the parallelism [in these two verses] were carried out absolutely, we would have to concede that every human being will experience a blessed resurrection at the end" (p.57). Such an admission is tantamount to saying that if such an "absolute" parallelism were the teaching of these texts, universal vivification would be true and eternal punishment would be false. This is a telling statement. He tacitly admits that such an understanding of these passages is certainly possible, even while insisting that it would be an incorrect interpretation.

Mr. Fernando concedes that both passages employ parallelism, but denies that they employ what he conceives as "absolute" parallelism. Such a claim, however, is confused indeed; or rather it is simply nonsense. Rationally, there is no such notion as a "non-absolute" parallelism. Even as with figures of likeness (such as metaphor and type), thus also with the literary device termed parallelism, the likeness (or "parallel") is always "absolute" in that respect which is under consideration. Otherwise, we would not have a parallel! Different entities, in all their respective particulars, obviously are not identical; no one supposes that they are. But in those specific things in which substantially different entities are alike, there is no such thing as non-absolute likeness or parallelism.

The reason why ("For," 1 Cor.15:22a) "through a human came death" (v.21a), is because in Adam, all (humans) are dying (v.22a). And, the reason why "through a Human also, comes the resurrection of the dead" (v.21b), is because, in Christ, all (humans) shall be vivified (v.22b).

Notice: all humans are dying; and, all humans will be vivified. This is the primary revelation of this passage. Paul then goes on to tell us why both death and resurrection are a reality. Death, indeed, is a reality—"for . . . all are dying." And, contrary to the claims of some of the Corinthians, the resurrection of the dead is a reality as well—"for . . . all shall be vivified." If all shall enjoy that glorious, immortal and incorruptible life of which Christ is even now the Firstfruit (v.23), it certainly follows that all will live. And since all indeed will gloriously live—let the Corinthians say what they will—it follows as well that the dead will be "resurrected" (i.e., "stand up" in life from among the dead). Therefore, the claim made by some of the Corinthians that there is no resurrection of the dead (v.12), is wholly false.

The primary question concerning both the first and the second clause of 1 Corinthians 15:22, is the scope of the word "all" in the phrases, "in Adam, all . . .", and "in Christ, all . . . ." As we have already explained, the scope of the "all" in each of these clauses, is determined by the noun appearing in each clause's corresponding clause in verse 21. In the case of both the "all" appearing in 1 Corinthians 15:22a and that in 22b, the antecedent noun in verse 21 is "human" (or "Human"). Hence it is simply a fact that the elliptical noun to be supplied to the adjective

"all" in both clauses of 1 Corinthians 15:22, is "humans"—all humanity, all human beings. The sense, then, of Paul's words is that, "even as, in Adam, all [humans] are dying, thus also, in Christ, shall all [humans] be vivified." In the wisdom of God, the revelation of this vital passage is made in such a way that all who are able to receive its truth may find assurance that they indeed have done so. And, in the wisdom of God, its truth is also declared in such a way that those to whom its enlightenment has not been given, may, in their own minds, justify their unbelief.

Many Scripture passages use the expression "in Christ" (or its equivalent) in what is termed the "locative" sense (e.g., Rom.8:1). Thus one is said to be located "in" Christ. Such a locative sense is not literal, however, but figurative. The literal idea of thus being "in Christ," is identification with Christ. Those who are "in Christ," belong to Christ; they are His, and have the closest possible association with Him. In those passages in which the subject is being "in Christ" (i.e., when the sense is, those who are "in Christ"), "in" is used not instrumentally, but locatively.

Conversely, other Scripture passages, use the phrase "in Christ" in what is known as the "instrumental" sense (e.g., Eph.2:5-7,10,13). The instrumental "in" is the equivalent of "by means of" (cp 1 Cor.15:21,22). For example, the instrumental "in" reveals how we are chosen (we are chosen "in Him"; Eph.1:4).

Usage determines sense. For example, when we read of those who came to be "in Christ" before Paul (Rom.16:7), it is evident that the locative sense is intended. And, just as surely, where we read of the covering that was remaining at the reading of the old covenant, and learn that this was so, "for only in Christ is it being nullified" (2 Cor. 3:14), it is evident that the instrumental sense is meant. Indeed, the phrase, "in Christ is it being nullified," is parallel to "in Christ, shall all be vivified." "In Christ, shall all be vivified," then, no more means "those who are in Christ shall be vivified," than "in Christ is it being nullified," means "those who are in Christ is it being nullified," which means nothing at all.

UNTENABLE INTERPRETATION

It should be noted that in 1 Corinthians 15:22, Paul does not say, "all in Adam" and "all in Christ," but, "in Adam, all," and "in Christ, all." It is unconscionable to reverse the scriptural syntax as so many do, when interpreting this passage. It is unconscionable as well, when the apostle's words already express a clear thought as they stand, to revise his words so as to express a different clear thought than his clear thought.

If it is allowed (and it cannot fairly be denied) that the scope of the "all," in each case, is "humans," some will then try to represent Paul as if he had said, "all [mankind] in Adam . . ." and "all [mankind*] in Christ . . . .*" They then go on to claim that the apostle should be understood here as having said "all mankind who are in Adam," and "all mankind who are in Christ," indeed as having said, "all mankind who are in Christ today." Finally, concerning the latter clause, they finish their work of corruption by their consummate "interpretation": "[only] all mankind who are in Christ [today]"!

Their consciences having been cauterized, many consider themselves quite at liberty to set forth such "interpretations" as the very word of God. After reversing the syntax, and, quite unwarrantedly, adding the word "who" to each clause (not to mention after having added the words "only" and "today" to the second clause), many still have the audacity to represent such an "interpretation" as Paul's true thought.

Such, however, is a gross misuse of the word "interpretation." The province of exegesis (i.e., of legitimate interpretation), is to bring out what is actually present, to clarify what is actually said or entailed, even though it may not immediately be evident to all. Even as paraphrase may recast, exegesis may lead forth. Neither paraphrase nor exegesis, however, may change what has been declared into a non-equivalent declaration.

WHAT IS THE SENSE?

We indeed need to discern what Paul has said, but we must realize that he has already spoken, saying what he meant, and meaning what he said. That is, his declarations already have meaning. We cannot give it to them; we can only note the meaning that they already possess.

When a declaration, as it stands, is already clear, we may not claim the presence of ellipsis, so as to warrant our additions. Any such "ellipsis" is not ellipsis at all, but corruption. Genuine ellipsis does not change the sense, but makes explicit the sense that is already present, albeit in compressed form.

Nor may we change the scripture syntax when by so doing we change the scripture sense. The syntax we are considering is the syntax of these scriptural phrases in question in 1 Corinthians 15:22, "in Adam, all . . .", and "in Christ, all . . . ." The words "in Adam" and "in Christ," are prepositional phrases. Prepositional phrases may be used as adverbs or as adjectives. When we say, "in Christ, shall all be vivified," we are using the words "in Christ" adverbially, so that "in Christ" modifies "vivified." Such a construction answers the question how, or where, all shall be vivified. The sense is: all (in this case, all human beings) shall be vivified, but they shall be vivified, in Christ (i.e., not otherwise or elsewhere).

The non-scriptural construction, however, "all in Christ," presents us with a different thought from that of the scriptural syntax, "in Christ, all." And, as it is popularly understood, this non-scriptural syntax presents an unscriptural thought. In the construction, "all in Christ," the phrase "in Christ" is used adjectivally, so that it modifies the adjective (used as a noun) "all." In this case, the sense is that "the 'in Christ' all" are the "all" who shall be vivified.

Before we even attempt to judge the sense or scope of such a phrase, we must realize that such a phrase does not declare Paul's idea. Whether or not, on other grounds, such a thought, in some sense, may be true, such a thought is not revealed here.

Actually, even with this construction, since the "all" in this text, regardless of syntax, is all mankind, and since, it is the secret of God's will, in due time, to head up all in the Christ—whether those on the earth or those in the heavens (Eph. 1:10)—we could only legitimately identify "the 'in Christ' all" here as all mankind. Therefore, by any legitimate interpretation, even if the syntax is reversed, the vital sense will not be changed. The truth revealed in this passage can only be lost by (1) reversing the syntax of these key phrases so as to change Paul's thought; (2) placing an illegitimate limitation on the word "all"; and (3) adding false notions to the text; namely, the spurious claim, contradicted by this very passage, that only those who are in Christ today will ever be saved.

WHAT IS THE GOAL?

One who is familiar with the passages which declare that it is "in" Abram and "in" his seed that all nations shall be blessed (Gal.3:8; cp Gen.12:3; 18:18; 22:18; 26:4; 28:14), would naturally assume that Paul is speaking along similar lines here in 1 Corinthians 15:22, using the instrumental "in" in a parallel way. Let us note as well that it is that which in principle is "the blessing of Abraham," which comes to the nations "in Christ Jesus" (Gal.3:14). Therefore, the words here, "in Christ Jesus," must be understood in an instrumental (i.e., in a by-means-of) sense. Thus they speak of Christ as the One Who is God's Chief Instrument.

The fact is that these texts which rehearse promises of blessing in Abram and in his seed, are texts which indisputably employ the instrumental "in." In such passages of Scripture, both Abram and his seed are surely typical of Christ in His saving work on behalf of all. It is very likely, then, on this basis alone, that the sense of "in Christ, shall all be vivified," is "by means of Christ," shall all be vivified. It should be noted, however, that the only difference in 1 Corinthians 15:22 between an instrumental "in Christ" and a locative "in Christ," is that the former sense reveals the means of the vivification of all, whereas the latter sense relates the sphere in which the vivification of all shall occur. The point is this: both senses affirm the vivification of all human beings, and preclude the traditional doctrine of eternal punishment.

It is (1) instrumentally "in," (2) transmissionally "through," and (3) objectively "because" of what Abram did in believing God that all nations shall enjoy blessing in the coming kingdom. ("In" is en, "through" is dia, and "because" is dia with the accusative [i.e., objective] case.) And, it is in, through (i.e., by means of), and because of what Christ did in His obedience to the death of the cross, that all mankind shall be vivified (1 Cor.15:22). In, through, and because of the obedience of Christ, this entire vast throng—all humanity— shall actually be constituted righteous, and, accordingly, be granted "life's justifying" as well (Rom.5:18,19).

The author's claim that salvation is only for "all who are in Christ" (p.56) is misleading and ultimately false. It is true that, at present, the Scriptures only term those who are chosen (who, accordingly, are graciously granted to be believing) as being "in Christ." But it is just as true that, in the distant future, all will come to be "in Christ," for it is the secret of God's will (in accord with His delight, which He purposed in Christ), to have an administration of the complement of the eras to head up all in the Christ (Eph. 1:9,10). In that day, all— whether those on the earth or those in the heavens— will be in Christ together, for all will be "summed" up (or "headed" up) in Him.

It is true, in the nature of the case, that in an originative sense (as in "[Levi was] in the loins of his father," Heb. 7:10), all were once, in this respect, even locatively, "in Adam." But—and this is by far the more important consideration—long before this and yet in a similar sense, all were first of all "in" Christ, "in Him [in Whom] is all created" (Col.1:16). So there is a sense in which all were once even locatively in Adam, and, far more gloriously, in Christ, even as a sense in which all will thus be in Christ at the consummation.

Indeed, men are estranged from Christ today, and indeed, most die in such a condition. But it is just as true—stated as a fact, with reference to all intelligent creatures—that in God's own time, "in [Christ] the entire complement delights to dwell" (Col.1:19). "And [this is so for God delights] to reconcile all to Him (making peace through the blood of His cross), through Him, whether those on the earth or those in the heavens" (Col.1:20). How we long for that day, the goal of the universe, when God is All in all (1 Cor.15:28). It is this very outcome which is the purpose of the eons which God makes in Christ Jesus our Lord (cf Eph.3:11).

DOES "ALL MANKIND" INCLUDE ALL MANKIND?

On page 57 of CRUCIAL QUESTIONS ABOUT HELL, the author suggests that since in the words "all mankind" in Romans 5:18a ("for all mankind for condemnation"), Christ is not included, this shows that it is not unreasonable to claim that, in Romans 5:18b, in these same words, "all mankind," neither are the vast majority of mankind included! That is, by the words "all mankind," orthodoxy here wishes us to understand not, all mankind, but only a comparative few of mankind!

Surely no one who was not desperate to establish the teaching of eternal punishment would ever make such a claim. The fact is that the scope of the "all" in the phrase "all mankind" in Romans 5:18, is decided by the "all mankind" into whom death passed through as a result of Adam's sin (Rom.5:12). Christ alone is excepted. Therefore, it is Adam and all his descendants who are in view, in both clauses, in Romans 5:18, in the words "all mankind."

The author observes, concerning various verses in 1 Corinthians 15 which are in near proximity to verse 22, "that [according to these texts] it is those who are in Christ or belong to Christ who are raised." He then says (p.58), "Surely, then, we must conclude that when [the apostle Paul] says, '. . . in Christ all will be made alive' he means that it is those who belong to Christ's race—that is, those 'in Christ'—who will be resurrected."

But what kind of logic is this? Will not all who are in the tombs be resurrected (John 5:28,29)? When the thousand years are past, will not the rest of the dead be roused (Rev.20:5)? Besides, since no doubt the author would not actually claim that only a few will even be so much as resurrected at all, it is confusing to speak as if he were defending such a proposition. In any case, the question is not whether all will be resurrected (at some point, for some purpose), but whether, ultimately, all will be vivified. This is because while resurrection may or may not include vivification, vivification, in the nature of the case, entails resurrection, while at the same time transcending it.

The author wishes to suggest (pp. 57, 58) that since in various statements in proximity to verse 22 which are doubtlessly somehow related to it, only those who are presently God's people are in view, it follows that in the extended passage at issue (verses 22-28), only God's people as well are in view. The author is an intelligent man, and, we suppose, is rarely guilty of such fallacious assertions in everyday life. Were it not that he is under the sway of orthodoxy, no doubt he would not make such irrational claims.

On page 57, Mr. Fernando goes on to say that it is "those in Christ, unlike unbelievers, [who alone] will experience the resurrection." Here he wrongly employs the words, scriptural in themselves, "the resurrection," as a denominative, as if their reference here were to eternal life as opposed to eternal Hell. He then asks us to see verses 19, 31, 32 and 58 as proof of the validity of his claim that only those who die in faith will be saved. None of these verses, however, support his claim. He reasons as if it follows that since neither passage A, B, or C address a certain subject, neither does passage D consider that subject.

Also on page 57, Mr. Fernando claims still further that in these passages at issue (Romans 5:18,19; 1 Corinthians 15:22-28), "Paul is talking about two races of humans. The first is Adam's race. It includes all those who sin and are thus under condemnation. The second is Christ's race. They are the people who are 'in Christ'—that is, those who through faith have received salvation."

This claim about "two races" is merely, by way of diversion, step one in an attempt to justify the claim that the all who are dying in Adam are not the same all who will be made alive in Christ. It is a standard claim of church antiquity, which Mr. Fernando by no means introduces but simply rehearses. But if "group A" were a different company than "group B," it would hardly need to be proved that those comprised in the second "all" were a different "all" than the first "all." This, however, is what is at issue. Such a claim is to be proved, not merely pleaded for through circular reasoning, by means of some artful subterfuge about a plurality of "races."

WHAT IS ACHIEVED IN CHRIST?

For the reasons I have rehearsed earlier in this exposition, we may be certain that the only "race" in view in these texts is the human race. In both passages (Romans 5:18,19; 1 Corinthians 15:21,22), and in each case, both in that which comes to be through Adam and in that which is achieved through Christ, all mankind are affected. The condemnation of death and dying which befall all mankind through the disobedience of the one man, Adam, is put in parallel to vivification and life's justifying which God grants to all mankind through the obedience of the One, Jesus Christ. Even as the one apportionment, thus also the other. One is the work of Adam; the other is the work of Christ. Both Adam and Christ affect all the rest.

In these matters of justification and vivification, which form the heart of true soteriology and eschatology, neither our sins nor our virtues have any place whatever. All is due to Christ. Nonetheless, since orthodoxy, in its Arminian form, cannot abide that salvation is truly in grace and through the unaided work of Christ, and, in its Calvinistic form, cannot believe that Christ, salvifically, died for all, orthodoxy simply has no room for the truth.

Mr. Fernando insists that the "all" who shall be vivified and constituted righteous—in a word, that the "all" who shall be saved—are confined to those who are "in Christ" during this present lifetime. All the rest (which is the vast majority of the human race) will have to burn in "Hell" for all eternity, being subjected to abject misery of unspeakable proportions, without any hope of relief or reclamation. Otherwise, orthodoxy must be wrong—and that can never be!

The author of CRUCIAL QUESTIONS ABOUT HELL, like countless other believers, has simply been given over to a foolish and blasphemous myth. How we thank God that he will not have to believe it "for ever and ever"! In light of the words of Paul, however, as well as the testimony of history, no doubt only a few such ones will be granted a realization of the truth on this theme during their present lifetime. Though contrary to God's will, good and well pleasing and perfect, such delusion is in accord with what must be (cf Rom. 8:26). We may be sure as well that it is in accord with God's wisdom (cp 1 Cor.1:31), and that it will yet eventuate in His glory (cf Rom.11:36).

"Our Saviour, God . . . wills that all mankind be saved and come into a realization of the truth. For there is one God, and one Mediator of God and humanity, a Human, Christ Jesus, Who is giving Himself a Correspondent Ransom for all (the testimony in its own eras)" (1 Tim.2:3-6).

It is in accordance with this foundational revelation of the evangel that Paul was "appointed a herald and an apostle (I am telling the truth, I am not lying), a teacher of the nations in knowledge and truth" (1 Tim.3:7).

In summary, ". . . not as through one act of sinning is the gratuity. For indeed the judgment is out of one into condemnation, yet the grace is out of many offenses into a righteous outcome" (Rom.5:17). Instead of simply "cancelling out" the condemnation that resulted through Adam's one act of sinning, rather, the saving grace of God in Christ produces a righteous outcome: the justification and vivificaton of all human beings.

Let us not expect others to understand, much less accept, our teaching. We may be happily surprised when a few of them do so, but let us not expect this to occur. May we ourselves, however, clearly understand why we believe what we believe; and let us be certain that our reasons for our faith are sound and conclusive.

Let us rejoice that those who presently oppose, one day will believe the truth. We may be sure that they will do so, for He Who is operating all in accord with the counsel of His will, wills that all mankind be saved and come into a realization of the truth (Eph.1:11; 1 Tim.2:4). J.R.C.

REPOSING IN EXPECTATION

We did not know Frances Stewart of Butler, Tennessee, personally, and learned of her recent death only by means of the postal return of the latest issue of Unsearchable Riches. But we came to know something of her heart through her letters and generosity (despite clear poverty as the world deems riches), which always directed our hearts with thanksgiving to God.

We had more personal acquaintance with Robert ("Bob") Todd, (living most recently in Richmond, Indiana, but formerly in southern California), who was put to repose on February 18, at age 87. Following in the footsteps of his late father, Harry Todd, and aunt, Grace Todd, he spoke boldly to others and wrote with enthusiasm about God as the God of love, Who is the Saviour of all mankind.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

GOD'S ACHING HEART

O God, our Father, we look to You,
And Him Who died on the cursed tree,
Steadfast in faith and honor true,
He kept Your word obediently.

For eons long You looked with dread,
Till the fulness of time had come,
Your Son of love in tomb laid dead,
The world about in woe struck dumb.

He did all You had bid Him do,
The Son of Your heartfelt delight,
But oh the loss it meant to You,
Your Son made sin in day turned night.

Your perfect Son, so marred, so bent,
The sun itself refused to shine,
The earthquake shook, the curtain rent,
And tombs were opened as a sign.

He died, but now alive again,
You roused Him from the silent tomb;
He did it all for mortal men,
To save from sin and death's dark gloom.

UNSEARCHABLE RICHES, FIRST QUARTER 2018
BEING THE FIRST NUMBER OF VOLUME ONE HUNDRED NINE

EDITORIAL

We have been presenting revisions of Paul's four "Preparatory Epistles" (Romans through Galatians) in recent issues of Unsearchable Riches, and conclude here with 2 Corinthians. Often neglected, yet rich for what it says about God's grace and Christ's love, especially in chapters 3-5, and the way it can affect our lives, it is, as A. E. Knoch puts it, "An epistle for the Heart" (see pages 5-11).

Throughout his ministry, Brother Knoch gave much attention to the subject of the conciliation, as it is developed in 2 Corinthians 5:18-21. He writes concerning the present administration that the keynote is: "Not the sinner conciliating God by penance or prayers, but God conciliating the sinner . . . . God insists on being at peace with the world, no matter how they treated His Son, or Paul, or any of His ambassadors . . . . What a marvelous token of His grace and love that God (not the sinner) does the beseeching now!" (see pages 9 and 10). This is the principal theme of Brother Knoch's book, The Mystery of the Gospel, available from our office.

It was early on in his preparation of the first edition of the Concordant Version (Greek Scriptures, 1926) that A. E. Knoch became convinced that the phrase, "faith of Jesus Christ," in Romans 3:22, is a reference to the evangel of Christ's death for sinners and resurrection. God's righteousness is made manifest through Jesus Christ's faith. To translate this phrase as though it spoke of the believer's faith in Christ Jesus is not only contrary to "concordant principles," but misleading and harmful to our faith.

Through the years this theme of the faith of Christ has been carried forward in various articles published in this magazine. But recently, these have multiplied, as the subject of Christ's own personal faith has become recognized by many others outside of our own small circle, and we ourselves have grown in appreciation of its importance and centrality to the Scriptures as a whole. Justification is achieved through the faith of Jesus Christ in obedience to the death of the cross. It is reckoned to those who are believing this evangel (Rom.4:23-25), but it is based entirely on Christ's faith and faithfulness in dying for sinners.

Now while working on a revision of the CLNT we have come to see how many other passages, especially in Romans and Galatians, carry this reference to the evangel forward simply by the words "the faith" or even the word "faith" alone. And this has affected our translation as we have previously noted, regarding, for example, Romans 3:25. Further, in connection to this, and without changing the CV rendering, Paul's use of Psalm 116:10a in 2 Corinthians 4:13 can be readily appreciated for our edification as a reference to Christ's "spirit of faith," the same spirit given to the believer as an earnest (see pages 31-38).

That we see the evangel dispensed by Paul as a message concerning what God has done through His Son, rather than instruction about what we must do is fundamental to our walk and spiritual growth. It is a message entirely of grace. Yet this grace is not fully grasped unless we see that what God achieves through Christ encompasses all humanity, for all are sinners. This is an important point made in Paul's presentation of the evangel in 2 Corinthians 5:14,15, a powerful passage for any believer's careful attention. My own thoughts on the passage, especially as it relates to "all" is reprinted in this issue, starting on page 39.

D.H.H.

AN EPISTLE FOR THE HEART

SECOND CORINTHIANS is an epistle for the heart. It engages us with the fond solicitude which stirs the affections of the apostle for his much loved Corinth. It was written because he wished to spare them and dreaded the severity which his presence might demand.

This loving epistle reveals an aspect of the evangel which is well-nigh lost. This is the conciliation. God is love. He will not rest satisfied in merely justifying us. He wishes to clasp us to His heart. To restore His creatures to righteousness may indeed erase the stain of sin, but offers no valid reason or excuse for sin's intrusion into the universe. But if the entrance of sin is to bear the precious fruit of reconciliation, if it is to bring us infinitely nearer to God than is possible without it, if it is the means of revealing God's love to us, then may we give thanks even for the sin which is the source of our sorrows. Sin made man not only a sinner, but an enemy of God. It brought in estrangement. The mediation of Christ not only saves and justifies, but removes every barrier for the free outflow of God's love. God now condescends to beseech the sinner to be conciliated to Him. What can be more gracious than this?

Such is the aspect of the truth in this epistle. More than anything else he has written, this reveals the personal experiences and inward emotions of Paul during one of the most fruitful periods of his ministry. Instead of the smiling, complacent, comfortable existence which is usually supposed to be the ideal of Christianity, we find him full of fears within, distracted with fightings without, restless, sick, and despondent. Yet all of this was in perfect accord with his fervent love for the saints and his vehement desire to lead them on into an appreciation of God's love. The consolation and comfort he received in his afflictions fitted him to console and comfort others. It reveals God in the light of His affections.

One short verse in the book of Acts (Acts 20:2) hurries us over the whole period referred to in this epistle. This alone should suggest the total divergence of their respective themes. Acts deals with Christ after the flesh, as the Messiah of Israel, and always gives the other nations a place subordinate. At the juncture when this epistle was written Paul first made known the truth of the conciliation, that God, in Christ, is beseeching all men to be reconciled to Him. Physical relationship to Christ no longer counted with Paul after this.

THE SUFFERINGS OF CHRIST

Paul's afflictions were, in a very real sense, "the sufferings of Christ" (2 Cor.1:5), for they came, not as the result of his misdeeds, but because he proclaimed Christ's evangel. Not long before he had been in danger of death at the hands of a mob in Ephesus. He was suffering from some physical ailment. He was in much suspense about the Corinthians and their reception of his previous epistle. When he finds that they, too, have suffered, though it be for their own wrong doing, he is swift to console them, and sees in his own afflictions the means used by God to prepare him for this ministry. All this should be an object lesson to us to show how sin and suffering is being used by God to bring our hearts into closer union with Himself and with one another. And affliction is the surest means of ridding us of confidence in ourselves and of placing our reliance in God. Suffering for Christ's sake is the highest honor which can be accorded to mortal man. Just as His sufferings are the basis of the glories that shall follow, so our sufferings for His sake are sure to yield an untold harvest of happiness and exultation when He appears.

GOD'S SPIRIT

The operation of God's Spirit is here seen under three distinct figures: the anointing, the seal, and the earnest (2 Cor.1:21,22). Prophets and priests and kings were anointed for their office. They were anointed with oil. We are anointed with the spirit, as Christ, the Anointed, was at His baptism. This qualifies us for service. The seal is the sign of possession. We belong to God. The earnest is that small instalment of the spirit which we have received, which is the pledge of its fullness in the day of deliverance.

FROM GLORY TO GLORY

The account of Moses' reception, after his forty-day session on Sinai, is found in Exodus 34:28-35 (cp 2 Cor.3:7-16). It is evident that they saw Moses' face even though they could not look intently at it. Moses did not hide the glory from them. He did not put the covering on his face till he had done speaking with them, but when he had finished (Ex.34:33). Later he put it on again "until he entered to speak with Him" (v.34). He hid the nullifying (2 Cor.3:7) of the glory, which indicated the transient, fading character of the law. As Paul says (2 Cor.3:13), it was done so that the sons of Israel should not observe the consummation of that which is being nullified. Now, instead of a covering on Moses' face, there is one on Jewish hearts, which hides from them the true character of the covenant of Sinai. It had a glory once, but it has long since been eclipsed in Christ. This they will not discover until they turn back to the Lord.

A bright torch, which will illuminate the night, becomes black when held up to the noonday sun. So the law, a bright exhibition of the righteous character of God, turns to blackness before the transcendent effulgence of grace which is now revealed. It had a glory but lost it all by contrast to the glory excelling. Since, then, the law's glory is darkened by a greater glory, how much greater must be the glory of this administration of grace!

The ancient mirror was a burnished metal surface which reflected the light as well as the image of the one who used it. Paul did not climb the steeps of Sinai and bring back a transient reflection of the Lord's glory, as Moses did. He beheld Him continually, as we behold our faces in a mirror. The glory of the Lord irradiated him. It did not fade, but became brighter and brighter. Contemplation of the Lord led to likeness to Him. This is a beautiful epitome of Paul's ministries. He began with grace on the road to Damascus. He dispenses justification at Pisidian Antioch. He reveals the conciliation to the Corinthians. He teaches the truth transcendent from his Roman prison. Grace upon grace and glory upon glory! (2 Cor.3:17,18).

THE IMAGE OF GOD

Few subjects for meditation will be found so full of blessing as that of the Image of God (2 Cor.4:4; Col.1:15). John presents Him to us as the Word of God, through Whom we hear Him; Paul shows us the One in Whom we can see God. God Himself cannot be seen, for He is invisible. Hence it is that He has given us an Image of Himself which we can discern. And just as we give the picture or statue of a person the same place in our minds and in our speech as the person himself, so Christ is seen in the Scriptures, addressed as God as if equal to God. Unlike the inflexible image of a lifeless photograph, He is instinct with the life of God, and changes to accord with the divine assumptions (Heb.1:3).

THE EVANGEL OF THE GLORY OF CHRIST

"The evangel of the glory of Christ!" (2 Cor.4:4). Would that our evangelism reached to this altitude! And why are Christ's glories so lacking in the gospel efforts of today? Because the god of this eon not only blinds the minds of the unbelievers, but he centers the gospel on sin and self and sanitation—anything except Christ and His glories.

MOMENTARY AFFLICTIONS

How shall we characterize our trials if Paul's were only momentary and light (2 Cor.4:17)? At times he even despaired of life. Just before this he had been crying to God to remove the splinter in the flesh. But what is all this to him in view of the transcendent revelations of the future of which he had become the depository and dispenser? We would speak of our present burdens and of the lightness of our load in the resurrection, but he reverses this. The glory of that day would be an unbearable burden to our present bodies. Our burdens are light indeed in view of that transcendent outcome.

THE WORD OF THE CONCILIATION

"All is of God!" This is the key to real evangelism. Here we have, in brief, the heart of the true evangel for the world in this administration of grace. The keynote is conciliation. Not the sinner conciliating God by penance or prayers, but God conciliating the sinner. The sinner may be most offensive and insulting, but God does not reckon these offenses against him. Let this be clear. God is not charging men with sins, for Christ died for sins. He is not pressing their offenses, for He is bent on conciliation. The evangel is not concerned with the sinner at all, but with God's attitude toward him and with the sufferings of Christ. He has placed in us, not the message of judgment, but the word of conciliation.

BE CONCILIATED TO GOD

God insists on being at peace with the world, no matter how they treated His Son, or Paul, or any of His ambassadors. He will withdraw us, His ambassadors, before He declares war. What a marvelous token of His grace and love that God (not the sinner) does the beseeching now!

We are ambassadors for the high court of heaven, proclaiming peace and conciliation. When the sinner receives the conciliation there is mutual reconciliation between him and God. Sinner, God is beseeching you, through us, "Be conciliated to God!" (2 Cor.5:20). Your sins are no hindrance, for He has made Christ a Sin Offering for our sakes that we may become God's righteousness in Him. There is nothing for you to do but to accept His proffered love. Simply thank and adore Him for His grace.

THE WEAPONS OF OUR WARFARE

By a bold figure of speech Paul likens his spiritual warfare to the pulling down of the forts of the enemy, and leading all opposition into captivity (2 Cor.10:3-6). The most powerful weapons are not material but spiritual. Neither are place and prestige as potent as truth.

The unspiritual fleshly minded man looks only on the surface. But nowhere are appearances so deceiving as in things spiritual. Our Lord Himself had none of the superficial marks of greatness. Paul seems to have been especially deficient in those qualities which were demanded from those who aspired to leadership in the world. His public speaking seems to have been the special point on which his enemies attacked him. Greek orators were probably the most accomplished the world has ever seen. By comparison Paul's presence was weak and his delivery contemptible. But what has become of all those masters of forensic art? They are dead, and their efforts have died with them.

The few that remain are models of beauty but are devoid of all spiritual power. Paul's words transformed his hearers, not by his mode of delivery, but by their truth and potency.

SUFFICIENT IS GOD'S GRACE

Who would not be elated beyond measure at such revelations as had been confided to Paul (2 Cor.12:7)? But he had good reason to refrain from boasting. A painful physical infirmity was given him to keep him humble. A thorn in the flesh is hardly adequate, a splinter is nearer, but still too weak an expression, for Paul would not entreat thrice for the removal of some minor distress. But it was not removed.

Instead, he received grace and the assurance that God's power finds infirmity its fittest tool. He needs none of man's strength. It hinders the manifestation of His power.

O, that we could learn this lesson! We repine and are dejected when infirmity and persecution and necessity press upon us, when we should rejoice. Paul delighted in them, not for their own sake, but that the power of Christ may be manifested through them. May His grace be our sole sufficiency!

TOKENS OF AFFECTION

The epistle closes with characteristic tokens of affection (2 Cor.13:11-14). Throughout the appeal is to the feelings. This is especially true of the evangel and its proclamation. God on His part beseeches the sinner to be conciliated. The saint is reconciled. He is not merely righteous, but at perfect peace with God.

This is the fruit of the evangel which is so delicious to God's heart and to ours. Let us not fail to appreciate the marvelous affection of His message!

PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS (II)

1 Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus, through God's will, and ·brother Timothy, to the ecclesia of ·God ·which [l]is in Corinth, together with all the saints ·who [l]are in the whole of Achaia:

[2] Grace to [=]you and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

[3] Blessed is the God and Father of our ·Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of ·pities and God of [e]all consolation, [4] ·Who is consoling us [on]in our every ·affliction [io] ·to [l]enable[°] us to be consoling ·those in every affliction, through the consolation with which we [s]ourselves are being consoled[°] by ·God, [5] seeing that, according as the sufferings of ·Christ are superabounding [io]in us, thus through ·Christ our ·consolation also is superabounding.

[6] [y]Now whether we are being afflicted[°] [ov]for [=]your ·consolation and salvation, or whether we are being consoled[°] [ov]for [=]your ·consolation, ·which is operating[°] in the endurance of the same sufferings which we´ also are suffering, [7] our ·expectation also is confirmed over [=]you, being [°]aware that, as [=]you [l]are participants of the sufferings, thus of the consolation also.

[8] For we do not [l]want [=]you to be [l]ignorant, brethren, concerning our ·affliction ·which [b]comes[°] to us in the province of Asia, that we are [ac] inordinately burdened over our ability, so that we despair of [l]life also. [9] But [s]we´ [°]have the sentence of ·death in ourselves, that we may be having no confidence [on]in ourselves, but [on]in ·God, ·Who [l]rouses

the dead ones, [10] Who rescues[°] us [o]from a death of such proportions, and will be rescuing[°]; [io]on Whom we [°]rely that He will still be rescuing[°] also; [11] [=]you also assisting together by a ·petition [ov]for us, in order that, [o]from many faces He may be thanked [th]by many [ov]for us for the gracious gift given [io]to us.

[12] For our ·boasting [l]is this, the testimony of our ·conscience: that in holiness and sincerity of ·God, not in fleshly wisdom, but in the grace of God, we behave ourselves in the world, yet more superabundantly toward [=]you. [13] For no[t] other things are we writing to [=]you [bt] than what [=]you are reading or recognizing also. [y]Now I am expecting that [=]you will [l]recognize[°] ultimately, [14] according as [=]you also recognize us [f]in part, [f]for we [l]are [=]your glorying (even as [=]you also are ours) in the day of our ·Lord Jesus.

[15] And in this ·confidence I [l]intended[°] formerly to come to[d] [=]you, that [=]you should have a second grace, [16] and through [=]you to pass through into Macedonia, and to come again from Macedonia to[d] [=]you, and by [=]you to be sent forward into ·Judea. [17] Intending[°] this then, consequently do I [na] use[°] ·lightness? Or what I am planning[°], am I planning[°] according to the flesh, that it may [l]be [b]with me: "'Yes, yes," and: "'No[t], no[t]'"?

[18] [y]Now ·God is faithful, [t]for our ·word ·toward [=]you [l]is not: "Yes" and "No[t]," [19] for the Son of ·God, Jesus Christ, ·Who is heralded among [=]you through us—through me and Silvanus and Timothy—becomes[°] not "Yes" and "No[t]," but in Him has become "Yes." [20] For whatever promises are of God, are in Him "'Yes." Wherefore through Him also is the "Amen" to ·God, [td]for glory, through us. [21] [y]Now He ·Who is confirming us together with [=]you [io]in Christ and anoints us is God, [22] ·Who also seals[°] us and gives the earnest of the spirit in our ·hearts.

[23] [y]Now I´ am invoking[°] ·God as a witness on ·my soul, that to [l]spare[°] [=]you, I come no[t] longer [io]to Corinth. [24] Not that we are lording it over =your ·faith, but |are fellow workers of =your ·joy, for =you °stand fast in the faith.

2 Yet I decide this with myself, not again ·to come to[d] =you in sorrow. 2 For if I´ am making =you sorry, [a]who also is ·gladdening me, except he ·who is made |sorry° [o]by me? 3 And I write this same thing to =you, lest ¯coming I may have sorrow from those on whom it was binding to be causing me to |rejoice; having confidence [on]in =you all, [t]for my ·joy |is that of =you all. 4 For out of much affliction and pressure of heart I write to =you, through many tears, not that =you may be made sorrowful, but that =you may know the love which I |have [io]for =you more superabundantly.
5 [y]Now if anyone has caused sorrow, he has not made me sorry, but [f]in part (lest I may be burdening) =you all. 6 Enough to ·such is this ·rebuke, ·which is by the majority. 7 So that, on the contrary, =you are rather to deal graciously° and console, lest somehow ·such may be swallowed up by the more excessive sorrow. 8 Wherefore I am entreating =you to ratify your love [io]to him.
9 For I write also [io]for this, that I may know =your ·testedness, if =you |are obedient [io]in all things. 10 [y]Now with whom =you are dealing graciously° in anything, I also. For in what I´ also have dealt graciously° (if I have dealt graciously° in anything), it is because of =you in the face of Christ, 11 lest we may be overreached by ·Satan, for we are not |ignorant of the things he apprehends.
12 [y]Now on ¯coming [io]to ·Troas [io]for the evangel of ·Christ, and a door being °open° for me in the Lord, 13 I °have no[t] ease in my ·spirit at my not ·finding Titus, my ·brother, but ¯taking leave° of them, I come away into Macedonia.
14 [y]Now thanks be to ·God, ·Who always gives us a |triumph in ·Christ, and is manifesting the odor of His ·knowledge through us in every place, 15 [t]for we |are a fragrance of Christ to ·God, among ·those who are being saved° and among ·those who are perishing°: 16 to [w]these indeed an odor [o] of death [io]for death, yet to [w]those an odor [o] of life [io]for life. And [td]for =this [a]who is competent? 17 For we |are not as the majority, who are peddling the word of ·God, but as [o] of sincerity, but as [o] of God, in the sight of ·God in Christ are we speaking.

3 Are we beginning° again to |commend ourselves? Or [no] do we |need, even as [a]some, commendatory letters to[d] =you or [o]from =you? 2 =You´ |are our ·letter, °engraven° in our ·hearts, |known° and |read° by all [h]people, 3 [t]for =you |are manifesting° a letter of Christ, dispensed by us, and °engraven°, not with ink, but with the spirit of the living God, not [i]on stone tablets, but [i]on the fleshly tablets of the =heart. 4 [y]Now such is the confidence we |have through ·Christ toward ·God 5 (not that we |are competent [f]of ourselves, to reckon° anything as [o] of ourselves, but our ·competency is [o] of ·God), 6 Who also makes us competent dispensers of a new covenant, not of the letter, but of the spirit, for the letter is killing, yet the spirit is vivifying.
7 ([y]Now if the dispensation of ·death, [i]by letters °chiseled° in =stone, [b]comes in glory, so that the sons of Israel are not |able° to look intently into the face of Moses, because of the glory of his ·face, ·which is being nullified°, 8 how shall not rather the dispensation of the spirit |be in glory? 9 For if in the dispensation of ·condemnation is glory, much rather the dispensation of ·righteousness is exceeding in glory. 10 For ·that also which |has been glorified° has not been glorified° in this ·particular, on account of the glory |transcendent. 11 For if ·that which is being nullified° is nullified through glory, much rather ·that which is remaining, remains in glory.
12 Having then such an expectation, we are using° much boldness, 13 and are not even as Moses. He |placed a covering [on]over his ·face, [td]so that the sons of Israel were not ·to look intently [io]to the consummation of ·that which is being nullified°. 14 But their ˙apprehensions are calloused, for until ˙this very day the same covering is remaining *on*__at the reading of the old covenant, not being uncovered°, *t*__for only in Christ is it being nullified°. 15 But till today, if ever the reading° of Moses should be reached, a covering is lying on their ˙heart. 16 Yet if ever it should reach a turning back tod* the Lord, the covering is ˡtaken° from about it.)

17 *y*__Now the Lord ˡis the spirit; yet where the spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom. 18 *y*__Now we´ all, with ˚uncovered° face, mirroring° the Lord's glory, are being transformed° into the same image, from glory *io*__to glory, even as from the Lord, the spirit.

4 Therefore, having this ˙dispensation, according as we are shown mercy, we are not ˡdespondent. 2 But we spurn° the hidden things of ˙shame, not walking in craftiness, nor yet adulterating the word of ˙God, but by ˙manifestation of the truth, commending ourselves tod* every human being's conscience in ˙God's sight.

3 *y*__Now if also our ˙evangel ˡis ˚covered°, it ˡis ˚covered° in ˙those who are perishing°, 4 in whom the god of this ˙eon blinds the apprehensions of the unbelieving *io*__so that the illumination of the evangel of the glory of ˙Christ, Who is the Image of the invisible ˙God, does not ˙irradiate them. 5 For we are not heralding ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord, yet ourselves ⁼your slaves because of Jesus, 6 *t*__for the God ˙Who says that, out of darkness light shall be shining,Gn 1:3* is He Who shines in our ˙hearts, with a view tod* the illumination of the knowledge of the glory of ˙God in the face of Jesus Christ.

7 *y*__Now we ˡhave this ˙treasure in earthen vessels, that the transcendence of the power may ˡbe of ˙God and not *o*__of us. 8 In everything, being afflicted°, but not ˡdistressed°; ˡperplexed°, but not despairing°; 9 ˡpersecuted°, but not ˡforsaken°; ˡknocked down°, but not perishing°—

10 always carrying about in the body the deadening of Jesus, that the life also of ˙Jesus may be manifested in our ˙body. 11 For we´ ˙who are living are ever being given° up *io*__to death because of Jesus, that the life also of ˙Jesus may be manifested in our mortal ˙flesh. 12 So that ˙death is operating° in us, yet ˙life in ⁼you.

13 *y*__Now we having the same spirit of ˙faith, in accord with ˙what is ˚written°, "I believe, wherefore I speak also,"Ps 116:10* we´ also are believing, wherefore we are speaking also, 14 being ˚aware that He ˙Who rouses the Lord Jesus will be rousing us also, through Jesus, and will be presenting us together with ⁼you. 15 For ˙all is because of ⁼you, that the grace, ⁻increasing through the majority, should superabound in ˙thanksgiving *io*__to the glory of ˙God.

16 Wherefore we are not ˡdespondent, but ⁺even if our ˙outward human is decaying°, *bt*__nevertheless ˙that within us is being renewed° day ⁺by day. 17 For the momentary lightness of our ˙affliction is producing° for us a *ac*__tran-scendently *io*__transcendent eonian burden of glory, 18 at our not noting ˙what is being observed°, but ˙what is not being observed°, for ˙what is being observed° is temporary, yet ˙what is not being observed° is eonian.

5 For we are ˚aware that if our ˙terrestrial ˙tabernacle house should be demolished, we ˡhave a building *o*__of God, a house not made by hands, eonian, in the heavens. 2 For in this also we are groaning, longing to be dressed° in our ˙habitation ˙which is out of heaven, 3 if so be that, ⁻being dressed° also, we shall not be ˡfound naked. 4 For we also, ˙who ˡare in the tabernacle, are groaning, being burdened°, on which we are not wanting to be stripped°, but to be dressed°, that the mortal may be swallowed up by ˙life. 5 *y*__Now He ˙Who produces° us *io*__for this same long-ing is God, ˙Who is also ⁻giving us the earnest of the spirit.

6 Being then courageous always, and ˚aware that, being at home in the body, we are ˡaway from home from the Lord 7 (for th by faith are we walking, not th by perception),

8 yet we are ˡencouraged, and are delighting rather to be away from home out of the body and to be at home td with the Lord. 9 Wherefore we are ˡambitious° also, whether at ˡhome or away from ˡhome, to be well pleasing to Him.

10 For ˙all of us ˡmust be manifested in front of the dais of ˙Christ, that each should be requited° td for ˙that which he puts into practice through the body, whether good or bad.

11 Being °aware then of the fear of the Lord, we are persuading human beings, yet we are °manifest° to God. y Now I am expecting to be °manifest° in ⁼your ˙consciences also.

12 Not again are we commending ourselves to ⁼you, but are giving an incentive to ⁼you by boasting over ⁼you, that ⁼you may ˡhave it td for ˙those who are boasting° in personal appearance and not in heart. 13 For whether we are beside ourselves, it is to God, whether we are ˡsane, it is to ⁼you.
14 For the love of ˙Christ is constraining us, ⁻judging this, that if One dies ov for the sake of all, consequently ˙all die.
15 And He dies ov for the sake of all that ˙those who are living should by no means still be living to themselves, but to the One Who dies and is roused ov for their sakes.

16 So that we´, from ˙now on, are °acquainted with noᵗ one according to flesh. Yet ⁺even if we have known Christ according to flesh, bt nevertheless now we ˡknow Him so noᵗ longer. 17 So that, if anyone is in Christ, there is a new creation: the ⁼primitive ⁻passed by. p Look°! there has b come ⁼new!

18 Yet ˙all is o of ˙God, ˙Who conciliates us to Himself through Christ, and Who gives us the dispensation of the conciliation, 19 how that God ˡwas, in Christ, conciliating the world to Himself, not reckoning° their ˙offenses to them, and Who places° in us the word of the conciliation.

20 ov For Christ then are we ˡambassadors, as of ˙God entreating through us. We are beseeching° ov for Christ's sake, "Be conciliated to ˙God!" 21 For the One not ⁻knowing sin, He makes to be sin ov for our sakes that we´ may become° God's righteousness in Him.

6 y Now, working together, we are also entreating ⁼you not to receive° the grace of ˙God io for naught. 2 For He is saying,

> In a season acceptable I reply to you,
> And in a day of salvation I help you. Is 49:8

p Look°! Now is a most acceptable era! p Look°! Now is a day of salvation!

3 We are giving no one cause to stumble in n anything, lest flaws be found with the service, 4 but in everything we are commending ourselves as servants of God, in much endurance, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, 5 in blows, in jails, in turbulences, in ⁼toil, in vigils, in fasts,
6 in pureness, in knowledge, in patience, in kindness, in holy spirit, in love unfeigned, 7 in the word of truth, in the power of God, through the implements of ˙righteousness of the right hand and of the left, 8 through glory and dishonor, through defamation and renown, as deceivers and true, 9 as ˡunknown° and ˡrecognized°, as dying, and p look°! we are living, as ˡdisciplined° and not put to ˡdeath°, 10 as sorrowing°, yet ever rejoicing, as poor, yet enriching many, as having nothing and retaining all.

11 Our ˙mouth is °open toward ⁼you, Corinthians: Has ⁼your ˙heart °broadened°? 12 Not ˡdistressed° are ⁼you in us, yet ⁼you are ˡdistressed° in ⁼your ˙compassions. 13 y Now as a recompense in s kind (as to children am I saying this), ⁼you´ also be broadened!

14 Do not ˡbecome° diversely ˡyoked with unbelievers. For a what partnership have righteousness and lawlessness? 15 Or a what communion has light td with darkness? y Now a what agreement has Christ td with Belial? Or a what part a believer with an unbeliever? 16 y Now a what concur- rence has a temple of God with idols? For =you´ lare the temple of the living God, according as ·God says, that: I will be making My home i and will be walking i in them, and I will be their God, and they´ shall be My people. Lv 26:11,12; Jr 24:7 17 Wherefore, Come o out of their midst and be severed, the Lord is saying. And ltouch° not the unclean, and I´ will ladmit° =you, Is 52:11,12 18 and I will lbe *iolike a Father to =you, and =you´ shall lbe *iolike sons and daughters to Me, the Lord Almighty is saying. 2 Sam 7:8,14

7 Having then these ·promises, beloved, we should cleanse ourselves from every pollution of flesh and spirit, completing holiness in the fear of God.

2 Make room for us. We injure not* one; we corrupt not* one; we overreach not* one. 3 I am not saying this with a view tod* condemnation, for I have declared before that =you are in our ·hearts io ·to die together and to be living together. 4 Much is my boldness toward =you; much is my boasting over =you. I am °filled° full with ·consolation, I am superexceeding° in ·joy *onin eall our ·affliction. 5 For +even at our ¯coming into Macedonia, our ·flesh °has noth ease, but we are lafflicted° in everything: outside fightings; inside fears.

6 But ·God, ·Who is consoling the humble, consoles us *iby the presence of Titus, 7 yet not only *iby his ·presence, but *iby the consolation also with which he is consoled *onover =you, informing us of =your ·longing, =your ·anguish, =your ·zeal *ovfor my sake; so that I rather rejoice 8 that +even if I make =you sorry *iby an ·epistle, I am not regretting° it, +even if I did lregret°. For I am observing that that ·epistle makes =you sorry, +even if it is *tdfor an hour. 9 Now I am rejoicing, not that =you are made sorry, but that =you are made sorry *ioto repentance. For =you are made sorry according to God, that in nothing =you may suffer forfeit *oby us. 10 For ·sorrow according to God is producing° repentance *iofor unregretted salvation, yet the sorrow of the world is producing° death.

11 For plook°! this same thing—for =you ·to be made sorry according to God—how much it produces° in =you of diligence, but also defense, but also resentment, but also fear, but also longing, but also zeal, but also avenging! In everything =you commend yourselves to lbe pure in ·this matter. 12 Consequently, +even if I write to =you, it is not on account of the one who injures, but neither on account of the one injured, but on account of ·manifesting tod =you =your ·diligence ·*ovfor our sake in ·God's sight.

13 Therefore we are °consoled°, yet *onin our ·consolation we rather are rejoiced more exceedingly *onin the joy of Titus, *tfor his ·spirit has been soothed° f by =you all, 14 *tfor if I have boasted° any to him over =you, I am not disgraced, but as we speak all in truth to =you, thus also our ·boasting ·*onbefore Titus comes to be truth. 15 And his ·compassions *iofor =you lare superabundantly more, having a recollection° of the obedience of =you all, as with fear and trembling =you receive° him. 16 I am rejoicing that in everything I am lencouraged in =you.

8 *yNow we are making known to =you, brethren, the grace of ·God ·which lhas been bestowed° in the ecclesias of ·Macedonia, 2 *tfor in a test of much affliction, the superabundance of their ·joy and the *accorresponding depth of their poverty superabounds *ioto the riches of their ·generosity, 3 *tfor according to their ability, I am testifying, and *bbeyond their ability, of their own accord, 4 with much entreaty beseeching of us the grace and the fellowship of the service ·*iofor the saints; 5 and not according as we expect, but themselves they give first to the Lord, and to us through God's will. 6 *ioSo that we ·entreat Titus that, according as he undertakes° before, thus also should he complete *ioin =you this ·grace also. 7 But even as =you are superabounding in everything—in faith and word and knowledge and [e]all diligence and the love that flows out of =you into us—that =you may be superabounding in this ·grace also. 8 I am not saying this [ac]as an injunction, but through the diligence of [d]others, testing also the genuineness of ·this love of yours.

9 For =you |know the grace of our ·Lord Jesus Christ, that being rich, because of =you He becomes poor, that =you´, by [f]His ·poverty, should be rich. 10 And in this I am giving an opinion, for this is |expedient for =you, who[a], [f]for a year past, undertake° before, not only the doing but the willing also. 11 Yet now complete the doing also, so that, even as the eagerness ·to |will, thus also may be the completion out of ·what you |have. 12 For if ·eagerness |lies° before, it is most acceptable according to whatever [if] one may |have, not according to what he |has not.

13 For it is not that to others ease, yet to =you affliction, 14 but [o]by an equality, in the current occasion, =your ·superabundance is [io]for [t]their ·want, that [t]their ·superabundance also may come° to be [io]for =your ·want, so that there may come° to be an equality, 15 according as it is °written°: the one with ·much increases not, and the one with ·few lessens not. Ex 16:18

16 [y]Now thanks be to ·God, ·Who imparts the same diligence [ov]for =you [i]to the heart of Titus, 17 [t]for he indeed receives° the entreaty, yet being |inherently more diligent, of his own accord he comes out to[d] =you. 18 [y]Now we send together with him the brother whose ·applause in the evangel is through all the ecclesias, 19 yet not only so, but who is selected also by the ecclesias to be our fellow traveler [tg]with this ·grace ·which is being dispensed° by us to[d] the glory of the Lord [s]Himself; our eagerness also, 20 putting this so that no [a]one should find flaws° in us in this ·exuberance ·which is being dispensed° by us, 21 for we are providing the ideal, not only in the sight of the Lord, but in the sight of human beings also.

22 [y]Now we send together with them our ·brother, whom we test in many things, often, being diligent, yet now much more diligent, yet with much confidence ·[io]in =you, 23 whether [ov]for the sake of Titus, my mate and fellow worker [io]for =you, or our brethren, the apostles of the ecclesias, the glory of Christ. 24 Then the display of =your ·love and our boasting over =you [io]to them is being displayed° [io]in the face of the ecclesias.

9 For indeed, concerning the dispensation ·[io]for the saints, it is superfluous for me ·to be writing to =you. 2 For I am °aware of =your ·eagerness, of which I am boasting° over =you to the Macedonians, that: "Achaia has been prepared° [f] a year past." And =your ·zeal provokes the majority. 3 Yet I send the brethren, lest our ·boasting ·over =you may be made void in this ·particular, that =you may be °prepared° according as I |said, 4 lest somehow, if the Macedonians should come together with me and should find =you unprepared, we´ may be disgraced (not that we should |say =you!) in this ·assumption of ·boasting.

5 I deem° it necessary then, to entreat the brethren that they may come before [io]to =you and should adjust beforehand =your ·bounty as °promised° before. This to |be ready thus, as a bounty and not as greed, 6 yet as this: ·who is sowing sparingly, sparingly shall be reaping also, Pr 11:25 and ·who is sowing [on] bountifully, [on] bountifully shall be reaping also, 7 each according as he has proposed° in his ·heart, not [o] sorrowfully, nor [o] of compulsion, for the gleeful giver is |loved by ·God.

8 [y]Now ·God is |able to lavish [e]all grace [io]on =you, that having [e]all contentment in everything always, =you may be superabounding [io]in every good work, 9 according as it is °written°, "He scatters; He gives to the drudges; His ·righteousness |remains [io]for the eon." Ps 112:9 10 [y]Now He ·Who is supplying seed to the |sower, and bread [io]for food, will be furnishing and multiplying =your ·seed and be making the product of =your ·righteousness grow, 11 being enriched° in everything, io·for e·all the generosity, whicha* is producing° through us thanksgiving to ·God; 12 t·for the dispensation of this ·ministry not only is replenishing the wants of the saints, but is superabounding also through much =thanksgiving to ·God, 13 through the testedness of this ·dispensation, glorifying ·God on·at the subjection of =your ·avowal io·to the evangel of ·Christ, and in the generosity of the contribution io·for them and io·for all, 14 and in their petition ov·for =you, longing to be acquainted with =you, because of the |transcendent grace of ·God on =you. 15 y·Now thanks be to ·God on·for His ·indescribable gratuity!

10 y·Now I´, Paul, s·myself am entreating =you, through the meekness and leniency of ·Christ, who, ac·as to personal appearance indeed am humble among =you, yet being absent, have |courage io·toward =you. 2 Yet I am beseeching° that I may not, being present, have ·to have courage with the confidence with which I am reckoning° to dare on·any ·who |reckon° us as walking according to the flesh. 3 For walking in flesh, we are not warring° according to the flesh. 4 For the weapons of our ·warfare are not fleshly, but powerful to ·God toward the pulling down of bulwarks; 5 pulling down reckonings and every height elevating° itself against the knowledge of ·God, and leading into captivity every apprehension into the obedience of ·Christ, 6 and having all in readiness to avenge every disobedience, whenever =your ·obedience may be completed.

7 Are =you looking at ·that ac·on the surface? If anyone is presuming to have confidence in himself to |be Christ's, let him be reckoning° this again on·with himself, that according as he is Christ's thus also are we. 8 For if ever I, besides, should also boast° a·somewhat more excessively concerning our ·authority (which the Lord gives us io·for building you up and not io·for pulling =you down), I shall not be put to |shame, 9 lest I should seem as ever terri- fying =you through ·epistles, 10 seeing that he is averring, "His ·epistles indeed are weighty and strong, yet his ·bodily ·presence is weak and his ·expression to be °scorned°." 11 Let ·such a one be reckoning° this, that such as we |are in ·word, through epistles, being absent, such also, being present, are we in ·act. 12 For we are not daring to judge ourselves by, or compare ourselves with, a·some ·who are commending themselves. But they´, measuring themselves i·by themselves, and comparing themselves with themselves, do not |understand.

13 y·Now we´ shall not be boasting° io··immeasurably, but according to the measure of our ·range—which measure ·God parts to us—to reach° on as far as =you also 14 (for it is not as though, not reaching° on io·to =you, we are overstretching ourselves, for we outstrip others +even as far as =you in the evangel of ·Christ), 15 not boasting° io··immeasurably in others' toils, yet having the expectation, =your ·faith growing°, to be magnified among =you io·superabundantly, according to our ·range, 16 so as to bring the evangel° io··beyond =you, not to boast in another's range over io··that which is ready. 17 y·Now he ·who is boasting°, in the Lord let him be boasting°. Jr 9:24 18 For not he ·who is commending himself t·|is qualified, but whom the Lord is commending.

11 Would that =you had |borne° with any little imprudence of mine! But also be bearing° with me, 2 for I am |jealous over =you with a jealousy of God. For I betroth° =you to one Man, to present a chaste virgin to ·Christ. 3 Yet I |fear° lest somehow, as the serpent deludes Eve i·by its ·craftiness, =your ·apprehensions should be corrupted from the singleness and ·pureness ·which is io·in ·Christ. 4 For if indeed he ·who is coming° is heralding another Jesus whom we do not herald, or =you are obtaining a different spirit which =you do not obtain, or a different evangel which =you do not receive°, =you are bearing° with him ideally. 5 For I am reckoning° to be ˚deficient in nothing pertaining to the paramount apostles. 6 Yet +even if I am plain in ˙expression, *btnevertheless I am not in ˙knowledge, but in everything made manifest in all *iofor ⁼you.

7 Or do I sin in humbling myself that ⁼you´ may be exalted, seeing that I evangelize the evangel° of ˙God to ⁼you gratuitously? 8 Other ecclesias I despoil, ⁻getting rations *tdfor ˙dispensing to ⁼you. 9 And being present *tdwith ⁼you and in want, I am not an encumberance to *ntanyone (for the brethren ⁻coming from Macedonia replenish my ˙wants), and in everything I keep and shall be keeping myself that I be not burdensome to ⁼you.

10 The truth of Christ ˡis in me, *tfor this ˙boasting shall not be ˡbarred° *iofrom me in the regions of ˙Achaia. 11 Wherefore? Seeing that I am not loving ⁼you? God is ˚aware! 12 yNow what I am doing and will be doing is that I should strike off the incentive from ˙those wanting an incentive, that in what they are boasting° they may be found according as we also. 13 For ˙such are false apostles, fraudulent workers, being transfigured° into apostles of Christ. 14 And not marvel, for ˙Satan shimself is being transfigured° into a messenger of light. 15 It is not great thing, then, if his ˙servants also are being transfigured° as dispensers of righteousness—whose ˙consummation shall be according to their ˙acts.

16 Again I am saying, no *aone should presume me to ˡbe imprudent. Otherwise surely, +even if it should be as imprudent, receive° me, that I´ also should boast° *asome little! 17 What I ˡspeak, I am not speaking in accord with the Lord, but as in imprudence, in this ˙assumption of ˙boasting. 18 Since many are boasting° according to the flesh, I´ also shall be boasting°. 19 For with relish are ⁼you bearing° with the imprudent, being prudent. 20 For ⁼you are bearing° with it if anyone is enslaving ⁼you, if anyone is devouring, if anyone is obtaining, if anyone is elevating° himself, if anyone is lashing ⁼you *ioin the face. 21 *acBy way of dishonor am I saying this, as that we´ are ˚weakened.

THE NEW COVENANT

The new covenant of Jeremiah 31:32-34 is not a covenant or contract at all. It is called a "covenant" merely because it replaces the former one. In this new relationship of Yahweh to His earthly people, nothing is dependent upon them. There is no "we will" in it at all. It is all "I will." The same figure is used by Paul in describing our relationship to God, because he contrasts it with the law of Sinai (2 Cor.3:6-11). It is like the new "covenant" of Israel in this, that it is not dependent on us, but on God. Nevertheless it is utterly unlike Israel in the kingdom who will still remain under the literal law, even though it is written on their hearts and apprehensions. Paul does not dispense a literal law, as Moses did, which led to transgression and death. He dispensed a spiritual "law" which gives life.

IN ACCORD WITH THE SCRIPTURES

THE APOSTLE Paul tells us that the evangel concerning the death of Christ and God's rousing of Him on the third day is in accord with the scriptures (1 Cor.15:3,4). This is borne out in Romans 1:17, for example, where he cites Habakkuk 2:4 in reference to Christ as the Righteous One Who lives by faith, facing death, through which God's righteousness is revealed (cp Rom.3:21-26). Similarly, Paul uses Genesis 1:2,3 in 2 Corinthians 4:6 as a pattern of God's ways in dealing with evil, set at the very beginning, and now most gloriously carried forth in God's dealing with sin in the giving of His Son. Then, a few verses later, in 2 Corinthians 4:13,14, he quotes words from Psalm 116:10, which in the highest meaning of the psalm center on Christ and His faith. There truly is a central theme throughout God's Word, one which points to God's glory through His beloved Son.

In the following pages I offer some thoughts on these two passages in 2 Corinthians, not at all as though final and exhaustive, but hopefully that they may open up a greater appreciation of the evangel of the glory of God which is made known through the faith of Jesus Christ.

LIGHT SHALL BE SHINING

The evangel of the glory of Christ (2 Cor.4:4) illuminates those who are believing it. Christ, Who is the Image of the invisible God, loves all, in that He dies for the sake of all (literally, "over all," 2 Cor.5:14), while they are still sinners (Rom.5:8). In this evangel the knowledge of the glory of God is illuminated in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Cor.4:7).

The face of Moses glowed with great glory, expressing the glory of the law which he received. It was to bring the fear of God over the faces of the people of Israel to dispel the darkness of sin which covered them (cf Exodus 20:20). But it was a fading glory, being nullified (2 Cor.3:6,7). Yet now the face of Jesus Christ, along with His whole appearance, ruined in His rejection by human beings, glows with the illumination of the glory of God in the evangel. In this, the evangel of the glory of God, we come to know God's righteousness (2 Cor.3:9-11; Rom.3:21,22), and His wisdom and power, and His love above all, shining out from the darkness of sin and death.

At the very beginning of God's word He says in effect: Out of darkness light shall be shining (2 Cor.5:6):

. . . creates Elohim `the heavens and `the earth.
[2] And the earth becomes a chaos and vacant, and darkness is over the face of the abyss.
And the spirit of Elohim is vibrating over the face of the waters.
[3] And saying is Elohim: Light is coming to be! And light is coming to [l]be.

As expressed in Hebrew, two fundamental facts come before us: God creates the heavens and the earth, and the earth becomes a chaos and vacant with darkness spread over the face of this lifeless sea of chaos. This is followed by the vibrant, ongoing action of God's spirit vibrating over the face of these dark and deep waters of chaos. Then, as action in progress, God is saying words of great power for deliverance out of darkness: "Light is coming to be!" And exactly in accord with what He is saying, thus "it is coming to be."

The evil is necessary in order for the good to be known. Light is coming out of darkness. A separating of elementary provisions for life is coming out of chaos. And life is being brought forth out of the vacancy. "And seeing is Elohim all that He makes; and behold, it is very good" (Gen. 1:31). In this the pattern of God's ways is set before us: Creation; Darkness; Light; Good.

Then once again, God's very good act of creating is disrupted by chaos, the chaos of sin, and by vacancy, the vacancy of death, all covered by darkness. This is expressed in Romans 5:12 by three fact verbs: ". . . through one human sin enters into the world, and through sin death, and thus death passes through into all humanity, on which all sin." As with Paul, the "sentence[1] of death" (2 Cor.1:9) is in us all, for "in Adam all are dying" (1 Cor.15:22a). Nevertheless, once again God is saying (as He speaks to us in His evangel), "Out of darkness light shall be shining," for "in Christ shall all be vivified" (1 Cor.15:22b).

So we see that this light which is coming to be illuminated in the face of Jesus Christ tells us not only of the end of the darkness of sin and death, but it begins and rests on one tremendous sin and one most horrible of deaths. "One dies over all" (2 Cor.5:14). And "the One not knowing sin" is made to be sin (2 Cor.5:21). This is the very foundation of the evangel, the well-message, which God is speaking. Here is light shining in the face of Jesus Christ, the face of an abyss of sorrow and suffering, which is the face of love: "For the love of Christ is constraining us, judging this, that if One dies for the sake of all, consequently all die" (2 Cor.5:14).

The goodness of life and righteousness and joy and peace and love constituting the glory of God cannot be known until the evil of sin and death is known. Accordingly, the enjoyment of the goodness of life and righteousness and joy and peace and love and all that brings glory to God rests on the death of Christ. His death is the means by which sin and death are put to death and righteousness and life are enthroned everywhere.

1. Here the former CV word, "rescript," is replaced by the more familiar word, "sentence." The Greek term is literally FROM-JUDGE-effect. The effect of judging is "judgment," and that which results from judgment is a "sentence."

THE SAME SPIRIT OF FAITH

Along with Paul and the Corinthians God has given us a measure of the same spirit of faith that is manifested by Jesus Christ (2 Cor.4:13). Through all His days in the likeness of sin's flesh, our Lord held fast in faith to the purpose for which God sent Him concerning sin (Rom.8:3), humbling Himself to the death of the cross (Phil.2:6-8). So also we are walking by faith and not by perception (2 Cor.5:7). And what we are believing is that Christ, in faith, dies over our sins and is roused from among the dead.

God gives us the earnest of the spirit in our hearts (2 Cor. 1:22). Spirit is "imperceptible, intangible power,"[2] and at present we have a foretaste of the spirit we shall enjoy in the future, placed within us (in our hearts). Preeminently, we have received the blessing of the spiritual endowments of faith, expectation and love (1 Cor.13:13). We have heard the evangel, and God has granted us the spirit of faith. As with the Corinthians, the "letter of Christ," the evangel, is engraven "not with ink, but with the spirit of the living God" on our hearts (2 Cor.3:3).

CHRIST AND BELIEVERS BELIEVE

Yet the spirit of faith is not only a power which we share with other believers, but, as Paul presents it here in 2 Corinthians it is imperceptible power which we have together with Christ until faith is turned to sight. The evangel is a message sourced and centered in Christ's faith, for faith (Rom.1:17).

2. KEYWORD CONCORDANCE, p.282.

It has not been much recognized, but Psalm 116 is "Messianic," that is, like Psalm 22, its highest application is to the Messiah, to the Anointed One, to Christ. This is surely what Paul has in view here in 2 Corinthians 4:13 when he quotes the words of Psalm 116:10a as rendered in the Septuagint Version, "I believe, wherefore I speak also." The apostle and those with him believed the evangel of Christ's death and resurrection, and therefore that is what they spoke. Yet also we believe this message from God, and we speak it. Yet again, and even more basic to Paul's thought here, Christ Himself believed He was to suffer and to die and be roused, for this was His Father's will, and He spoke of it openly.

And even now, exalted on high, He lives to God in faith and expectation of His future reign. Wherefore, as an earnest, the same spirit of faith which operates in Christ operates in our hearts, so that we believe this message from God, and testify to it as true and vibrant and critical to us all. In this there is grace upon grace.

WHAT IS WRITTEN

In the following translation of Psalm 116 we have made two principal changes from the current CV. (1) All verbs appear in what seems to be present tenses, but in reality are intended to represent the two aspects of Hebrew verbs, neither of which identify the time of the action (which is determined by the context). The two aspects are: the fact form which gives stress to the fact of the action, and the progressive form which draws attention to the action in progress, continuing before us. And (2) nouns and personal pronouns referring, on the first level, to the psalmist are capitalized in order to show that in their highest application they refer to Christ, and those referring to Yahweh now are seen in reference to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

THE PSALM AND THE EPISTLE

Throughout 2 Corinthians Paul relates his sufferings and the dangers he endured to the sufferings and death of Christ as proclaimed in the evangel. But also he points ahead in expectation to the future life when he and his fellow believers will be living to God, even as Christ, in resurrection, is living. In marvelous accord, the experiences of the psalmist in Psalm 116 foreshadow Christ's afflictions, death and rescue unto a life of service to God, service of One Who has experienced suffering and death. Not only the words of Psalm 116:10a resound in the apostle's mind, but many other lines of the psalm seem to be reflected in what he writes—reflected, that is, in the way its words concerning Christ foreshadow the words of this epistle concerning Him and their significance to us in our lives.

Thus, in the words of the psalmist, Christ speaks of finding distress and afflictions, but more than these, the cables of death envelop Him and the constrictions of the unseen converge upon Him. Yet God is compassionate, and He saves Him, extricating His soul from death. Every human is a liar, counseling different paths, but Christ believes God and places His reliance on His will.

Again, the words of Psalm 116:6b in relation to Christ match those of 2 Corinthians 8:9 concerning the grace of our Lord in relation to us. "I am impoverished, and He is saving Me." So Paul writes, "For you know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, being rich, because of you He becomes poor, that you by His poverty, should be rich."

EXTRICATED FROM DEATH

The extrication of Christ from death is the extrication of His soul by His God and Father (Psa.116:8). In death there is no sensation. Christ's soul had been in the "Unseen," the place (or state) in which there is no perception, no awareness. Yet God rouses Him from among the dead in that, instead of the tears of sorrow His eye looks ahead to the happiness of God's glory, and instead of the downward path to humiliation His foot is directed to the service of living to God in the lands of the living (Psa.116:8,9).

Now in 2 Corinthians, Paul is speaking of what he is believing, and is filled with expectation of extrication from death: "Wherefore we are speaking also, being aware that He Who rouses the Lord Jesus will be rousing us also, through Jesus, and will be presenting us together with you" (2 Cor.4:14).

The life of Jesus out of death has a present application in spirit while we are still in our mortal flesh (2 Cor.4:11), but when we are roused and presented together in the future life our present momentary affliction will be succeeded by "a transcendently, transcendent, eonian burden of glory" (2 Cor.4:17).

"For we are aware that if our terrestrial tabernacle house should be demolished, we have a building of God, a house not made by hands, eonian in the heavens" (2 Cor.5:1). In our present bodies we are groaning, not wanting to be stripped in death, but that "this mortal may be swallowed up by life" (2 Cor.5:4). Then we will be fully living to God, taking up "the cup of salvation" (cf Psa.116:13) with our Lord. D.H.H.

THE DEATH OF ALL IN THE DEATH OF CHRIST

GOD'S EVANGEL concerns His Son, Jesus Christ our Lord (Rom.1:1-5), and it is God's power for salvation to everyone who is believing (Rom.1:16). In 2 Corinthians 5:14,15, we find this evangel stated in especially striking terms and see its powerfully saving effects on the apostle Paul and the believers to whom he wrote:

"For the love of Christ is constraining us, judging this, that, if One dies for the sake of all, consequently all die. And He dies for the sake of all that those who are living should by no means still be living to themselves, but to the One Who dies and is roused for their sakes."

Here the evangel is presented in terms of Christ's love. To humanity in general it would seem odd, at the very least, to speak of the death of the One Who is loving and the death of those who are being loved as an evangel. But the evangel brought by Paul centers, as here, on death. Most essentially the evangel speaks of the death of Christ (e.g. Rom.5:6-11; 1 Cor.15:1-4; 1 Tim.1:15), but His death leads to the death of sinners, and in that often overlooked fact lies a blessing of matchless value.

A LIVING FAITH

From the context of 2 Corinthians 5 we perceive that Paul's life is constrained and shaped in every detail by the love of Christ as revealed in His death for sinners. He lives what he believes. Paul endures affliction and sorrow and the slanders that continually seemed to plague his ministry in order to bring the evangel to the Corinthians and encourage their spiritual growth. "In everything being afflicted, but not distressed; perplexed, but not despairing; persecuted, but not forsaken; knocked down, but not perishing . . . being aware that He Who rouses the Lord Jesus will be rousing us also, through Jesus, and will be presenting us together with you. For all is because of you, that the grace, increasing through the majority, should be superabounding in thanksgiving to the glory of God" (2 Cor.4:8,9,14,15).

If the Corinthians think Paul has some ulterior purpose for personal gain in any particular action (such as boasting over the Corinthians), they will be far off the mark (cf 2 Cor.5:12,13). He is motivated and directed by that love which leads Christ to die for sinners like Saul of Tarsus and which embraces the entire human race.

Indeed it is more than the fact that Christ dies for him that invigorates Paul to labor and suffer to bring this message of love to others. It is Christ's love in dying for everyone with the result that the entirety of the old, corrupt human race dies in the death of Christ, that leads the apostle in his toil and afflictions to love and encourage, admonish and commend people he formerly would have despised and shunned. Paul does not say here that if One dies for us (who are the elect), consequently we die, though that would be a true statement and even appropriate to the context. Yet it would not sufficiently express the motivations and genuine concerns that are in the apostle's heart.

Therefore, in speaking of what constrains him in his actions, Paul has to point to the all-encompassing scope of the evangel of Christ's love. It is only after this association of all sinners with the love of Christ in His death that Paul distinguishes the believers as "those who are living." All are identified with Christ in His death, though only some, called out from the whole, are now being invigorated in new life by the evangel. The grace enjoyed in spirit by some at present and in fulness in the oncoming eons does not make Christ's death of no effect for the rest.

THE LOVE OF CHRIST

It is soon before writing here of the love of Christ that Paul reminds the Corinthians that his message illuminates "the evangel of the glory of Christ, Who is the Image of the invisible God" (2 Cor.4:4). The glorious love of Christ is paramount in this evangel, and in loving us by dying for us Jesus Christ is illuminating "the knowledge of the glory of God" (4:6). As the Image of the invisible God, Christ is making known the glory of God, and as the One Who dies for all, Christ is making known the love of God.

The love of Christ, illuminating the love of God, is very real. It is not only an emotion of good will, affection and commiseration, but is also a preeminently wise and righteous and powerfully active seeking of good for its object. Christ's death cannot illuminate the glory of God if it is merely a picture of the intensity of His love. The death of Christ is not a sort of ultimate gesture but is a desperately needed action leading surely and effectively to the desired good.

Therefore, it is love that cannot fail. Not only does it act in accord with its goal of good, but it is certain to achieve that goal.

Divine love faces the problem of human sin and death and does the very thing needed in order to solve that problem. It expresses the deepest of affection but does so by faithfully carrying out and gaining the good that is so direly needed. This is a love that can never envision nor ever allow defeat. It can never clash with God's power, for God's power is great enough to achieve what His love desires. It can never be in competition with God's righteousness, for God's righteousness is revealed in the very evangel which declares His love. It can never stand in opposition to any aspect of the character of God, for He is love.

ONE DIES

The death of Christ is required by the terrible corruption that engulfs humanity. Nothing else can end this corruption, and no one else can do it. The old humanity must be put to death, effectively and finally.

How is this to be done? The testimony of the evangel shows us it has to be done by the death of the One Who is responsible for humanity, in Whom we have our origin. Paul reminds us in Colossians 1:16 that "in Him, is all created." There is a vital connection between Christ and humanity that goes back to Genesis 2:7, before sin and death corrupts the race, when Yahweh Elohim forms Adam and breathes into his nostrils the breath of life. Hence we read in 1 Timothy 2:5,6, of Christ as the one Mediator of God and humanity, Who, as a Human, is giving Himself a correspondent Ransom for all.

In both 2 Corinthians 5:14 and 1 Timothy 2:5, Christ is referred to as "One" in contrast to "all." This is a reflection of the fuller development of this contrast in Romans 5:12-19. Like Adam, but in a greater way, Christ is One Whose actions affect all humanity, including Adam. In the final analysis, the destiny of the human race is dependent on the work of the One, Jesus Christ, rather than on all the various activities, good and bad, of the many individuals.

In accord with the principle of "sin for sin" ("an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth"), the sin of the death of our sinless Lord puts to death the sin-corrupted human race. Christ is made to be Sin, or the Sin Offering, for the sake of sinners, as Paul expresses it at the end of our chapter (2 Cor.5:21). As the Sin Offering Christ dies for all humanity since all are sinners. He cannot die for me as a sinner unless He dies for us all. But now, having done so, the way is opened up for my salvation, and of necessity for the ultimate deliverance of all.

The more we learn from Scripture concerning the death of Christ, the more firmly we understand what Paul means when he writes, "Now may it not be mine to be boasting, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world" (Gal.6:14).

The death of Christ on Golgotha, nearly two thousand years ago, is the darkest event of history. Yet it is our glory, our boast, because of what it accomplishes.

We must be willing to acknowledge and prepare ourselves to exult in the fact that we would not have the blessings of faith, expectation and love in our lives if Christ has not died for sinners. The evangel tells us of something that has happened. It occurs long before we believe. Our believing that Christ dies for our sins does not make Christ's death for our sins happen. Our believing does not make what we believe true. It has been true for nearly two thousand years. To be sure, our believing does bring the power of the evangel into our lives, and by its means God seals us with the holy spirit of promise to the deliverance of that which has been procured (Eph.1:13,14). This unique and special salvation for our present lives and into the oncoming eons is not promised to the unbeliever. Nevertheless, as important as our believing is, it does not in any measure take away from what Christ has done for all and must surely be enjoyed by all in God's own time.

ONE DIES FOR THE SAKE OF ALL

We have come to know "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," that, being rich, because of us He becomes poor, that we, by His poverty, should be rich" (2 Cor.8:9). The difficulty, however, comes not simply in realizing that the death of Christ proves to be a good thing for us, vital to our present lives and our future salvation, but also seeing that it is a good thing for all and vital to the glory of God. This death of Christ on the cross, so shameful, so evil in itself, so base and miserable and abhorrent, has come to mean to us power for our present lives and the solid basis of our expectation for the future. But how much more is this so for us when we come to realize that Christ's death is for all.

This is stated twice in 2 Corinthians 5. "One dies for the sake of all" (v.14), and "He dies for the sake of all" (v.15). It is a matter to be emphasized. It should never be diluted by conclusions about human sinfulness and stubbornness that do not take Christ's death for sinners into account. Even less should it be qualified and altered by traditional ideas about divine wrath and judgment which place God's righteousness and love in separate compartments. What Christ has done for all must have the final say about the destiny of all. Our understanding of the words "One dies for all" must correspond with the revelation of the love of Christ and accord with the evangel which we believe.

ALL DIE

Seeing that Christ dies, all die. That is, the old humanity is put to death. In saying this we are indeed speaking of what is objectively true and not yet of what is true subjectively, or experientially. We are pointing to an accomplishment that has not yet become realized subjectively, in experience. Even for the believer the old humanity is still with us, though in believing that we are identified with the death of Christ we are spiritually strengthened to be putting away the acts of the old humanity. But the point we must make here is that what God has declared is objectively true must and certainly will become wholly, subjectively so.

How then, can the death of all be a good thing? Only as it is a real and final elimination of the old dying and sinful race. Paul had been writing of the operation of death in our bodies in the preceding paragraphs of 2 Corinthians: "our outward man is decaying" (4:16); "we are groaning" (5:2); ". . . being burdened" (5:4). In love, Christ dies, and He dies for all so that their sinfulness and suffering and weakness and dying might be put to death. This is an act of supreme love, requiring drastic sacrifice and producing transcendent benefit.

The apostle Paul clearly apprehends our death in the death of Christ as beneficial. He uses much the same language as 2 Corinthians 5:14 elsewhere in speaking of the believer's involvement in the death of Christ. "We, who die to sin, how shall we still be living in it? Or are you ignorant that whoever are baptized into Christ Jesus, are baptized into His death? We, then, are entombed together with Him through baptism into death . . . planted together in the likeness of His death . . . our old humanity is crucified together with Him . . . we die together with Christ . . ." (Rom.6:2-8). "If, then, you die together with Christ from the elements of the world . . . for you die, and your life is hid together with Christ in God" (Col.2:20; 3:1-3). "With Christ have I been crucified" (Gal.2:20).

The involvement of all in the death of Christ must ultimately be beneficial to all, even as in such rich ways it has begun to benefit us.

THOSE WHO ARE LIVING

The passages just quoted show that identification with Christ in His death is followed by identification with Him in His life. "Thus you also, be reckoning yourselves to be dead indeed to Sin, yet living to God in Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Rom.6:11).

For the apostle Paul the conviction that Christ dies for all, and that consequently all die, changes his life. Once full of bitterness and hate toward Gentiles and even toward those Jews who were less law-minded and law-enslaved than he was, Paul is now expecting good things of the fleshly Corinthians (v.11) and even boasting over them (v.12). This is the love of Christ in action in Paul's own life.

This sort of behavior is not something forced. It is not something motivated by a desire for commendation, nor even by a sense of obligation. It is simply the operation of the evangel of God's love within us. Paul genuinely seeks the good of the Corinthians and finds every opportunity to encourage them in their faith. This is the kind of living that is unto "the One dying and being roused" for our sakes.

The fact that Christ dies for me, and that I die in the death of Christ brings love for Christ into my life, so that I am not living to myself but to Him (cp Gal.2:20). The further evangel that Christ dies for those chosen in Christ, and that the old humanity of my fellow believers is put to death in the death of Christ, increases my love for Christ and is reflected in my concern for these brothers and sisters in Christ. Furthermore, the revelation that Christ dies for all, and that all die in the death of Christ can only multiply and widen this love for my Lord and become reflected in my outlook toward the human race of which I am a part. Of such an evangel, who could be ashamed? (cf Rom.1:14-16).

OBJECTIONS

There are a number of theories, all too popular within Christianity, that oppose this testimony to the love of Christ. Often these objections are mutually exclusive; they contradict each other as well as obscure the evangel.

One theory is that Paul is speaking only of a restrictive "all" in passages such as 2 Corinthians 5:14,15. This view sees Paul as thinking of believers only, of "all the elect" and of no other individuals. But, to their credit, those who take this view still acknowledge that what Christ has done, even though for a select few, cannot fail to be realized.

Another concept is that while Christ dies for everyone, without exception, not everyone will enjoy the benefits of His love. This, it is explained, is because the human has the free and independent power to reject what Christ has done, and so His death actually gains nothing of lasting value for many sinners. While recognizing that God's Word teaches that Christ dies for everyone, this message is drastically distorted by claiming that Christ's death for the sinner is not sufficient in itself for the sinner's salvation. Exactly what the sinner must do is in dispute and often kept vague. But the result is that in the final analysis salvation is dependent on us.

Certain terminology is sometimes used in order to give the impression that the evangel of 2 Corinthians 5:14,15, is not as glorious as it appears to be. We are to understand the word "all" as "all kinds of people," that is, "all without distinction" but not "all without exception." Or, alternatively, we must see the verb "die" at the end of verse 14 as speaking of a "potential" identification with the death of Christ. And this potentiality is to be understood as something that indeed will never become an actuality for all.

Such explanations are traitorous to the evangel. They constrict the love of Christ. They obscure the contrast between the One and the all. They limit the value and effects of the death of Christ. They distort the character of Christ's life now in resurrection and exaltation, and in so doing they lessen the power of the evangel in the believer's present life. Above all else they hide the glory of God that is illuminated in the death of Christ for all.

AN APPEAL

No one would use these arguments unless there is a conviction that many sinners suffer everlasting condemnation.

The idea of eternal hell is set against the revelation that all are identified in the death of Christ. My appeal is to reverse this line of thought and set the scriptural teaching concerning the significance of Christ's death and resurrection against these traditional concepts of everlasting loss.

The Word of God does not contradict itself. It certainly does not oppose a portion of itself to its highest revelation of glory and victory in Christ. The evangel concerning our Lord Jesus Christ must be the final arbiter of all controversies concerning human destiny. The identification of sinners in the death of Christ is evangelical truth of the highest order. It does not eliminate the biblical revelations concerning God's wrath and judgment but helps make them meaningful as processes along the way rather than final goals. There have been mistakes in traditional interpretations and in the translation of certain scriptural terms. But there is no mistake in what the Scriptures say about the purpose and results of Christ's obedience to the death of the cross.

If Christ dies for the sake of all, and if the consequence of this is that all die, then it must be true, as we read in 1 Corinthians 15:22-28, that all shall be vivified in Christ, and God shall become All in all.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

EDITORIAL

IN THIS ISSUE we give special attention to Romans 3:21-26, in the article of this same name by Dean Hough, which begins on page 51: "God's righteousness plus Jesus Christ's faith equals the justification of all. This is the formula of Romans 3:21-26 as rendered in the Concordant Version." Following the article itself, we feature the rendering of the Concordant Version of Romans 3:21–26 as it is worded in four editions: 1926/1930; 1942/1944; 1966/1976; and the tentative Concordant Version, 2018.

Our second article, also by Dean Hough (page 57), emphasizes that the evangel stands on the foundation of God's righteousness: "The evangel defines this righteousness of God as that which demands and brings about the good outcome of salvation from the expected sentence of condemnation to the assured achievement of justification for irreverent sinners (cf Rom.4:5). We need to focus on this righteousness which is God's own righteousness if we are to appreciate the full significance of our justification (i.e., righteous-ification)."

Next is the writing,"Apprehending the Word that God Declares," by Robert Edwards (page 71). "In its Scriptural signification, 'apprehend' means 'mentally perceive' (neō, MIND). This accords with one of the definitions of the English 'apprehend' which is, 'to grasp the meaning of; understand, especially intuitively; perceive' . . . . For believers, (scriptural) 'apprehension' is the state of mind that one enjoys when one has become familiar with the correctly partitioned truth of God's Word (cp 2 Tim. 2:15). This speaks of the faithful understanding which the Lord gives to us: 'Apprehend what I say, for the Lord will be giving you understanding in it all' (2 Tim.2:7; cp John 3:27; Col.2:2,3)."

In my article beginning on page 79, I give special attention to the words of Paul in Romans 12:3, "[the] disposition [which] must be." Paul entreats us "not to be overweening beyond what your disposition must be, but to be of a sane disposition, as God parts to each the measure of faith" (Rom.12:3).

To be "overweening" is to be "over-disposed," which is to say "excessively attentive." While we need to be attentive to our duties as opposed to neglecting them, very often, it is when we "try too hard" to do right, that we end up doing wrong, even if, in some cases, in some new and different way. We may indeed conquer a certain failing (for example, that of drinking too much wine), only to add a new failing to our repertoire in its place (for example, being boastful—whether inwardly or outwardly—about the fact that we no longer drink too much wine).

What may well be within the scope of our general ability to do, in a certain state of mind even as in the particular and unique circumstances in which we find ourselves may also be beyond the purview of our present preferences and prevailing powers to perform.

The final article in our current issue is entitled, "Grace and Obedience" (page 87). In the early part of this article I address the importance of—and the difference between—"the allotment of eonian life" (Titus 3:7), and, "the allotment of the reign of God" (Gal.5:21). The former endowment is granted as a gracious gift, outright; the latter is granted as a reward for faithful service, yet in a way that nonetheless debars all human boasting. This is all to say, "so that no flesh at all should be boasting in God's sight," let us declare, sanely, consistently, and from the heart, "He who is boasting, in the Lord let him be boasting" (1 Cor.1:29,31). ROMANS 3:21–26

GOD'S righteousness plus Jesus Christ's faith equals the justification of all. This is the formula of Romans 3:21-26 as rendered in the Concordant Version. It can be arranged as follows:

A. Yet now, apart from law, God's righteousness is manifest (being attested by the law and the prophets), yet God's righteousness

B. through Jesus Christ's faith,

C. for ["into"] all
(and on all who are believing), for there is no distinction, for all sin and are wanting of the glory of God,

C. being justified ["righteous-ified"] gratuitously in His grace,

B. through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus (Whom God purposes for a Propitiatory, through (His) faith, in His blood,

A. for a display of His [God's] righteousness because of the passing over of the penalties of sins which occurred before in the forbearance of God), toward the display of His righteousness in the current era,

D. for Him [God] to be righteous and a Justifier [Righteous-ifier] of the (human) by [out of] Jesus's faith.

The passage begins and ends by drawing attention to God's righteousness (sections A). Next, in sections B, the emphasis is on Christ Jesus's faith (that is, His obedience to the death of the cross, the shedding of His blood). He, in His faith in what God had willed for Him to do, and in His faithfulness to that will, is presented as the means by which God's righteousness is made manifest. Then, in third place, the way in which God's righteousness, now manifested through Jesus Christ's faith, affects human beings is set forth (the middle sections C). Finally, in verse 26 which is section D, this whole evangel as it concerns God and Jesus and the individual human being (now referred to simply by a definite article in the genitive case singular, "of the"), is summed up. God righteously righteous-ifies you and me and each sinner by means of the obedient Jesus (cf Rom.5:19), the One humbled to the death of the cross in faith and faithfulness.

Romans 1:18-3:20 has made it clear that in one way or another, or rather, in many, many ways, all human beings are unrighteous. All are under sin. Not one is righteous, not even one! As our Bible is divided into verses, this section is composed of sixty-four verses, the equivalent of two whole chapters. There is no way in which a human being can be made righteous by acts required by righteous standards of righteous behavior. This is the third reason why Paul was not ashamed of the evangel. (1) It is God's power for salvation to everyone who is believing. (2) In it God's righteousness is revealed, by means of ("out of"] Christ's faith, for our faith (Rom.1:16,17). (3) We all desperately need it. The evangel which reveals God's righteousness by means of Christ Jesus's faith tells us of the only way to justification (or, to use an invented word so that the relationship to the word "righteousness" is shown: righteous-ification).

This righteous-ification by means of Christ's obedience to the death of the cross, is for all human beings. Since this is so, it is for those human beings who are presently believing this astounding message of joy and peace. But it is not exclusively for us. It is for us because it is for all, and we are part of all humanity. (Yet this message manifesting God's righteousness through Christ Jesus's faith is already a spiritual power placed on us, day by day through our present lives. We are sealed with the earnest of the spirit unto the future deliverance of that which is procured, as Paul tells us in Ephesians 1:13,14. Indeed Paul writes of us in Romans 8:30 as those whom God designates beforehand, and calls, and justifies, so that also we look forward to a special future glorification.)

God is the Saviour of all humanity, but especially of believers (1 Tim.4:10). All shall be vivified in Christ, but each in his own class (1 Cor.15:22-28). All are being justified in a proleptic sense; the battle has been won, but what has been gained has not come into effect. Nevertheless already righteous-ification has been put to the account of those who are believing. Justification is a matter in progress and is certain to be enjoyed by all, for all shall be constituted righteous (Rom.5:19), and when God is All in all (1 Cor.15:28), His righteousness shall be realized and praised with joy throughout the universe.

In the current edition of the CV we indicate the distinction in verse 22 between the phrases "for all" and "on all who are believing" by commas. (This is also done in Young's Literal Translation.) Now we will show this by the use of parentheses, so that it cannot be overlooked. Paul writes to believers, but here he gives primary attention to what God's righteousness and Christ's faith mean for all. We see how coherent this principal point is if we read the passage apart from parenthetical points: By works of law, no flesh at all shall be justified in God's sight . . . . Yet now, apart from law, God's righteousness is manifest . . . yet God's righteousness through Jesus Christ's faith for all, . . . for there is no distinction, for all sin and are wanting of the glory of God, being justified gratuitously . . . .

The usual understanding of this passage, as it is supported by most translations, offers little appreciation for the words "righteousness of God" as it speaks of the fact that God justifies righteously. To justify is almost always taken to mean "to declare just" (as a matter of divine authority?) despite the fact that -ify words in English generally suggest causation, as does the particular Greek verb used here.

But perhaps even more distressful is that what is said here about what Jesus Christ does for justification is made to refer to something we must do if we want to be justified. Paul writes of Jesus Christ's faith, not our faith in Him. He refers to our believing only as it centers on the faith of Jesus Christ.

What shall I say, referring now to the change we are making by joining verse 24 directly to verse 23 instead of starting a new paragraph with verse 24? Here we are doing what most other translations do. Yet because they make the words "faith of Jesus Christ" to mean "faith in Jesus Christ," and they do not accept the words, "and on all," they lead us to suppose Paul is writing only of believers here. Yet there is this great problem: In a passage which follows a long dissertation about the unrighteousness of everyone, and includes the statement that all sin, they discredit the evangel by relating it only to some sinners. Paul does not say, as some commentators say, that even as sin is universal so also justification is universal in a restrictive sense of availability. That is not what is being said here. Sin is not something that is simply available. All sin, and all come under the ongoing operation of being justified gratuitously in God's grace.

GOD'S EVANGEL OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

It is God's righteousness which comes to the rescue of sinners who stand under the righteous verdict: Not justified! (cf Rom.3:19,20). The new pronouncement: Being Justified! (cf Rom.3:24) stands on the foundation of God's righteousness. The evangel defines this righteousness of God as that which demands and brings about the good outcome of salvation from the expected sentence of condemnation to the assured achievement of justification for irreverent sinners (cf Rom.4:5). We need to focus on this righteousness which is God's own righteousness if we are to appreciate the full significance of our justification (i.e., righteous-ification).

GOD'S GLORIOUS RIGHTEOUSNESS

In a notable reflection on Romans 3:21, A. E. Knoch wrote: "We are apt to be unduly concerned with our own righteousness, either through our acts, or our faith in God. The first thing to be established is God's righteousness. If He is not just, our righteousness, even if we had any, would be of no avail."[1]

That righteousness of God which is now made manifest is glorious beyond human imaginings. It retains all the characteristics of righteousness presented in the previous section of Romans. It is a righteousness that is without partiality (cf Rom.2:11). Therefore it is concerned with all of humanity (cf Rom.3:9-12). It refuses to overlook any wrong, even the hidden things of humanity (cf Rom.2:16). Therefore, it is concerned with all the many sins and offenses of Adam's seed (cf Rom.1:18-32). This is what Paul tells us with clarity and joy in Romans 5:12-19, but it is also found here in 3:22 in the words "for all," and in the logical connection between Romans 3:23 and verse 24.

1. Unsearchable Riches, vol.40, p.43.

Also, in accord with Romans 3:3,4, God's righteousness as it is made manifest through the faith of Jesus Christ involves His faithfulness to His Word. What He has spoken He will bring about in full realization. Indeed all the features of divine righteousness which are commended by human unrighteousness are carried forward in the message of the evangel.

This leads us to that aspect of divine righteousness which is revealed in the evangel and which could not be shown by God's righteous work of judgment. God's righteousness as it is now being made manifest apart from human works is one that demands and achieves a good end for humanity and glory for God. It is God's righteousness that His stated purpose for humanity (that it be created in His image and likeness, Gen.1:26, and that all be seen as very good because it is very good, Gen.1:31), be realized.

RIGHTEOUSNESS AND SALVATION

That God's righteousness always leads to, and must lead to a good end was foreshadowed in the Hebrew Scriptures which attest to it. The types, of course, are never perfect. God's righteousness as it was perceived by the psalmists or prophets does not exhibit its full glory as we may perceive it now in faith within the message of the evangel. But the pattern of divine righteousness is there.

We note this pattern in Psalm 98:2, where God's righteousness is paralleled with His work of salvation:

Yahweh has made known His salvation;

To the eyes of the nations He has revealed
His righteousness.

Here is a picture of the fulfillment of God's promises going back to Genesis 12:2,3 when God told Abram He would make of him a great nation which would be blessed and would become a blessing to all the families of the ground. Hence the psalmist adds (Psa.98:4):

Raise a joyful shout to Yahweh, all the earth!

We can see now that the righteousness of God in His work of salvation from sin and death, through the deliverance that is in Christ Jesus, lies behind this achievement of which the psalmist sang. That salvation of Israel (even unto the blessing of all nations) into the promised kingdom under the Messiah's reign could never come about apart from Jesus Christ's faith exhibited at the cross. Yet for us, these words of the psalmist's joy serve as a type of that highest manifestation of God's righteousness which comes through the "one righteous act of Jesus Christ" which is for all mankind for life's justifying (Rom.5:18).

So also, in Isaiah 59:16, we read of Yahweh's deliverance of Israel from His enemies. No one else can turn back transgression from Jacob:

Yet His own arm shall save for Him,
And His own righteousness, it will support Him.

The work of God in rescuing His chosen people, spoken of in these passages, is great and glorious, but it does not reach to the fullness of salvation and revelation of God's righteousness announced in the evangel of God which we are so privileged to believe. Nevertheless the pattern is the same. For Israel and for the nations in the coming kingdom, and for the promised Saviour and Anointed One, Jesus Christ, in setting up this kingdom, God's righteousness is seen in an achievement of salvation.

These operations of salvation are operations of righteousness. But what could not have been fully manifest to the prophet and the psalmist was that these righteous and saving works of God have a solid and sure basis in the faithfulness of Jesus Christ, in His death on the cross for the salvation of sinners. That basis has now been laid down, and it is that which is declared in God's evangel. It is in that message of salvation in terms of justification that we who are believing can even now see this righteousness of God. We are believing that we are justified in His blood and conciliated through His death, and that all on the earth and all in the heavens shall be reconciled to God through the blood of the cross of the Son of God's love (Col.l:13-20).

JESUS CHRIST'S FAITH

God's perfect righteousness in gaining our salvation can be seen only as it is manifested in the faith of Jesus Christ in His steadfast reliance on God's word and His faith-obedience to the death of the cross. The evangel concerns Jesus Christ and what He did for sinners. It is in this message that God's righteousness is revealed.

Hence Paul connects faith with Jesus Christ in the grammatical construction known as the "genitive case." This often corresponds to the English "possessive case," telling us what the subject has. Jesus Christ Himself has faith, and His faith is defined for us in His giving of Himself to the death of the cross for such sinners as we are.

The context of Romans shows that the faith being spoken of is focused on what God has said. "For what is the scripture saying? Now 'Abraham believes God, and it is reckoned to him for righteousness'" (Rom.4:3; based on Gen.15:6). When God said, "A father of many nations have I appointed you," Abraham "faced" this word and believed it "of the God Who is vivifying the dead and calling what is not as if it were" (Rom.4:17). This promise of God was not doubted in unbelief, but Abraham "was invigorated by faith, giving glory to God, being fully assured also, that, what He has promised, He is able to do also" (Rom.4:20,21).

But this assurance of Abraham was eroded by circumstances. Consequently, as the years passed without any realization of the promised fatherhood, Abraham's faith that "God is able to do what He has promised" was altered to something like this: "God will do what He has promised when I help Him out." Hence he hearkened to Sarai's voice and fathered a son through Hagar (Gen.16:1-4).

Even with Abraham, who is set forth as the great human example of faith, there were times when faith faltered. Where God's word is believed despite the evidence of what is seen to the contrary, the believing may still become weakened as the visible evidence against God's promise becomes stronger and stronger. Because the English language distinguishes between "faith" and "faithfulness" we might say that Abraham had strong faith but was not fully faithful to what he believed. But this is making a distinction where there really is no distinction. If Abraham was not fully faithful, his faith was not perfect. To believe truly what God has said is to be faithful to what God has said, yet the experiences of life, day in and day out, inevitably expose the weaknesses of human faith by means of human unfaithfulness.

Hence, in the language of Scripture, both Hebrew and Greek, the word "faith" implies both believing and remaining faithful to what is believed. For human beings both faith and faithfulness are imperfect, or rather, for human beings faith/faithfulness (a single concept) is imperfect. But for Jesus Christ faith/faithfulness is without flaw, without weakness of any sort.

With Jesus Christ faith is faithfulness, and it is so without the slightest defect. But does His faithfulness truly involve faith? That is, does the fact that He endured the cross and gave Himself a correspondent Ransom for all, dying for the salvation of sinners, involve an act of believing without literally seeing, as our act of believing must be? As the Inaugurator and Perfecter of faith, Jesus, as He endured the cross and despised its shame, was believing that the joy lying before Him would come (Heb.12:2), and He was doing so without seeing. He suffered great agonies, but, in faith, He declared in prayer before His Father, "Not as I will, but as You!" (Matt.26:39).

WHAT DID HE BELIEVE?

What did Jesus Christ believe? As with Abraham, and as with us as well, His faith was centered in what God has said. He faced the declarations of God concerning Himself and was invigorated by faith, giving glory to God. He lived "on every declaration of God" (Luke 4:4; cp Matt.4:4). In doing this, He needed to abide faithfully even upon those words which spoke of His sufferings and death, for that was God's purposed pathway to His exaltation (cf Phil.2:9,10).

The necessity of His humbling and suffering and shame, culminating in the loss of fellowship with and spiritual empowerment by His God and Father for three fearful hours on the cross (cf Matt.27:45,46), and then His death and entombment, had all been revealed from Genesis and throughout the sacred writings entrusted to Israel. The glories would come after such sufferings (1 Peter 1:11) and could not be separated from them.

The hurting of the heel of the promised Seed (Gen. 3:15), the making of clothing for Adam and Eve from the skin of a slain animal (Gen.3:21), God's heeding of Abel's approach present from the firstlings of the flock (Gen.4:4), and all the slaying of living creatures as offerings, described in the law given at Sinai, spoke to Him of what the God of all righteousness had purposed for Him.

The words of David also spoke of what our Lord faced in His humiliation: "My El! My El! Why have You forsaken me?" This psalm also voiced God's answer in terms of the praise and glorification of Him (Psa.22:1,21*c*-31). Again the words of the prophets spoke of what was set before Him: ". . . so ruined was His appearance more than any man . . . smitten of Elohim and humbled" (Isa. 52:14; 53:4). So also the prophet Habakkuk was given a vision of the Coming One (Hab.2:3 LXX), Who, before He comes in splendor and anger in chariots of salvation, would come as "the Righteous One," Who shall live "by His faith" (Hab.2:4; 3:3,8,12,13).

Jesus Himself testified to this before He was crucified: "Thenceforth begins Jesus to show His disciples that He must be coming away into Jerusalem and to be suffering much from the elders and the chief priests and the scribes, and to be killed, and the third day to be roused" (Matt. 16:21). Afterwards He spoke to those with Him on the road to Emmaus, "and beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, He interprets to them, in all the scriptures, that which concerns Himself" (Luke 24:27). His faith was centered in, and He was faithful to all that God had said concerning Him.

THE VALUE OF JESUS CHRIST'S FAITH

It is not simply the fact that God makes Himself known through His Son, Jesus Christ that is so astounding. But the fact that this manifestation comes by means of Christ's faithfulness in dying for sinners, and by this means only, is what takes our breath away. We tremble in view of this tremendous act of faith of our Lord. It must not be degraded into a mere matter of martyrdom. It was that which was necessary for the display of the righteousness of God as the Justifier (Righteous-ifier) of sinners. This most critical work which is for the justification of sinners has been done. This is the power of the evangel for our salvation every day in our lives, in our hearts and our walk, in assurance and expectation and reliance on the living God Who is the Saviour of all mankind. Our joy and peace rest upon His faith which was faithfully heeded and kept.

The value of the faith of Jesus Christ lies deeply in the way in which it brings God's righteousness to light. It is a work of faith that covers the entire ground of human sin and enmity, that which is apparent and that which is hidden from view. No sin and no sinner can be left outside the realm of the divine righteousness being revealed in the evangel.

The faith of Jesus Christ calls for nothing less.

FOR ALL, AND ON ALL BELIEVERS

What God has done in not sparing His Son but in giving Him up for sinners points ahead to a future realization which encompasses the entirety of the human race. But, in God's grace, the justification which has been gained by our Lord Jesus Christ as the outworking of God's righteousness is even now applied to those who are believing, who are, in themselves, sinners just like everyone else.

As rendered by the CV, Romans 3:22[2] contains two prepositional phrases joined by "and," each with a distinct object:

for all,
(and on all who are believing),

Romans is addressed to those who have accepted the evangel in faith (Rom.1:8), both Greeks and barbarians,

2. Although present in numerous manuscripts from the seventh century A.D. and later, the earliest, extant Greek manuscripts lack the words "and on all," except for the insertion of these words in Codex Sinaiticus (fourth century) by a later hand. Most modern translations follow the shorter reading, thus suggesting that Paul was concerned with believers only in this passage. The longer reading, however, is defended in this article by contextual considerations: 1. The longer reading provides an immediate and clear connection with the "all" of Romans 3:10,12, and the race-wide viewpoint of 1:18-3:20. 2. We see why Paul speaks of God's righteousness as being manifest when we understand that it is concerned with everyone. 3. The longer reading helps us as believers to see ourselves as part of the human race, with special blessings but not as exclusive objects of God's righteousness.

both wise and foolish (Rom.1:14). It reflects Paul's eagerness to bring the evangel anew to the believers in Rome, to the Jew first and the Greek as well (Rom.1:15,16). The letter is written with believers, indeed all believers, directly in view. But after making this clear, the apostle devotes what amounts to one eighth of the entire epistle to establish the fact that all mankind are sinners. He directs attention to "all the irreverence and injustice of human beings" (Rom.1:18), to the fact that sinners are deserving of death (Rom.1:32) and the fact that everyone who condemns the unrighteousness of others is condemning himself (Rom. 2:1-3). Because of this, the apostle points out that God's indignation is coming on humanity in the form of being given over to their decadence, and it will come in the future upon unrighteous humanity in the day of God's indignation and righteous judgment (Rom.2:4-10). This includes the Jew, despite the fact that God has promised much in the way of prerogative and benefit, to which He will be faithful (Rom.2:17-3:4). Yet the Jew also must be judged fairly (Rom.3:5-8). All are under sin (Rom.3:9).

Not one human being is righteous.

It is thus altogether fitting in this context that when Paul returns directly to the subject of the evangel of God concerning Jesus Christ, he should make reference to the entirety of the human race. The problem which he has set forth in Romans 1:18-3:20 embraces all humanity. There can be no doubt that Paul is relating the evangel to all humanity in Romans 5:12-19. Similarly, the "for all" of Romans 3:22 should be understood as referring to all humanity, just as the "all" and the "not one" of 3:9-20.

Indeed there is a striking parallel in terminology between the phrase we are looking at in Romans 3:22 and the phrase in Romans 5:18:

God's righteousness through Jesus Christ's faith for all . . . .

through one righteous [response] for all humanity . . . .

In both passages the death of Jesus Christ on the cross is associated with righteousness. In Romans 3:22 it is presented as "Jesus Christ's faith" which manifests "God's righteousness."

In 5:18 it is simply called "one righteous response," that is, Christ's response to God's will in dying for sinners which is the effect of the demands of God's righteousness. Both passages also use the preposition "through" in the same sense. It is "through" the channel of that most pivotal and supremely righteous act of Christ upon Golgotha—it is "through" His faith, that all mankind will be blessed with justification.

Just as God's righteousness in judgment is related to all humanity in Romans 1:18-3:20, so is God's righteousness as it operates through the death of Jesus Christ related to all humanity, here in Romans 3 and again in Romans 5.

DIVINE RIGHTEOUSNESS MANIFESTED

We have noted from the testimony of the law and the prophets that God's righteousness was associated, not only with divine judgment but also and most essentially with salvation. The righteousness of God being made manifest through the faith of Jesus Christ must indeed take into account every sin of every sinner. But in doing so it leads to salvation. If there are no saving results, God's righteousness could never be made manifest in the act of giving His Son to the sufferings and death of the cross. If there are no saving results for all, even if only one human being were to be left under the power of sin, the righteousness of God would remain a mystery.

How could we as believers who were chosen by God and designated for the place of a son long before we were born, come to perceive God's righteousness if only a chosen few are ever brought into salvation, while the rest are to be eternally denied the effects of Christ's faithful obedience to the cross? In that case God's righteousness would, at the very least, be trapped forever in obscurity. Salvation is in grace apart from works. No believer is able to boast in himself for that justification he has been graciously granted. No wonder that most of those who hold to the common view of everlasting loss for some (even the majority) of mankind seldom speak of God's own personal righteousness in relation to salvation.

God's righteousness as it is manifested through Jesus Christ's faith is a quality of God that has all humanity in view; it is for all. It is activated in a righteous operation which manifests God's righteousness at every turn. It leads to salvation. It leads to justification. It leads to God's glory. It righteously brings an end to the irreverence and unrighteousness of all humanity and supplants it with life's justifying (Rom.5:18).

ON ALL WHO ARE BELIEVING

In Romans 3:22 both prepositions, the "for" (Greek, eis), and the "on" (Greek, epi), preserve the focus on God and His activity and reflect the human position as receivers of what God has done. This is not to say that believing and receiving are not acts. But they are acts that center upon and direct attention to God and His acts. They are acts of appreciation and reliance and enjoyment. We would boast in ourselves if justification came by way of our obedience to instructions of law. But our act of believing, if it is defined scripturally (and is not made to be an act that makes the difference between eternal bliss and everlasting hell) puts the spotlight on the One we believe. God is the One Who establishes justification and brings its values into our lives. The gaining of justification is the operation of God by means of the faithful obedience of His Son. The granting of justification to us when we believe is also His work. And our act of believing, which is itself a gracious gift which God parts to us, is the means God has chosen to convey what He has gained for all to us.

As for the present, righteousness is reckoned to us. This blessing is presented especially in Romans chapter four. That is surely a major significance of the word "on." Paul had used this preposition earlier in reference to God's indignation when he wrote, "God's indignation is being revealed from heaven on all the irreverence and unrighteousness of human beings" (Rom.1:18). It is God Who expresses His indignation in the giving over of sinners to their lusts and dishonorable passions and a disqualified mind. It is God also Who now expresses His grace in the reckoning of the righteousness achieved through the obedience of Jesus Christ to those who are believing.

This theme of God's present placement of the justification earned by Christ upon the believer will come before us as we continue forward from Romans 3:26. It is hardly enough to say that we are exceedingly blessed. But we are blessed in a way that blesses God (cf Eph.1:3) for His righteousness in His work of righteous-ification, a righteousness that is without mystery and redounds to His glory.

THE BELIEVERS IN RELATION TO ALL

As believers we receive special and transcendent blessings, not the least of which is the revelation that God's righteousness operates for the good of all. We receive blessings others do not receive, but we are still part of the entirety of the human race. In coming to appreciate our blessings we are not crippled in mind concerning God's purpose for the rest of humanity, of whom we are a part. We are part of the "all" in the phrase "for all," even as we are part of the "all" in the clause "all sin and are wanting of the glory of God."

Note how Paul encloses the reference to believers between two references to all mankind:

> God's righteousness through Christ's faith for all,
> (and on all who are believing),
> for there is no distinction, for all sinned and are wanting of the glory of God.

Paul is not referring to two exclusive groups, such as believers and unbelievers, in Romans 3:22. He is referring to the whole of humanity and then to a special part of that whole. The believers are included in both the "for all" and the "on all who are believing."

When it comes to being a sinner, as well as when it comes to being objects of the righteousness of God as it operates through the faith of Jesus Christ, there is no distinction. The effects of this righteousness of God are for all, and will ultimately be enjoyed by all, even as all are sinners who, in themselves, stand in great need of the glory of God. The believer must realize that the benefits we receive now and in the eons ahead are due to the operation of the righteousness of God and are based upon what God accomplished for all humanity in the giving of His Son. Like the Jew of old, we who believe the evangel must realize that we all are sinners just like everyone else, and we are dependent on God and what He does through Christ for the benefit of all.

A PARALLEL PASSAGE

There is a striking parallel between these words in Romans 3:22 and 1 Timothy 4:10. The righteousness of God as it is manifest through the faith of Jesus Christ is for all and on all who are believing. God is the Saviour of all mankind, especially of believers. In both cases the emphasis is on God first of all. He is the Saviour. He is righteous in His work of justification. 1 Timothy had previously identified God's will to save all mankind (1 Tim.2:4) with Christ Jesus giving Himself a correspondent Ransom for all (2:5,6). Our passage in Romans identifies the manifestation of God's righteousness with the faith of Jesus Christ. The objective in both cases embraces all humanity with a special application to the believers.

A SOLID JUSTIFICATION

Paul has not told us simply that we are justified. He would have us see the basis, nature and scope of this justification which God has graciously and gratuitously granted to us. Its basis is solidly laid in the faithful act of Jesus Christ in His death for sinners, and its nature is solidly embedded in the righteousness of God. This being so, its scope is universal.

To be a believer of this evangel—what a benefit, what a prerogative, what a blessing for our lives every day! Thanks and praise be to our God!

THE FAITH OF CHRIST

No other influence in all the world has overflowed in song like the joyous faith of Christ. It has inspired the most glorious melodies and the sweetest and most enduring songs. Its hymns transcend all others. Even in this wicked eon the praise of God or the blessing of His saints finds more expression in exultant song than all the other emotions of mankind. None of the religions of the world have a sacred repertoire to compare with ours, either in number, variety or elevation of thought. Our joy must overflow. Our praise must find utterance. (A. E. Knoch, Unsearchable Riches, vol.18, pp. 56,67).

Ephesians 2:10

APPREHENDING THE WORD THAT GOD DECLARES

We should make every effort to apprehend the word that God declares to us for faith. "Apprehend" is derived from the Latin apprehendere the meaning of which is "to grasp" or "seize." In its Scriptural signification, "apprehend" means "mentally perceive"[1] (neō, MIND). This accords with one of the definitions of the English "apprehend" which is, "to grasp the meaning of; understand, especially intuitively; perceive." This is the sense of "apprehend" that we are concerned with, that of mentally perceiving (i.e., grasping, or seizing) the word that God declares to us for faith.

The difficulty here is that many readers are unfamiliar with the definition of "apprehend" which appears above. Instead, the notion that commonly comes to mind upon hearing the word "apprehend," is that of its alternative definitions: (1) "take into custody; arrest by legal warrant or authority," and, similarly, (2) "expect with anxiety, suspicion, or fear; anticipate." Neither of these definitions is the definition of "apprehend" as it is used in the Concordant Version which is, once again, "mentally perceive." Therefore, in every instance where we read the term "apprehend" in the CV, we should think the thought, "mentally perceive"; hence, therein, wherever we may encounter the word "apprehend," we should never call to mind any such thought as that of being taken into custody, or of being exercised by anxiety, suspicion, or fear.

1. Keyword Concordance, entry "apprehend," p.17.

Thus, in our writing or speaking about Scripture, we employ the essential meaning of "apprehend" which is to grasp, or seize, through mental perception. For believers, (scriptural) "apprehension" is the state of mind that one enjoys when one has become familiar with the correctly partitioned truth of God's Word (cp 2 Tim.2:15). This speaks of the faithful understanding which the Lord gives to us: "Apprehend what I say, for the Lord will be giving you understanding in it all" (2 Tim.2:7; cp John 3:27; Col.2:2,3).

INSTRUMENTS OF APPREHENSION

Many study aids may be used to assist in apprehending what Christ says to us. Such helpful works will assist us in gaining a knowledge of the essence of meaning, idiomatic considerations, contextual bearing, and grammatical usage of the vocabulary terms comprised in the extant Greek and Hebrew textual documents of the "Old Testament" and "New Testament." Proper usage of such tools fosters apprehension. "Idiom" is a way of expression that is peculiar to a specific group of people. It is the manner in which this group speaks among themselves. Idiom carries sense that is apprehended by those who make up this specific group, or who otherwise become familiar with their literature.

It is not, fundamentally, the classic literary works of a language with which we as believers are especially interested. It is with the literary works commonly referred to as "the Bible" with which we have to do. Hebrew idiom is important here. It is the expression of thoughts in Hebrew idiom that is superimposed upon common Greek grammar that we must toil to apprehend. Grammar is the system of structure and rules which govern a language. Each language has its own common and nuance system of grammar. Over time, application of grammar may adjust to idiom and cultural usage.

TRANSLATION, IDIOM, AND GRAMMAR

Translation from the original languages of Scripture into English is frequently difficult because of differences in idiom and implication of grammar from one language to another. These differences can make for difficulty in exchanging thoughts as well as loss of intended meaning. We will focus upon the difficulty of English to capture the impact of Hebrew idiom and the nuance of grammar of the original languages in the translation of Ephesians 2:10.

GOD'S GOOD WORKS

Ephesians 2:10 features a portion of God's work and its achievements. God's works are purpose-focused. They are designed to be useful in accomplishing the goals of His will. To this end, they are good works. Work that is in line with a (righteous) determined purpose is good. God's works are always aligned with His purpose—to reconcile all of His creation to Himself through the blood of Christ's cross (Col.1:20). God's work is Christ-centered. The outcome of God's good works in Christ are certain to achieve the decisions of His will in due season. In verse 10, the good works of God are many. They include creating us (i.e., the ecclesia) in Christ Jesus for good works— preparing these good works for us beforehand, and ensuring that we should be walking in them, for "His achievement are we."

GOD CREATED THE ECCLESIA FOR SERVICE

Even now, albeit in the incipient phase of His work, we are an achievement of God's work in Christ Jesus. He created us to work within the administration of Christ Jesus. In Christ, factually speaking, we are created holy and flawless, made ready to be useful in achieving God's purpose in Christ Jesus. The outcome of His creative work in us is spiritual in character. It is God's doing that puts this holiness and flawlessness in us, even if it is not readily perceptible in us at present being obscured by our own fleshliness. Even so, in the measure granted to us, it is ours today as an earnest (2 Cor.1:22; Eph.1:14) or pledge of the fulness thereof with which He will endow us when we are glorified—in the day when we are conformed to the image of His Son (Rom.8:29,30). The achievement of God's work is, alone, our qualification to be useful in His service. In His wise counsels, He completed this work before the effects of sin entered the world.

GOD PRE-PREPARED GOOD WORKS FOR US

God's achievements include the preparation and realization of good works for us to perform. They were crafted in accord with His will for us in Christ Jesus, beforehand—that is, before the disruption of the world. He prepared these works without receiving counsel from us. No opinion or ratification came from us. Rather, all is done according to the delight of His will, which is: to head up all in the Christ, whether those on the earth or those in the heavens (Eph.1:10). These works are not an afterthought nor are they an adjustment to sin. His works for us are useful in nurturing our growth and in the display of the glories of Christ Jesus to others. They agree with His purpose in Christ, and are therefore His good works.

IDENTIFYING GOD'S GOOD WORKS FOR US

Now the question remains concerning our walk in God's good works. God's good works for us are not secret, yet they must be identified by us. They are purpose-focused, and managed in the administration of His grace by Christ Jesus, Who is Head of the ecclesia. They support Christ's agenda in completing God's purpose to become All in all (1 Cor. 15:28). In this present season, His work in us includes any worthy service that we may perform on behalf of others, our own unworthy deportment otherwise notwithstanding. These are features of our growth toward maturity in Christ (cf Eph.4:11-13). Work generated by men in themselves, well-intentioned or not as it may be, does not qualify as God's good works for us and in us. In the oncoming eons, His good works in us will display not the work of the earnest of His spirit which we enjoy even today, but will then display the fulness of His glory in us as members of the new creation in Christ Jesus (cf 2 Cor.5:17; Gal.6:15).

CLASSICAL GREEK ADJUSTED BY COMMON GREEK

It is the case that God prepares good works for us "that we should walk in them." Yet is it so that we do walk in these good works—even at present, not only in the eons to come? Traditional English interpretation of classic English translation (as concerns the phrase, "should walk . . ."), misapprehends "should" as an English synonym for "ought," instead of, according as it actually is, the English representation of the Greek aorist subjunctive, which speaks not of duty, but of dependency.

Our walk of good works is the outcome of the work which God does in us. First, He has created us in Christ Jesus for good works. Second, He has made ready these good works beforehand. This is certain, not uncertain. Third, our performance of them is ensured. The context, idiom, and grammar (both in the Greek and in the English as well)—not to mention the nature of the case—reflect this certainty, here in the final clause of Ephesians 2:10 which employs the aorist form in the subjunctive mood, which states a fact not yet fulfilled. In effect it is a future tense.

In classical Greek grammar the use of the subjunctive mood was understood by many as entailing uncertainty in the completion of a stated objective or activity. It is understandable how the subjunctive mood itself may have been supposed in itself to involve uncertainty, since from the viewpoint of our own ignorance of the future, to us, practically all future events are indeed uncertain. The subjunctive mood itself, however (as typically represented in the Concordant Version by "should,"[2] "may," or "might") merely speaks of dependency (i.e., of "subjoined-ness"). This is to say that the use of the subjunctive mood speaks of it being the case that any particular occurrence of the subjunctive calls to mind that upon which its related verb (e.g., as here, "walk") depends (or is contingent) for its own occurrence.

It seems more correct, then, simply to say that if that upon which the instantiation of any certain activity or event depends is itself certain (i.e., certain to act or occur), then that which is its effect is also certain to occur.

This is all to say that the good works which God prepares beforehand that we should be walking in them, speaks not of good works in which we "ought" to be walking. Instead, it speaks of good works in which we shall be walking, since we walk in them thus, as God's achievement. This is so since it is "in grace, through faith [that we are] saved, and this is not out of you, lest anyone should be boasting" (Eph.2:8,9).

In the New Testament, God's Word uses common Greek as the language of expression. Therein, an additional notable example of the Greek subjunctive appears in Philippians 2:9-11: "Wherefore, also, God highly exalts Him,

2. Wherever "should" appears in the Concordant Version, it appears not as the representative of a corresponding Greek word, but as an indicator of the presence of the Greek subjunctive. It modifies the contextual verb to which it refers. §"While 'should' is regularly used in the CV to indicate the subjunctive, sometimes 'may' is used instead for this same purpose, as an idiomatic variant, in cases where it is preceded by 'ever,' to denote contingency. Should is not used in the sense of an obligation [i.e., 'ought'] and none of its renderings should be so construed. Note the order of the words. You should is an obligation, but should you shows that it stands for may you ever. Similarly, the CV sometimes implements the rendering of the subjunctive as '*sh*may'" (Keyword Concordance, entry "should," p.268, §adjusted).

and graces Him with the name that is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, celestial and terrestrial and subterranean, and every tongue should acclaim that Jesus Christ is Lord, for the glory of God, the Father."

The bowing of every knee, and the acclaiming of every tongue that Jesus Christ is Lord is because "[Christ] humbles Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil.2:8).

"Wherefore, also, God highly exalts Him, and graces Him with the name that is above every name, [in order] that every knee should bow . . . and every tongue should acclaim that Jesus Christ is Lord, for the glory of God, the Father." Therefore, in the end, that is, at "the consummation" (cf 1 Cor.15:23b), every knee is certain to bow, and every tongue is sure to acclaim that Jesus Christ is Lord, for the glory of God, the Father.

Understanding Given by His Grace

One's apprehension and correct understanding of the scriptural sense of the subjunctive mood (as represented in the CV by "should," "may," and "might"), even as all else that is holy and good in our lives, is dependent upon our Lord's influence of grace upon our hearts and minds. Misunderstanding is generally imposed by a lack of apprehension of God's purpose and work in Christ Jesus for us, as members of His body. Lack of understanding concerning God's will imposes the challenge of neither identifying nor recognizing God's good works, which He makes ready beforehand for us.

In the current era, our personal or corporate agenda may compete with the purpose that God has set for us in Christ Jesus. Our own opinions and decisions generate work that is outside of the will of the Lord. Though seemingly beneficial in a sense, these works are not useful in achieving God's purpose in Christ Jesus. Such in actuality flesh-based "good" works are not the good works that God has prepared for us beforehand. They are works that we ourselves have generated according to our own purposes and desires, as members of "the old humanity which is corrupted in accord with its seductive desires" (Eph.4:22). Many such church-work examples abound.

OUR MATURITY IN CHRIST

At present, we need to apprehend that God's will for us is maturity: "that we should all attain to the unity of the faith and to the realization of the son of God, to a mature man" (cp Eph.4:13). His primary good work for us is the "adjusting of the saints" unto this end ("toward the adjusting of the saints"; Eph.4:12). Thus God gives "work assignments" and purpose to us in His Word. It is He Who provides the power of His spirit to achieve our growth toward maturity in our walk (cf Phil.2:13).

GOD'S GLORIOUS WORKS FOR US IN CHRIST JESUS

In that day, in the presence of Christ Jesus in His glory, God's work-assignment and purpose for us changes from measured progress made toward maturity, to that of "maturity-accomplished." This glorious end will be fully realized in us "that, in the oncoming eons, He should display the transcendent riches of His grace in His kindness to us in Christ Jesus" (Eph.2:7).

GOD'S ACHIEVEMENTS

Again, our position in Christ Jesus is the outcome of the delight of God's will. He created good works for us beforehand, receiving no counsel from us. Finally, He ensures "that we should walk in them by the power of His spirit. We are an outcome of His work in Christ Jesus. We are God's achievement.

Robert G. Edwards

THE DISPOSITION WHICH MUST BE

(Romans 12:3)

For I am saying, through the grace which is given to me, to everyone who is among you, not to be overweening beyond what your disposition must be, but to be of a sane disposition, as God parts to each the measure of faith (Rom.12:3).

"Long before we were aware of anything, the minutest detail, as well as the great outlines of our career, were determined, and our most fervent wishes were granted, in the love of God (Rom.8:26-39).

"In the language of inspiration, the idea of prayer is essentially concerned with HAVING. To this is added the thought of good, WELL-HAVE, that is, a wish. If this is directed TOWARD anyone, especially the Deity, then it is TOWARD-WELL-HAVING, prayer.

"According to the Authorized Version, we ought to know what to pray for (Rom.8:26). The word ought, however, stands for the word dei (it-is-BINDING), hence cannot be rendered we ought, but it. It does not refer to us, but what. We are not aware what must be, so that we can pray accordingly. If it referred to us, then the word hemas (US) would have to follow, as in Acts 27:26, it-is-binding us to fall on a certain island. This passage also shows that the word means must, not "ought." Ought belongs to the word OWE, as in John 13:14, "you also ought to be washing one another's feet . . . ."

"The difference between the AV as we ought and the CV to accord with what must be [WHICH is-BIND-ING] is almost infinite. One confines us to ourselves and our soulish and selfish interests. The other occupies our spirits with God and His great plan and purpose. Our prayer should always be in tune with His universal symphony. It is impossible for us to know the infinite details of His grand designs. These are as fixed and immutable as His holy Word.

Not a 'jot or tittle,' not one iota or serif, not the smallest letter or even a part of a letter of His revelation can be changed by our prayers, neither can the minutest part of His plan for us be altered by our petitions. In one case we look within at our failing selves, in the other we look above, at the infinite perfection of God. Our attitude and outlook are revolutionized.

"Let us beware, in our prayer, that we do not set ourselves above the Supreme. Let us not inform Him Who knows all, or reform Him Who has made all. He is not an idol of putty, so that we may remold Him to conform to ourselves. Those who know Him do not wish to change Him. They are satisfied and delighted to have Him as He is. Neither do they wish to change His purpose or His plan. His will, to them, is the only good. They wish to change themselves, not Him. They would have Him inform them, through His Word. They want Him to conform them to His will."[1]

NOT TO BE OVERWEENING, IN LIGHT OF WHAT MUST BE

While the principal modern definition of "overweening" speaks of overconfidence, conceit, or brashness (and all of these we surely wish to avoid), such a sense does not capture the essence of meaning of the Greek scriptural term itself here, [h]uper phroneō, of which its elements say, "be-OVER-DISPOSED." The notion "to be disposed (to)" accords with that of the English ween, which simply means "to think; suppose . . . or imagine (something)."

1. A. E. Knoch, Unsearchable Riches, vol.77, pp.5-7.

The sense of the Greek word which the CV translates "overweening," then, would seem to be "over-disposed (to)." It is indeed our duty to be attentive, or disposed, to a faithful walk, "to pursue righteousness, faith, love, peace . . ." (2 Tim.2:22). But we should not pursue any such ideals in an excessive, or "overly-intent" way. Each one of us have our decided limitations; this is because God has granted us not measureless grace, but a measure of grace in His service.

Even where the accurate CV rendering "overweening" has been accepted, this entreaty in Romans 12:3 for us not to be "overweening," or engaged in any kind of excessive dwelling on the self (even in the interest, specifically, of faithfulness to God), has sometimes been misunderstood.

This is because of the phrase, "beyond what your disposition must be." Some have taken the entreaty as saying we should be attentive (even if not overly so) to overcoming our shortcomings, except for certain ones which "must be." It is felt that in such cases, since there is nothing we can do about them, Paul therefore makes an exception.

But it is also supposed that in all other matters progress is finally up to the individual, not to God. Of course there is an abundance of opinionated disagreement as to just what one can and cannot help doing, with the judgments concerning these things nearly always being much more favorable toward oneself than toward one's associates. Such imaginings have led away altogether from the original purpose of Paul's words, and have actually caused an increase in, albeit hyper-zealous, failures of walk among believers.[2]

The words "beyond what your disposition must be," first of all, are an expression of realization and understanding that it is inevitable, until the time God conforms us to the image of His Son, that we will all remain, to whatever degree, far from perfect, according to our own disposition. Until then, no one can achieve perfection in the disposition of Christ.

Paul's words are plain: "your disposition must be." We need to face these words and recognize their significance. Now if it should be true that even some of the things to which we are disposed must be—and who has authority to say which ones are excluded?—there is no logical ground for objecting should we find that this is true concerning all.

Now in saying that a certain thing, at present, must be, we are not at all suggesting that God will not change it at a later time (perhaps, even in the immediate future), and do so through our toils. Our only point is that whatever must be—whatever it may consist of at any certain time—is that which cannot be otherwise.

If we know God's good purpose in evil, we may be afforded much consolation and insight through these words, even as when the apostle says, "it must be that there are sects also among you" (1 Cor.11:19), or, "for what we should be praying for, to accord with what must be, we are not aware" (Rom.8:26).

Here, in the opening words of Romans 12, we stand in the presence of the great truth that all is out of, through, and for God (Rom.11:36). Since this is true, our disposition, even as all else, is necessarily included in that which must be.

That which must be is that which occurs due to a cause. A caused event cannot be avoided, any more than an uncaused event, were such an event ever to occur, could be avoided. Either one chooses as he does due to a cause, or he does not. And, either way, "free will" is impossible.

"It is often said that no one can change the past. This is true enough, but it is seldom added that no one can change the future either. If the past is unchangeable, the future is unavoidable—on anyone's account. The future exists, timelessly, of the sequence of events that will happen, whether determined to happen or not, and it makes no sense to speak of avoiding those events than it does to speak of avoiding those events that have already happened."[3]

Even if, though unscripturally, we were to conceive of the future as that which "need not be," instead of, scripturally, as that which "must be," the popular conception of free will would still be precluded. Either way, free will is false. It is not simply that it is not true, but that it cannot even possibly be true.

It is not a question whether an event is a divinely determined event or a self-determined event.[4] In fact, it is not a question of whether an event is a determined event at all. The point is this: ultimately speaking, there are only three possible accounts of human behavior, (1) a causative account, (2) a non-causative account, and (3) an account that is partially causative and partially non-causative. And, all three of these accounts preclude free will.

One cannot categorically avoid doing what he does, (1) if all of his deeds are ultimately caused, (2) if none of his deeds are ultimately caused (i.e., if, thus, they are all acts of "sheer chance," due to nothing whatsoever), or (3) if some of his deeds are ultimately caused and some others of his deeds are not ultimately caused.

Therefore, it follows—"on anyone's account"—that categorical avoidance of future events (i.e., contrary choice, or "free will") is simply impossible. This conclusion can be evaded and denied; it can be disliked, disapproved of, and condemned. Through misrepresentation, it can be made to appear ridiculous and immoral. It can be ignored, neglected, or misused. It can be practically denied even where not propositionally denied. Or it can simply not be understood and recognized. Nevertheless, since this conclusion, indeed, is conclusive, it cannot be made inconclusive.

4. Behavior determined from within (i.e., solely due to internal causes) would still be determined behavior. It would be impossible to avoid, as much so as behavior determined from without, or, as much so as undetermined behavior.

THE BASIS OF PAUL'S ENTREATY

Though free will is false, and all must finally accord with "what must be," Paul's entreaty, nevertheless, remains: "I am entreating you then, brethren, by the pities of God, to present your bodies a sacrifice, living, holy, well pleasing to God, your logical divine service, and not to be configured to this eon, but to be transformed by the renewing of your mind, for you to be testing what is the will of God, good and well pleasing and perfect" (Rom.12:1,2).

In making his entreaty, Paul tells us plainly why he is entreating us. It is because of all the good news he has presented hitherto (especially the good news that all is out of, through, and for God), and because the evangel is God's power for salvation to everyone who is believing (Rom.1:16).

The basis for the apostle Paul's entreaty is the glorious fact that all is out of, through, and for God. Though it is impossible for us to do anything of ourselves, since God, nonetheless, can do all these marvelous things of Romans 12:1,2 in us, and since the means He uses to accomplish this through us is the influence of His Word upon us, the apostle declares, "I am entreating you then, brethren, through [these] pities of God . . . ." (Rom.12:1; cp Eph.3:20,21).

Consequently, in seeking to heed his entreaty, we must remember that we cannot exceed the limitations imposed upon us (1) by our present disposition (i.e., inclinations and preferences of mind) "which must be," and (2) by the limited degree of power inherent in the limited measure of faith which God has dispensed to us. We will do well to view all our endeavors in light of these realities, and to recognize that these limitations will lie upon us in all our pursuits.

Whatever progress in useful service we may achieve will only take place because it too comes to us out of, through, and for God. It will be for His glory, not our own. But the emphasis we are especially considering at the moment, as recorded in Romans 12:3, is the emphasis of Paul's seeking our response to the entreaty which he has just given us in verses 1 and 2.

The words "beyond what your disposition must be," were not written to inform us that Paul would not bother to entreat us at all concerning certain aspects of our walk, no matter how deficient. For indeed, he has just entreated us to present ourselves to God ideally, in a way that debars all such unprofitable over-attentiveness to self. It cannot be that he immediately contradicts himself.

Similarly, neither are we implausibly to reason along the lines that even though many things need not occur, since there are at least some (imperfect) things which must occur, the apostle would not have us much concern ourselves with living above their lowly level. After all, apart from some special revelation, we could never know just what was to be included in either category!

We believe that God is operating all in accord with the counsel of His will (Eph.1:11) and that all thus accords with what must be. We are not fatalists, however, but ones who, ultimately speaking, rely upon God alone. Indeed, it is a mistake to suppose that full acceptance of the deity of God implies fatalism. Fatalism says that future events will come about in spite of what we do. Divine determination says that future events will come about because of what we do. Fatalism says that my morrow is determined no matter how I struggle. The divine decree declares that my morrow is determined through my own struggle (cp Isa.55:10,11).

"For I am saying . . . not to be overweening . . . but to be of a sane disposition, as God parts to each the measure of faith" (Rom.12:3). Paul's point is this: We are not to be engaged in any kind of phrenetic, frenzied "overstriving," but simply to be of a sane disposition—"as God parts to each the measure of faith"—which alone is able to produce the fruit of faithfulness (cp Gal.5:22). Now we rely upon the living God. He is our Saviour, our Deliverer and Sustainer in our faithfulness as well, even as in all else.

OUR DISPOSITION IS GIVEN BY GOD

The phrase "beyond what your disposition must be," then, does not exempt us from seeking certain ideals. Instead, they are words of understanding and consolation, that we might avoid unbridled self-condemnation when we fail, and self-righteousness and pride when we succeed. For, "A human cannot get anything if it should not be given him out of heaven" (John 3:27). Therefore, whatever disposition we may have is the disposition God has given us. It is what "must be." And, beyond the effects of what our disposition must be, in the nature of the case, we cannot go.

The sense is: Do not be phrenetic, but rather, sane. Yet, in endeavoring to heed this counsel, remember that you cannot heed it perfectly, for you cannot transcend what your disposition must be. Even so, be of a sane disposition, as God parts to each the measure of faith, the measure of faith which produces corresponding faithfulness of walk.

Let us seek to heed Paul's words of entreaty and counsel here, but only with the prayer that in it all God might be fulfilling every delight of goodness and work of faith in power, so that the name of our Lord Jesus—not our name—may be glorified in us, and we in Him, in accord with the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ (cf 2 Thess.1:11,12). J.R.C.

GRACE AND OBEDIENCE

THERE are certainly parallels between the evangel of the Uncircumcision and that of the Circumcision, but these parallels do not include the necessity of our doing such things as avowing our faith verbally (though we gladly do so) or obediently persevering (though we seek to do so). We do not "do" in order to live, but because we live (cp Rom.10:5; Rom.8:1b,2).

If we genuinely believe, it is evident that we have been called and are among the chosen. Though it is the desire of our heart to be faithful to the Lord, it is not necessary for us to obey in order to have future eonian life.

When we are vivified, seated together among the celestials, rejoicing in eonian life and glory, this will not be the generosity of God's reward, but a display of the transcendent riches of His grace (Eph.2:5-7). Eonian life under the Circumcision calling, however, is a reward; it is only for those who are worthy (Luke 20:35), for those who are doing righteousness (1 John 2:3,4,14; cf 1 John 3:7-10). Though most cannot see this, this is the basic distinction between the gospel of the Circumcision and that of the Uncircumcision.

Yet it is necessary for us to obey if we would reign during the future eons (2 Tim.2:12a), if we would enjoy the allotment of God's "kingdom." In Greek, the noun "reign" (or "king[dom]") is basileia, and the verb "reign" is basileuō;. Paul is very clear, and we are not to be deceived: those whose continued, habitual activity (or "practice," prassō) is that of the works of the flesh, "shall not be enjoying the allotment of the [reign] of God" (Gal.5:21; cp 1 Cor.6:9; Eph.5:5). The literal English equivalent of the Greek is, "THE-ones such PRACTICING, KINGdom [i.e., reign] OF-God NOT WILL-BE-tenantING."[1]

That is, those who have habitually practiced the works of the flesh, will not be taking part (having a "tenancy" or "allotment") in God's rule. Those who do not endure now, will not reign then.

Yet this is not at all to say that those who do not endure now will not live then. Since eonian life is a matter of grace, it follows that, on the one hand, there is nothing we can do to gain it, and on the other, that there is nothing we can do to lose it. "We all, indeed, shall not be put to repose, yet we all shall be changed, in an instant, in the twinkle of an eye, at the last trump" (1 Cor.15:51,52a). In that day, we all shall be changed, not merely those among us who have endured. "Whenever Christ, our Life, should be manifested, then you also shall be manifested together with Him in glory" (Col.3:4).

We must distinguish between the allotment of God's kingdom [i.e., "reign"] and the allotment of eonian life. Though we will not all take part in God's reign, nonetheless we will all live under its jurisdiction. It is immediately following Paul's words in which he soberly declares that the unjust, indeed, shall not be enjoying the allotment of God's kingdom, or reign, that he joyously adds the following contrastive statement: "But you are bathed off, but you are hallowed, but you were justified in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ and by the spirit of our God" (1 Cor.6:11).

As those who have been justified (i.e., made righteous) in God's grace, through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus (Rom.3:24), we have the expectation (not merely a possible "hope") of "the allotment of life eonian" (Titus 3:7). Therefore, we will live throughout the coming eons—not to mention be saved from the indignation of God (1 Thess.5:8-10)—even if it should be that we do not reign.

Besides, those who do reign will no more be able to boast in themselves of their endurance than those who live will be able to boast in themselves of their membership in the ecclesia. All will then say, "in the grace of God, I am what I am" (cp 1 Cor.15:10). Indeed, if we cannot wholeheartedly say this at present ourselves, we are not *faith*fully enduring in the first place, but are instead only boasting in ourselves, according to human tradition; if so, we can hardly expect to be among those who will reign.

Let us soberly recognize that those who are practicing the works of the flesh will not be "tenanting" (or having an allotment in) God's reign. Yet let us happily rejoice that, "being justified in that One's grace, we may be becoming enjoyers, in expectation, of the allotment of life eonian" (Titus 3:7).

If we would faithfully endure, it will be necessary for us to learn what we must do unto this end. Instruction precedes obedience. For this we will have to learn how to "correctly cut the word of truth" (2 Tim.2:15), as Paul says, "that you may know that which concerns you" (Col.4:8).

For example, concerning the matter of deciding for days, it is not that the law has been "done away," or that the sabbath has been changed to Sunday. It is only that the believers of the nations did not need to keep the law of Moses to be saved (Acts 15), as even the Jerusalem leaders recognized. The "law of God," when the reference is to what was given through Moses, is spoken of interchangeably as the law of Moses and that of the Lord (e.g., Luke 1:6; 2:22-24,39; John 1:17; Heb.10:28). The claim which some make that while the "law of Moses" has been rescinded, the "law of God" must be obeyed by "Christians" today not only to be faithful but to be saved at all, is unwarranted.

As used by most, there is much more mischief and confusion concerning the word "Christian" than there is light and understanding. Paul managed to write all of his epistles without employing it even once. In the Scriptures, this expression (Christianos, ANOINTED-[Latin suffix]) is a worldly term of contempt for the followers of Christ. When we are speaking from a secular vantage point, perhaps we might use it ourselves (though without any contempt) of any today who are naming the name of the Lord. But we would do well to confine our usage to this application.

What some call "God's law"—that is, to speak plainly, the Ten Commandments and perhaps certain other laws from the books of Moses—is that which is said to constitute timeless righteousness. However reasonable and scriptural this notion may seem to be, it simply is not true. We do not seek to obey as such even a single one of the laws given through Moses. Similarly, we do not inconsistently set aside the fourth commandment, that enjoining sabbath-keeping, while seeking to heed the remaining nine ourselves. Not at all. It is merely incidental to our own obedience that, for example, Moses instructed the Israelite to honor his father and mother (the fifth commandment of the "ten words"). We are to follow the apostle Paul fully in his teaching (2 Tim.3:10). That is why we, like Israel, are to honor our parents also (Eph.6:1-3).

Anyone who is at all acquainted with the Pauline writings is aware that the apostle places much emphasis on the importance of the believer's obedience. He employs the imperative mood and gives many entreaties—clearly and directly—whenever he wishes to present the Lord's directives concerning us. In so doing, he sometimes presents various instructions to us that were indeed first given as laws for Israel of old, often interpreting them in a fuller and more exalted sense (e.g., Eph.5:28). Yet there is no such instruction anywhere in his writings concerning the sabbath. Likewise, he nowhere teaches that the will of God with respect to the believer's walk may be found within the books of Moses. May these facts speak to us, concerning the genuine teaching of our apostle, who dared not to speak any of what Christ did not effect through him, "for the obedience of the nations" (Rom.15:18).

ZEALOUS FOR LAW, SAVED THROUGH GRACE

Among the Jews there were tens of thousands who had believed, and they were all inherently zealous for the law (Acts 21:20). Under the economy of the law, it was essential that the believers should display their own righteousness (Matt.5:20). If they would enter into life, they must "keep the precepts" (Matt.19:17). Throughout their generations they were to teach their sons, "It shall come to be righteousness for us when we observe to do all this instruction before Yahweh our Elohim, just as He had enjoined on us" (Deut.6:25).

Understandably, then, at Jerusalem some from the sect of the Pharisees who had believed, assuming that any believers of the nations would have to become proselytes and keep the law even as they (cp Matt. 23:15; Isa.56:1-7), "rose up, saying that [these] must be circumcised, besides charging them to keep the law of Moses" (Acts 15:5). So the apostles and elders there gathered together to see about this matter (Acts 15:6).

"Now there coming to be much questioning, rising, Peter said to them, 'Men! Brethren! You are versed in the fact that from the days at the beginning God chooses among you, that through my mouth the nations are to hear the evangel and believe. And God, the Knower of hearts, testifies to them, giving the holy spirit according as to us also, and in nothing discriminates between us and them, cleansing their hearts by faith. Why, then, are you now trying God, by placing a yoke on the neck of the disciples which neither our fathers nor we are strong enough to bear? But through the grace of the Lord Jesus we are believing, to be saved in a manner even as they'" (Acts 15:7-11).

The idea behind the Greek phrase for "in a manner even as they" (kath on tropon kakeinoi), is that the Jews themselves would only be saved (through the grace of the Lord Jesus) based upon the same method or by the same means as that which God was already using to save the nations. Since the Jews had to bear the yoke of the law anyway, though they, like their fathers, were not strong enough to do so, it was evident that God would have to employ extremely powerful means if they should ever be saved. And if there was to be any expectation of their being able to keep the law satisfactorily, they would have to be regenerated—that is, they "must be begotten anew" (John 3:7b). Through the holy spirit of God they were enabled to do what was otherwise impossible.

Concerning all such ones the apostle John writes, "Everyone[2] who is believing that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God. And everyone who is loving Him Who begets is loving him also who is begotten by Him. In this we know that we are loving the children of God, whenever we may be loving God and may be doing His precepts. And His precepts are not heavy, for all[2] that is begotten of God is conquering the world. And this is the [agency of] conquest that conquers the world: our faith" (1 John 5:1-4).

"Everyone[2] who is begotten of God, is not doing [i.e., practicing] sin, for His [God's] seed is remaining in him, and he [relatively speaking] can not be sinning, for he is begotten of God" (1 John 3:9; cp 1 John 1:8).

2. "Universal" terms must always be interpreted according to their context. They always refer to all who are in view—within the scope of the context or in the nature of the case. In this instance, the words "everyone" and "all" have in view (and are confined to) all those who are called into Christ through the evangel of the Circumcision.

In light of all this, the fact that these Jews were believing through the grace of the Lord Jesus becomes much more meaningful to us. This believing of theirs itself had only occurred since they were "to be saved," though in the same manner (tropos, through the same "method" or "means") which God would use for the salvation of the nations.

God's method for effecting salvation—the means which He always employs—is the power of His own word: He speaks and it is done; for He causes the testimony of His word to be fulfilled. His creatures are merely the men of His counsel (Isa.46:11). His word, which fares forth from His mouth, never returns to Him empty. But rather, it does whatever He desires, and prospers so as to accomplish that for which He sends it (cp Isa.55:10,11).

A DOOR OF FAITH

During the conference at Jerusalem, a time was provided so that the entire multitude might hear the testimony of Barnabas and Paul. As at Antioch, they informed the Jerusalem assembly of whatever God had done with them, explaining not how He had pointed those of the nations to the existing door of proselytism but how He had "open[ed] to the nations a door of faith" (cf Acts 14:27). Moreover, Barnabas and Paul wisely unfolded "whatever signs and miracles God does among the nations through them" (Acts 15:12). As a result, the Jewish believers were afforded assurance that their ministry was of God.

It must have been astonishing for these Jewish believers to discover that Paul, unlike themselves, was not compelling the nations to be judaizing (cp Gal.2:14). Yet since they recognized that God, nonetheless, had entrusted Paul with the evangel of the Uncircumcision "according [i.e., just as surely] as Peter [with that] of the Circumcision," knowing the grace which was being given to Paul, James and Cephas and John gave Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship even so (Gal.2:7-9). As Peter had said before to the doubting apostles and brethren of Judea concerning the nations, "If, then, God gives them the equal gratuity as to us also, when believing on the Lord Jesus Christ, who was I—able to forbid God?" (Acts 11:17).

Consequently, having pointed out that the words of the prophets (his citation is Amos 9:11,12) are in agreement in principle with this ministry of Paul's, James says, "Known from the eon to the Lord is His work" (Acts 15:18). That is, from of old God has known what His work would include, and, astonishing as it may be, His work includes this ministry of Paul's among the nations—even though it is apart from the law (cp Acts 18:13).

"Wherefore, I decide," says James, "not to be harassing those from the nations who are turning back [or "turning about"] to God, but to be writing an epistle to them to be abstaining from ceremonial pollution with idols, and prostitution, and what is strangled, and blood. For Moses, from ancient generations, city by city, has those who are heralding him, being read on every sabbath in the synagogues" (Acts 15:19-21).

James is saying that if any among the gentile believers should be directed of the Lord to become proselytes, they could readily find synagogues where Moses was being heralded every sabbath and thus be afforded instruction in his writings. If this should occur, any subsequent law observance by such gentiles would not be wrong. But, in light of Paul's unique and yet faithful ministry among the nations, it becomes evident that gentile believers must not be charged to keep the law of Moses or told that they cannot be saved apart from circumcision.

However, James did consider it necessary to burden the gentiles with a few instructions of his own (though he claimed they were the counsel of the holy spirit as well), even terming them, "essentials." Yet these instructions were only concerned with abstinence from idol sacrifices, blood, strangled animals, and prostitution. It is interesting to note what he deemed absolutely "essential" while also noting that they were the only things he included in this category.[3]

Since not even James, through his personal decrees, had attempted to enjoin sabbath observance upon the nations, and since any such decrees as those which he did make are now "erased" (Col.2:14) and "nullified" by Christ Himself (Eph.2:13-18), Paul says, "Let no one, then, be judging you in food or in drink or in the particulars of a festival, or of a new moon, or of sabbaths, which are a shadow of those things which are impending—yet the body is the Christ's" (Col.2:16,17), and, "you are complete in Him" (Col.2:10).

Regardless of the value of any such individual rules, since the decrees which James had set forth are not to be viewed as obligatory, it is even more unwarranted to suppose that various points of the law of Moses, such as those having to do with food and drink and various days, ought to be observed. After all, not even James (who was not an apostle) had said that these things should be attended to, much less had Paul given any such instruction!

The Colossians were not to permit others to "judge" them (to impose their opinions upon them) with respect to the "elements of the world," that is, with respect to the particulars of the Mosaic SYSTEM (cp Gal.4:3,9,10; Acts 21:24). Instead, they were to heed Paul's own counsel to "Beware that no one shall be despoiling you through philosophy and empty seduction, in accord with human tradition, in accord with the elements of the world, and not in accord with Christ" (Col.2:8). Misplaced truth is human tradition. All that is not in accord with (kata, DOWN) Christ— whatever teaching there may be that fails to base all upon the intrinsic sufficiency of His sacrificial work— is wrong and will rob us of the truth. This is so even if such teachings should seek to promote the observance of the very components (i.e., "elements") comprised in Yahweh's own law, given to Israel.

3. Evidently, the purpose of these decrees was merely to make it possible for the Jews to have social fellowship with the believers among the nations without offending Jewish ethics. A Jewish believer, due to the proscriptions of the law, would be asking for all its curses should he be found eating at the same table with a gentile who had served an idol sacrifice, or strangled meat, or blood. Though it is true that Paul, when passing through Syria and Cilicia "gave over" James' decrees to the believers there (Acts 16:4), later on he practically repealed them when he made the eating of meats offered to idols a matter of individual conscience (1 Cor.8:1-13; cp Eph.2:15).

Nearly all who advocate present-day sabbath observance teach that we must observe this day and cannot be saved unless we do. This is a far more serious error than merely affirming that we should observe the sabbath, but need not do so to be in Christ or to be vivified in the day of His appearing.

Yet even the claim that we should observe the sabbath is simply incorrect. Most do not seem to realize that Paul, the apostle of the nations, was extremely critical of any who had received his evangel who were nonetheless "scrutinizing" days (Gal.4:10) and otherwise seeking to "judaize" (cp Gal.2:14)—to follow the ways of the Jews by attending to those things which pertain to the covenant from Mount Sinai (Gal.4:21, 24, 30).

If any should wish to observe the sabbath, to whatever extent, as a matter of sheer personal preference, that is one thing, whether or not such a decision should reflect mature judgment. But, in any case, there should be no suggestion that it is somehow pleasing to God for us to do so any more than to circumcise, or that those who do not follow the practice of observing days, including the sabbath, are therefore displeasing to Him. Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

When we hear the phrase "God's law," for many, the idea that comes to mind is that of "the ten commandments"[1] as recorded in Exodus 20. It is a mistake, however, to conceive of the word "law," or of such phrases as "the law" or "God's law" as if any of these constitute a denominative, a veritable proper noun, indeed, a most unusual proper noun of singular, exclusive reference.

An awareness of this common misconception becomes especially important to us as we approach the epistles of Paul, giving special attention therein to his evangel, which he was heralding among the nations. Therein, while his usage of the word "law" is often in reference to God's law which He gave to Israel, this is not always the case. The apostle sometimes speaks of law generically, in reference to law per se, with respect to its inherent nature and ramifications (e.g., Rom. 7:1-4). Paul speaks as well of what effectively is the law of sin and death, how it is that "through one human sin enters into the world, and through sin death, and thus death passes through into all human beings, on which all sin" (Rom.5:12).

Conversely, it is in the evangel of God's grace, in which Paul heralds the law of God—"God's law" (Rom.7:25)—which

1. The traditional phrase "the ten commandments" as ordinarily construed has in mind the ten precepts which Elohim gave to Israel through Moses as recorded in Exodus 20:3-17. In the Scriptures, these precepts are called "the ten words": "Moses wrote on the tablets the words of the covenant, the ten words" (Ex.34:28; cp Deut.4:13; 10:4). Each one of these ten "words" constituted an authoritative utterance of "the One, Elohim" which He gave to the nation of Israel. The "Ten" provided the sons of Israel not only with these self-same instructions in their own right, but served as well as a principled foundation which directed the people to the many, detailed particulars of the Law (namely, the law of Yahweh, given through Moses to Israel) as a whole.

he identifies as "the spirit's law of life" (Rom.8:2). This vital theme of "God's law" as appertains to the evangel and closely related topics are addressed in Dean Hough's article, "Spirit and the Mind" (p.101).

On page 100, the text of Romans 7:21-8:8 is presented as it appears in our tentative CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, this text being the portion of Scripture primarily addressed in the article which follows.

The classic Meditation entitled "Life and Peace" by William Mealand, begins on page 111. Perhaps like no other, this little work makes manifest, truly, "The mindset of the spirit is life and peace" (Rom.8:6).

The article "Creation and Disruption" (p.115) by A. E. Knoch, considers the question, Why was the earth not left as it was when originally created, providing the answer, "Because it is the stage on which God reveals, not only His creative power, but the deeper attributes of wisdom and grace and love."

In my article, "The Holy Spirit of God" (p.128), I address many of the issues that arise concerning "HOLY SPIRIT," and "THE HOLY SPIRIT," as to the various usages of these phrases, including ones which speak of God Himself, still others being in reference to His powerful operations. Foundationally, I explain the meaning of the phrase itself "the HOLY SPIRIT of God" (Eph.4:32), which is: "the consecrated imperceptible power of God."

In our final article, "The Myth of Free Will" (p.133), I rehearse what the traditional notion of free will is stipulated to be. In addition, I seek to draw attention to important aspects of volitional freedom (i.e.,"freedom of will"), ones which indisputably do obtain and are the possession of us all. Finally, I explain why the central claim of the free-willist (namely, that of a capacity of ultimate control over one's decisions) is incoherent and untenable, since there is no possible scenario under which any such capacity might exist.

J.R.C.

WE LIVE in a disrupted world where the chaos of sin and vacancy of death, covered over by the darkness of ignorance brings much wretchedness. This is the world we know in flesh. It is real to us because we hear its sounds with our ears of flesh, see it sights with our eyes of flesh and are occupied with its ways by our minds of flesh.

Yet for us who are believing God's evangel concerning His Son there is another life, which we have in spirit and by the spirit of God. This is our "life in Christ Jesus." We do not yet know it fully, but we are becoming acquainted with it in our minds which affects our actions as God's spirit works together with what He says to us in His "it-is-WELL-MESSAGE."

As we consider this evangel again in this magazine, along with the scriptural themes of God's holy spirit and will, we say with Paul, "Thanks be to God!" which is to say "Joy be to God for His joy to us in His rescue of us through Jesus Christ, our Lord" (cf Rom.3:24; 7:24,25). Thanks be to God that He has not given us free will, that is, a will that is without a cause, nor the ability to act apart from His operation of all in accord with the counsel of His will (cf Rom.8:28; 11:36; Eph.1:11). Thanks be to God that His righteousness is not dependent on our obedience to His law of righteousness, nor on our faith, but rather rests fully on the faith and obedience of Jesus Christ (cf Rom.3:21,22,26; Phil.2:6-8). Thanks be to God that in His power and wisdom He has first of all seen to it that we become slaves of sin, but now already He has given us over to that type of teaching which reveals His righteousness and love (cf Rom.6:17,18). Thanks be to God that victory over death and sin which entered into the world through the one sin of Adam and passes upon all (Rom.5:12), has been accomplished through our Lord Jesus Christ (cf 1 Cor.15:57), and will be enjoyed by all (cf Rom. 5:18,19; 1 Cor.15:22). "Thanks be to God for His indescribable gratuity!" (2 Cor.9:17).

SPIRIT AND THE MIND

GRACE!
Through Jesus Christ.
God's law.
The spirit's law.

Paul's letter to the Romans expounds God's evangel, His "it-is-WELL-MESSAGE." This message (greatly needed and deserving of all welcome in our days) is compressed into one word in Romans 7:24, Grace. In Romans 7:25 it resounds in the banner phrase, Through Jesus Christ, and is captured in the words, God's law. And in Romans 8:2 this evangel as it works in us who are believing is called The spirit's law. This is God's law of grace as it operates in our lives today while we still live in flesh under the law of sin and death. By the spirit of God and in spirit we have life in Christ Jesus! This needs to be in our minds that it may also affect our spirits and our actions.

Therefore, it is well. Despite the law of sin and death which operates in our flesh, Nothing is now condemnation to those in Christ Jesus (Rom.8:1). For sin itself has been put under condemnation (Rom.8:3).

GRACE!

The Greek word charis is generally translated grace, but sometimes, as in Romans 7:25, it is given the variant, thanks (with a lightface "s" to show that it is a singular noun). It may be helpful to use the standard term JOY to understand how the two renderings represent one Greek word: Grace is the joy which God gives us. Thanks is the joy we give God. In the current revision of the CV we are conjecturing that Paul originally included the word charis twice in succession[1] in his reply to the question, "What [or Who] will rescue me out of this body of death?" His immediate answer is an exclamation: Charis! The joy of grace will rescue me! The second use of the word is also an expression of joyful emotion: Charis de to God! Now joy be to God in the form of thanks.

Even if we do not agree that the word "grace" was here twice in Paul's original letter, the reply to the question of Romans 7:24 must accord with the words of Romans 3:21-24. There we are told that God manifests His righteousness by justifying the sinner gratuitously, in His grace (that is, in His joy of giving that which brings joy to us) through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus. That deliverance is apart from law works required of the sinner as set forth in the first five books of the Bible, called the "Torah" (the Hebrew term for "law"). The rescue comes about through Jesus Christ, through His obedience (submissive hearing) and faith to the death of the cross. His obedience was His attentive listening to God's word concerning Him, that He would be "smitten of Elohim and humbled" (Isa.53:4), so that it was binding that, when the time came He must go to Jerusalem and suffer much and be killed (cf Matt.16:21). His faith was His conviction concerning God's rousing of Him on the third day and the joy which would follow (cf Heb.11:1; 12:2). These were very central matters in God's purpose in carrying out the counsel of His will (Acts 2:23; Eph.1:11), and our Lord fully submitted to them. So also Paul, made wretched by the law of sin and death in him, listened attentively to God's word spoken to him, not of what he must do, but what God had done through Jesus Christ. These were words fully of JOY. And thus we join Paul in giving JOY to God in the form of thanks for the JOY He gives to us, that is, for the rescue which comes through Jesus Christ, our Lord. It is, in its future and final realization, a full deliverance for everyone from sin and death into righteousness and life. It is binding that it shall be. Yet now, for those who are believing God's evangel, this deliverance is our present position in spirit, instilling into our lives the spiritual blessings of enhanced life and garrisoning peace (cf Phil.4:7).

"Justified then by faith [i.e.,the faith of Jesus Christ], we may be having peace toward God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, through Whom we have the access also, by faith, into this grace in which we stand, and we may be glorying in expectation of the glory of God" (Rom.5:1,2).

The entire human race is suffering and doomed, apart from the grace of God in not sparing His Son, but giving Him up for us all (cf Rom.3:20,23; 8:32). Yet because of that grace, the entire creation will be freed from the slavery of corruption into the glorious freedom of the children of God (Rom.8:21), and all who are dying in Adam will be vivified in Christ (1 Cor.15:22).

"But not as the offense, thus also the grace. For if, by the offense of the one, the many die, much rather the grace of God and the gratuity in grace which is of the One Human, Jesus Christ, to the many superabounds" (Rom.5:15). And this superabounding is not only to life, but "for life's justifying" (Rom.5:18).

To speak of the work involved in making God's evangel an evangel of grace is to speak solely of what God has done through Jesus Christ's faith, the grace of God in giving His Son Who dies for the sake of sinners, or rather over us all, encompassing us in His love (Rom.5:6-8). If we introduce human contribution into this equation, it will not compute.

We sin, which is to say we fail. "Yet where sin increases the grace [of God] superexceeds" (Rom.5:20).

As for us who are believing this evangel, we are not under law, but under grace (the evangel of God's joy given to us) (Rom.6:14,15). That is where we stand. As Israel, standing at the base of the mountain, was positioned under law, so we, standing under God's evangel of grace, are positioned under its spiritual influence.

Our future rescue from all wretchedness (cp Rom. 7:24) is certain. It has been established (but not brought into a complete realization and enjoyment). Yet also now, moment by moment, it is ours in spirit.

THROUGH JESUS CHRIST, OUR LORD

It has only recently been brought to my attention that the phrase, "through Jesus Christ, our Lord," is not simply referring to Him as the Channel through which we direct our thanks to God. He is this Channel because He is the Channel of our rescue from our bodies of death and from the law of sin.

Again and again, especially in Romans 5, we hear this condensation of the evangel. Peace toward God comes through our Lord Jesus Christ (Rom.5:1). That is, it comes by means of the faith of Jesus Christ in dying for our sakes. So also we have access through Him into the charis, the JOY in which we stand (Rom.5:2). It is not by means of law works, but through what Jesus Christ has done in obedience to His Father's will.

Again, we will be saved from indignation, through Him as the One Who shed His blood on our behalf (Rom.5:9). And accordingly, we are conciliated to God through the death of His Son (Rom.5:10); indeed we who are believing have obtained the conciliation through Him, through our Lord Jesus Christ Who dies for us while we are still enemies (Rom.5:11).

We hear the words "through the One, Jesus Christ" in Romans 5:17, and "through the obedience of the One" in 5:19, and "through Jesus Christ, our Lord" in 5:21, and we hear God's evangel concerning His Son. It is through His faith that there shall be a reigning in life instead of sinning in our dying bodies. It is through the death of the obedient One that all who are constituted sinners shall be constituted righteous. It is through the death of Jesus Christ, our Lord, that grace reigns for life eonian.

Thanks be to God, Who rescues us in His grace through Jesus Christ our Lord!

GOD'S LAW

"Consequently," in recognition of this grace, Paul, even while his flesh served "sin's law" was slaving for God's law of grace and peace with his mind (Rom.7:25). This enslavement of mind was daily a rescue from the wretchedness of his acute awareness of his failures and infirmity as a sinner.

God's law for dealing with sin is for Him to give up His own Son to the death of the cross. God's law is a law of grace and of gratuitous giving; it is a law of love, but also, as must be because it reflects what God is, it is a law of righteousness which does that which is right and makes all right. In carrying out this law God accomplishes that which is impossible for the law which He set over Israel to do. God does what the human cannot do by any means whatsoever. He does it by sending His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh, and sending Him in this way concerning sin (as the Antitype of the sin offering, cf 2 Cor.5:21) in order to condemn sin in the flesh to its final extermination (Rom.8:3).

As the words of the law given to Israel were to come to be in their hearts by repeating them in every way and under every situation (cf Deut.6:6-9), so the words of God's law, His evangel concerning His Son, came to be in Paul's mind and heart and comprehension by assiduous attention to its every detail. This enslaved attention was his obedience [UNDER-HEARing] to Christ's obedience to the death of the cross (cf Rom.6:16; Phil.2:8). When Paul cried out to God for deliverance from the splinter in the flesh added to the excessive sufferings of his ministry, the Lord protested, "Sufficient for you is My grace" (2 Cor.12:8,9). Paul's complaint was, in fact, a matter of coveting what God had not given him. The Lord's protest pointed Paul to the incomparable deliverance into life and peace, which God had given him. To Paul, in a very practical way, while he remained in the flesh, the evangel was God's power for salvation (cf Rom.1:16). Full salvation from all wretchedness is future. Yet rescue into peace of mind and joy of heart is ours today as the earnest of the spirit operates together with our believing of the evangel of God's grace through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

Thus Paul becomes the pattern for us who are believing (1 Tim.1:16), not only as a sinner saved by grace, but as a sinner sustained by grace.

THE SPIRIT'S LAW

It is because of God's law in sending His own Son for the condemnation of sin in the flesh, that nothing is now condemnation to us (Rom.8:1). In believing this word of God's grace, we are positioned in spirit before God in Christ Jesus. We are identified with Him in His death (as we learned from Romans 6:3-7), but also, as now clearly stated, we are identified with Him in His life. We are, by means of God's spirit, and in spirit, having "life in Christ Jesus."

In harmony with the context Paul calls this operation of spirit "the spirit's law." It is like the law God placed over Israel in the wilderness in that it is "an established rule of action." But it is unlike that law in that it does not look to human action to be carried out, but to God's action already carried out through Jesus Christ, our Lord. That is where its power lies for any pleasing of God in our lives.

SPIRIT IN ACTION

From the beginning God's spirit is placed between darkness and God's word (cf Gen.1:2,3). God creates the heavens and the earth, and the earth becomes a chaos and vacant, overspread by darkness. It is at this point of disruption that the spirit of God is first introduced as it vibrates over the chaotic abyss. Then immediately we hear God (Elohim) speaking: "Light is coming to be!"

And light is coming to be!

Yet this is not all, for Elohim is being heard again and again, in five more "days." until He is seeing all that He makes, "and behold, it is very good" (Gen.1:6-31). There is tremendous power in what God says when activated by His spirit. Exactly what He says is exactly what occurs.

First there is the fact of creation. Then there is disruption. And then, when there is the greatest of need, the spirit of God is seen vibrating over the disrupted, terrestrial system. Then there are words of God, words of evangel which call for light instead of darkness and order instead of chaos and life instead of vacancy, so that finally all that has been done is seen to be very good. Each step is important, creation, disruption, the vibrating of God's spirit and the word of God spoken, culminating in that which is very good being perceived.

This pattern resumes with the creation of humanity (Gen.1:27; 2:7), which is very good, followed by the disruption of Genesis 3. "To die, you shall be dying" (Gen. 2:17). That which was seen as very good, was not yet that pure goodness of God becoming All in all which is still to be. Opposition leading to death and sin has not yet been abolished. Paul has now described that renewed extension of disruption in the stark and sober words of Romans 5:12.

Through one human sin enters into the world, and through sin death, and thus death passes through into all human beings, on which all sin.

This is the law of sin and death.

What shall rescue us? God's grace, through Jesus Christ, shall rescue us:

God, sending His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh, and sending Him this way concerning sin, . . . condemns sin in the flesh.

For us who are believing this evangel, it is our rescue even now as we enslave our minds to it—not to the law of Sinai, but to God's it-is-WELL-MESSAGE centered upon His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord, Who dies concerning sin. This word of God is our rescue in spirit, capable of bringing about a renewing of our minds (Rom.12:2), with a positive outlook on life, which brings us peace.

The law of sin and death continues to operate, but as we proceed on our journey under these conditions in flesh, we walk under the spiritual guidance of what we are believing (cf Rom.8:4) even as Israel walked in the wilderness under the physical guidance of a cloud by day and fire by night. We are aware—we who are loving God Who commends His love to us in that, while we are still sinners, Christ dies for our sakes—we are aware that God is working all, both good and evil, together for good (Rom.5:8; 8:28).

THE MINDSET OF THE SPIRIT

As Paul enslaved his mind to God's law of grace, so in Romans 8:5-11 he speaks of us setting our minds on the spirit's law of life in Christ Jesus.

Previously the CV has used the English terms "be disposed" for the Greek verb phroneō, and "disposition" for the nouns, phrên and phronêma. These have served well in that the translation is consistent, and the understanding conveyed is correct as long as a sense of mental inclination is seen. But these are not common usages of the words "dispose" and "disposition," and even when they are so understood, they may seem a bit stiff and formal, so that the force and relevance of the Greek words in this context may not come through. Here in the context of Romans 8 the AV renderings, "mind" and "be minded," seem to serve better, so that the association with Romans 7:23,24 where Paul speaks of his mind, and with Romans 8:19 concerning the intuitive inclination (or longing) of the creation is more readily seen. Indeed in a context in which the word "spirit" occurs more frequently than in any other portion of Scripture, there is a fine harmony between that term, defined as "the imperceptible, intangible power of action, life and intelligence," and a person's mental inclinations.

How we think, and what we think affects our actions. There is "spirit" (intangible power) in our thoughts. In setting our minds on the things of the flesh, our walk (that is, our living of our lives) corresponds with those things which are transient ("vanity" as described in the book of Ecclesiastes). Yet in setting our minds on the spirit-animated revelations of God concerning the death and rousing of Christ and its effects, we will be strengthened and encouraged in heeding Paul's entreaties beginning in Romans 12:1.

LIFE AND PEACE

The mindset of the flesh, which is the mindset of all of us as we are constituted because of Adam's sin (cf Rom. 5:19), is like "death." It is occupied with insubjection to the good and righteous standards of the law of God given at Sinai (whether or not we know that law or have been put under it); it is not able to please God. But the mindset of the spirit is life and peace (Rom.8:6-8). That is, as we set our minds on our identification with Christ in His life where He is no longer dying, but is living to God (Rom. 6:10), our lives are invigorated with meaning, not just a smidgen of meaning, but with the perception that God is working everything together for good, which is quite an all-encompassing thing. And this works against any concept of life that is reflected in the early chapters of Ecclesiastes, for example, or by Saul of Tarsus when he discovered that he could not keep the law against coveting, a mindset much like death itself (cf Rom.7:10,11) and of wretchedness. The mindset of the spirit vibrates against such dark outlooks and makes life vibrant with the peace of sanity and the happiness of expectation.

Some may say that the believer no longer faces the frustration of Romans 7:18-24. But we are still in the flesh. The full rescue is future. Nevertheless Paul speaks here about the life in Christ Jesus which is ours now in spirit and shall be ours in every way in the oncoming eons. To occupy our minds with this "saving grace" hits us in a positive way with growth toward spiritual maturity.

"For the saving grace of God made its advent to all humanity, training [literally "hitting"] us that, disowning irreverence and worldly desires, we should be living sanely and righteously and devoutly in the current eon, anticipating that happy expectation, even the advent of the glory of the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ, Who gives Himself for us, that He should be redeeming us from all lawlessness and be cleansing for Himself a people to be about Him, zealous for ideal acts" (Titus 2:11-14).

What a happy expectation indeed! This is what the mindset of the spirit dwells upon. "For to expectation are we saved . . . . Now if we are expecting what we are not observing, we are awaiting it with endurance" (Rom.8:25).

We have this treasure of God's evangel in earthen vessels (2 Cor.4:7), and it is not backed up by visible signs and wonders. But as we set our minds on this grace of God, it is backed up by invisible power from God, power of uplifted life and sustaining peace. D.H.H.

LIFE AND PEACE

AGAIN and again in the divine literature we see phrases of power and beauty which breathe contentment and repose. It is as though coming from the fret and jar of city commotion, we enter an old-world garden, rich with fragrant quietude. Immediately the spirit feels the lull of repose, the charm of silence. It is an interlude of calm for the tired or fevered spirit.

In like manner these words of rare intent call us apart from the whirl of life, and bid us rest awhile. And should we luxuriate in the language of Paul, how blessed is the ease of heart and mind! For there is such a wealth of spiritual expression which continually rings true to experience as we open our minds to its power. Truly, "the path of life leads upward for the intelligent one" (Prov.15:24), and "The mindset of the spirit is life and peace" (Rom.8:6).

Amid the surge of modern city life the brain is crowded with many thoughts, and God is easily forgotten. The ways of the world and their occupation with the visible and tangible things of earth, tend to submerge the spiritual, so that we ever require the "one thing needful" as our happy portion. Therefore we would set our minds often on God and His evangel concerning the Son of His love, that life and peace may be truly ours.

So it is that Paul directs our believing to "Him Who rouses Jesus our Lord from among the dead ones, Who is given up because of our offenses, and is roused because of our justifying" (Rom.4:24,25). And thus he adds, "Justified, then, by faith, we may be having peace toward God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, through Whom we have the access also, by faith, into this grace in which we stand, and we may be glorying in expectation of the glory of God" (Rom.5:1,2).

Here is life which is life indeed, and peace which is God's own calm! For the people of God this life and peace has ever existed, and is perpetuated when the mind is set on the spirit's law which is "life in Christ Jesus" (Rom.8:2). Without hearing the grace we have heard, the Psalmist exulted with expectation, "You shall acquaint me with the path of life; Satisfying rejoicings are in Your presence; Pleasantness is at Your right hand" (Psa.16:11). And again, "How precious are Your thoughts to me, O El! How plentiful are their sums!" (Psa.139:17). As for us, Paul writes, "For you do not get slavery's spirit to fear again, but you get sonship's spirit in which we are crying, 'Abba, Father!' The spirit itself is testifying together with our spirit that we are children of God" (Rom.8:15,16).

These thoughts of the infinite One for the children of His choice, are spread as a banquet in the grand area of His Word. There they lie, extending as it were, from valley to mountain, from the mists of early, formative revelation, to the unclouded splendor of the highest peaks of truth. Things spiritual, vibrant with life and peace; and devotion to them an "open sesame" to the mind of God. And the more we are taken up with them the deeper is our joy.

There is a beautiful expression of this desire for God in the sixty-third Psalm. Note the line sequence:

"My soul thirsts for You; My flesh craves for You like a land arid and faint, without water . . . .

As with fatness and richness my soul shall be satisfied, And with jubilant lips my mouth shall praise . . . .

My soul clings to You; Your right hand upholds me" (Psa.63:1,5,8).

Thirst is followed by satisfaction which inspires keener trust.

Yet how more joyfully do we, like Paul, while still under sin's law, cling with our minds to God's law of grace. and find refreshment of spirit. "Nothing . . . is now condemnation to those in Christ Jesus. For the spirit's law of life in Christ Jesus frees [us] from the law of sin and death. For what is impossible to the law, in which it was infirm through the flesh, does God, sending His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh and concerning sin, He condemns sin in the flesh, that the righteous intent of the law may be fulfilled in us, who are not walking in accord with flesh, but in accord with spirit" (Rom.8:1-4).

Here indeed we see beauties which flood our hearts with the consciousness of God. And as we love them because they reflect the divine, we are truly taught of God. Thus we read with an ever-deepening discernment and appreciation, reveling in the things which make for life and peace.

God alone can soothe the overcharged heart and His quietness expel trouble. "Be still, and know!" Stillness is requisite for knowledge. And to be a student of things divine is to cherish the best kind of knowledge, for the choice carries with it a foretaste of the life of the oncoming eons. Other knowledge may be desirable, and of some value, but it does not impart life and peace.

Things of earth please for the moment, break as a bubble, and pass. But the life which is from God in Christ is deep and strong. Its endless flow is shrined in calm. Paul knew its grand repose when he penned his fine testimony: "I learned to be content in that in which I am. I am aware what it is to be humbled as well as aware what it is to be superabounding. In everything and among all am I initiated, to be satisfied as well as to be hungering, to be superabounding as well as to be in want" (Phil.4:11,12). We comprehend the apostle's attitude as we note another declaration: "For whatever promises are of God, are in Him 'Yes.' Wherefore through Him also is the 'Amen' to God, for glory, through us" (2 Cor.1:20).

What enrichment is ours in the beloved One, for who but He can ensure the peace of earth, and the final calm of the wide universe. Limitless wealth and ability is His. Therefore, in the present evil age we should endure, "as seeing Him Who is invisible." And as we mature in faith we restfully fall in with divine appointments. We find it easier to forego cherished plans, largely leaving the shaping of our course to Him.

Our spiritual blessings among the celestials constitute our highest call to life and peace. Yet even so, "devoutness with contentment is great capital" (1 Tim.6:6), and there are many humble souls who prove this, to whom higher knowledge has not come. Pure in heart, they see God in so many ways, that their hearts truly sense His rare repose. It is good to know such people of God, for they are life oases in the desert wilds. They just exhale life and peace.

However, apart from such refreshment, we must prove for ourselves the blessedness of God's will. He has revealed so much for head and heart, that we may well be taken up with the unfoldings of His mind. Therein lies our peace as we ascend faith's mountain. And the life of the ages gilds its crest. The foretaste of glory may be ours, however toilsome the ascent. It was so with Paul. See how he pierces the filaments of sense and space. His pen depicts no earthly potentate as holding him in thrall, but gives the higher view that makes for life and peace.

Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus! He looked beyond the passing moves of men to the prime Mover of all things. He kept his vision clear.

O that we might lift our eyes to the great Invisible, that such poise may be ours as to ensure a light regard for things of earth, and a more deeply rooted affection for things above. For, to be spiritually minded is life and peace.

–adapted from a Meditation by William Mealand

CREATION AND DISRUPTION

To really comprehend the truth presented to us in the creation and disruption of the earth, we must consider its place in God's primeval purpose, and its relation to His other creations in the universe. When we consider the sun and the stars, with the beneficent brilliance, the earth is dark and dismal and utterly dead apart from their light and heat. It takes a very low rank, if not the lowest, now that it is, to a considerable degree, still a disintegrating chaos. Why was it not left as it was when originally created? Because it is the stage on which God reveals, not only His creative power, but the deeper attributes of wisdom and grace and love.

GOD'S WISDOM

God's wisdom needs a foil for its fullest display. To be sure, the creation itself calls for a measure of intelligence far beyond that of any of His creatures, to which He has imparted the minute measure that they possess. The earth is filled with examples of divine providence which makes all who ponder them marvel. But one who has turned his eyes to the empyrean, and considered the stars and their systems, the milky way with its myriads of luminaries, God's wisdom seems to be unfathomable. Truly, we can say with the psalmist (Psa.8:4-6):

4 What is a mortal that You are [l]mindful of him,
[+]Or a son of mankind that You are visiting him?
5 [+] You make him [l]lack a little [f]of [7]the messengers[cs],
And with glory and honor You [l]crown him.
6 You [c]give him the [l]rule [i]over the [d]works of Your hands;
All have You set under his feet:

From this it is evident that God planned the earth and man for a special purpose which could not be fulfilled apart from it. Paul tells us that He creates all, and especially the present secret administration that He might make known to the sovereignties and authorities among the celestials the multifarious wisdom of God. Here, on this chaotic earth, in this sinful world, His wisdom has deeper and direr problems to solve than in the rest of the universe, hence it presents a better field for its display (Eph.3:9-10). This scene of sin seems to be the best background on which to reveal the deepest depths of divine wisdom.

LOVE AND GRACE

Love lacks a foil for its display in a perfect environment. If the earth had not been wrecked and ruined in the beginning and all nature were pleasant and perfect as on the original earth, and if Adam had not introduced sin and dying and death, how little need would there be of God's intervention in the affairs of mankind! He would remain the unknown, the unloved Deity, unneeded, unwanted and unappreciated by the creatures of His hand and heart, and without the affection which He craves, not only from mankind, but from the celestial hosts as well.

Above all other things there was need of sin, which would produce suffering and misery, so that there would be the need and the desire for a Saviour; as well as estrangement and enmity in human hearts, so that there could be reconciliation, and humanity could be drawn closer to the heart of God than any others of His creatures. This demands an imperfect environment to produce it.

The Subjector wishes to reveal His hand by making the first last and the last first (Luke 13:30). This will not only be so on the earth in the kingdom, but in the universe as well. The dregs of earth will become the highest among the celestials. His Son came down to the deepest depths of earth, and to the dreadful death of the cross, in order to be raised to the place supreme. So, also, the despised of this world will be made judges of messengers (1 Cor.6:3). If God is to be All in all (1 Cor.15:28), it is necessary that He do all according to His will even in the wicked eons when men act as a foil to show His all-conquering might. An estranged humanity on a disintegrating earth provides Him with the opposition that He needs.

THE READJUSTMENT

Even as Adam was not restored to his original sinless condition, but was fitted for a comparatively short and evil life ending in death, so the earth was not restored to its primeval perfection, but readjusted to become a disintegrating habitation for mankind for the evil eons, until it is destroyed by fire, and a new creation restores it to more than its primeval perfection. This readjustment brought a measure of light, but a measure of darkness remained. The water was divided by the atmosphere, some above, some below. Then less than half of the land surface became dry. When we compare this with the future new creation, when there is no night, and no sea, and the log of life, in place of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, we realize that the first week's work was not a complete restoration, but only a readjustment, to set the stage for the eons of evil.

God saw all that He had made and found it very good (Gen.1:21). This is the divine viewpoint, with which we heartily agree. It seems to contradict the human aspect, which we have been considering. These two seem to differ because God looks at the intrinsic essence and the ultimate result, while we see nothing but the temporary outward appearance. When we consider the conclusion of the eons, even the evil eons are transformed into good by the result. For the great purpose of revealing God's wisdom and love all the evil background is indispensable and effective, hence beneficial. But to shortsighted humans, who cannot see the sequel, it seems to be bad, very bad.

MODERN THEOLOGY ASTRAY

The apostasy of modern theology, on the subject of creation and disruption is revealed by the popular discordant translations. They render DOWN-CASTing almost always by "the foundation of the world." To agree with this they convey the false idea that the earth was created "without form and void," although they definitely deny this in Isaiah 45:18. What kind of a "foundation" is without form and void? The foundation of the physical system in which we live was perfect. It was the wrecking of that system that made it a chaos, and demanded, not a restoration to the former ideal condition, but an adaptation or re-adjustment to set the stage for the tragedy of the eons.

PETER ON THE DISRUPTION

The apostle Peter foretold the presence of those who claim that "all is continuing thus from the beginning of creation. For they want to be oblivious of this, that there were heavens of old, and an earth cohering out of water and through water, by the word of God; through which the then world, being deluged by water, perished" (2 Peter 3:6). This was such a complete destruction that it is compared with the future dissolution of the elements by fire, which will call for a new creation. Peter definitely goes back to the creation, and describes the earth as we find it submerged, as in the second verse of Genesis. Then the whole old world perished, and the week's work was needed to make it habitable again.

We were taught that this referred to the flood of Noah's day, but found that unsatisfactory. This does not lead us back to the beginning of creation (2 Peter 3:4). Most of earth's inhabitants were drowned in the later deluge, but there was no need of a week's work or to create anything anew. The flood is compared with another event: "according as it occurred in the days of Noah, thus will it be in the days of the Son of Mankind also" (Luke 17:26). Peter, like the writer of Hebrews (Heb.4:3), connects the disruption of the world, right after its creation, with its dissolution by fire and the new earth in the new creation (2 Peter 3:10-13). This is one of the keys which show us the harmonious balance of God's operations.

RESULTS

A great work can only be properly judged by its outcome. Every part of it, especially the preparations for it, must be seen in the light of the final effect. Only by a full realization of the results of God's dealings with the earth and humanity, are we able to judge and appreciate His power and wisdom and love. If popular theology were correct and the great majority of earth's denizens were doomed to everlasting death or despair, then the creation of the earth, its chaos and partial readjustment, the introduction of sin and offense, the deluge, God's dealings with Israel, and the terrible judgments of the future—all the fearful suffering of mankind—will reveal the Creator and Subjector in the worst possible light as lacking power and wisdom and love.

But if we accept His own words as to the future our estimate of Him will be the reverse of this. If all mankind will be saved (1 Tim.4:10), and justified (Rom.5:18), and reconciled (Col.1:20), and thus were prepared by their suffering and sorrow to enjoy God's love endlessly, what a blessed boon will that be for them and for God! They will look back upon their brief burdens with thankful hearts and adore the One Who thus drew them to Himself.

But His chosen ones, the saints, have the greatest incentive to praise God for the ruin that followed creation, for it has given them the greatest privilege that can come to a creature, to be God's ambassadors, to make Him known, not only to mankind, but to messengers in other realms, and to reign with Christ, until all God's creatures are brought back to Him in love and He is All in all.

The chaos following creation was the initial preparation for God's great purpose to draw His creatures close to Himself, through their suffering, and the suffering of His Son for their sakes. Let us, then, not only admire His power and wisdom in creating the heavens and the earth, but bless and adore Him for the subsequent destruction of them and their readjustment for the purpose of revealing His grace and His love.

THE EONIAN OPERATION

The creation of the heavens and the earth was the beginning of the grand operation of the eons. If we turn to the consummation which ends them, we will find the final activity, which will complete the subjection begun so long before. The beginning, however, was in the physical sphere, but the end will be in the spiritual. As the sudden disruption of the earth was followed by a week of readjustment, so the insubordination of the first human is being followed by the gradual subjection of all mankind in the eonian times. At their conclusion the Father will have subjected all under the feet of the Son, by means of His spirit. Then the Son Himself will no longer subject others, but be subjected Himself. Then one spirit of subjection will prevail, so that the Subjector, by His spirit, will become All in all. He was All in Himself, then All in His Son, and, later, All in His saints at their vivification, and will be All in all the rest of humanity at the consummation.

CREATION—WHY SO

Once we know that the material creation is God's revelation of Himself in a tangible form, which humanity can perceive, it takes only a short step to realize why it was later made as it is. It was created perfect in the beginning. But this failed to reveal the deepest and most precious attribute of God's heart. Therefore, when it was readjusted from the disruption of the second verse of Genesis, it was permeated with evil, such as intermittent darkness, and with combinations of life-giving with death-dealing elements in the air and water and land. This was done in such a way as to bring about the evil eons, and the greatest of all sins, the crucifixion of Christ, by which His love is fully revealed. Yet this will be remedied by a new creation. But this is not the only result. It also gives us a preview and a picture of the spiritual course of God's method of uniting all to Himself at the consummation.

NEW CREATION

The mere fact that there will be a new creation in which darkness, and the other deficiencies of this readjustment, will be removed, should show that this arrangement is by no means ideal. Why do away with the night and the sea and the decadence introduced just before the eonian times, if these were perfect equipment at their beginning? And how can we avoid the clear indication that the spirit of Elohim was responsible for these temporal deficiencies?

CREATED EVIL

A truth greatly needed in these days by those who wish to understand and appreciate God's eonian operations, is His deliberate and designed use of evil. If we can show this on the grand scale of the eons, it may help much to recognize it in the minor relations of life. One reason why this is not generally recognized, is the unscriptural idea of punishment that prevails. All judgment, which is really righting wrongs, has been perverted into vindictive punishment with no hope of correction, such as the theological theory of the final fate of the unbeliever. The Subjector's great readjustments in commencing each eon have been popularly degraded from preparations for future eons to visitations of vengeance for past misdeeds.

PUNISHMENT

Before I examined the vocabulary of the Scriptures scientifically, I was under the impression that it was full of the idea expressed by punish or punishment. I certainly was biased in favor of it. But, now that I look for it among the list of English words used to make the Concordant version, I find only three occurrences in the whole book. Not once is it needed in the Hebrew. There is plenty of judging, correcting, etc., but not punishing. In the Greek it is used twice of Saul of Tarsus' treatment of those he persecuted (Acts 22:5; 26:11). Here it fits well, for, as Aristotle says of the Greek word, it is penal, and indicates the satisfaction of the one who inflicts it. Only those who believed on Christ were punished by Saul, not those who rejected Him! In Hebrews 10:29 punishment is only a supposition concerning the unworthiness of those who trample under foot the Son of God. God gets no satisfaction out of the suffering of His creatures, but visits evil on all, even on Christ and Paul, for their own good and for the benefit of others.

THE DELUGE AND THE RESTORATION

Both the deluge and the restoration (Acts.3:21), which precedes the kingdom of Christ, are readjustments, preparing for the impending eon. Far too much emphasis has been laid on the idea that they both are the punishment for the conduct of mankind during the previous eon. The mere fact that they fall upon comparatively few of the antediluvians and of those in this eon (for most have died before they are inflicted), should show that they can reach only a minute minority of the great mass who have sinned in the foregoing eon. Billions who have lived in this eon have already died, and will not suffer the impending inflictions. All of these, who are not believers, will be judged at the great white throne, not during the readjustment for the succeeding eon. In this these catastrophes are alike. They are preparatory, not personal or penal.

DELUGE READJUSTMENT

As all flesh was ruining its way on the earth (Gen.6:12), and mankind was to be given a new start in the impending eon under a different form of subjection, and only Noah, who was just by faith, had found grace, with his family, all the rest of the race was drowned in the deluge. In this way the race itself survived, and was given a new start.

Physically, this present eon was to be an era of failure by disintegration (Heb. bl). So it was commenced with a major example of it, for the word deluge (m bul) has this meaning, and Babel (b bl), which tore mankind apart, was also of this nature. Even soil on which no moisture had fallen before, is now being eroded by the rain. Mankind was held together before the flood, by having one succession of rulers, the firstborn succession of Adam. Now they are split apart, into many nations, by a motly mass of rulers, in order to make man's rule a failure.

RESTORATION

In contrast to this, many will be saved through the impending indignation. We know of 144,000 especially. The fact that a third of mankind will be slain by the sixth messenger (Rev.9:15,18) leaves the impression that many will go through the indignation, not only in Israel, but also among the other nations, to form the nucleus of the kingdom of the Son of humanity over the whole race.

Physically, the changes will be beneficial, as a rule. The great earthquakes (Rev.8:5; 11:13), especially that one which jars every mountain and island out of its place (Rev.6:14), may be used to change the earth itself back to its normal and original place, and bring back the climate, and restore the year back to its normal and original length of three hundred and sixty days.

GOD IN PHYSICAL SPHERE

In the physical sphere God alone acts to prepare and adjust the elements for each eon. No human would presume to have had any hand in these great transactions. We have learned how to predict the weather, to a limited extent, but who would even dare to turn back a tornado, or stop a cyclone? All we have done along this line has been to darken the atmosphere with smoke or infest it with deadly fumes. A single major earthquake calls for more power than the combined might of all mankind. Now that we have learned to harness the atom, our main purpose, apparently, is to destroy one another with it.

The counterpart of God's physical operations will be found in each eon. The offensive sin of Adam channelled chaos into the spiritual world. In this mankind lived before the flood. There was spiritual darkness, thirst, and hunger, which overwhelmed them all in death, even before the deluge. Yet they lived much longer than we do today. In the counterpart of that eon, long life will be restored, and, the Second Adam will reverse the downward course introduced by the first. So we see that God's great plan is essentially a reversal.

VIBRATION THE ACTION OF SPIRIT

The fact that the vibration of the spirit introduces the whole account of the readjustment, and that no other action is needed to account for the results, seems to show clearly that all further change is due to this activity of the spirit. As not only light, but water and air and land are essential for life on earth, and the spirit is called the spirit of life (John 6:63; Rev.11:11), the forms of life that follow, the vegetation, the souls in the water, in the atmosphere, and on the land, including humanity, are all due to this primal pulsation of spirit. This seems to give some validity to a basic theory of science, that light and life are the expression of periodic vibration. This is not modern, but was taught long before the coming of Christ, and may have been based upon this divine revelation. The different forms that the same material can take, as ice, water, steam, should help us to see its possibilities.

LIGHT

One thing seems well established, both by God's Word and His works; that light is udulatory energy. First of all, it enables us to see. But it can also be transformed into warmth and work. It raises enormous amounts of water in the form of vapor, which, falling back upon the earth, and running down as streams, may be harnessed to produce electricity, and reappear as light, to shine in the darkness, even as at the beginning. To the spiritual observer the daily change from darkness to light repeats before his wondering gaze the first grand achievement of the vibrating spirit in the preparation of the earth as the stage on which the tragedy of the eons is being enacted.

But the light spoken of in Genesis did not come from the sun, for the celestial luminaries could not be seen without an atmosphere, and were not listed until the fourth day. Strange to say, men used to ridicule this, although they themselves were able to light up the night to some extent. In the far future they will have no need for the sun nor the moon, for the glory of God will illuminate the holy city, new Jerusalem (Rev.21:22-23). And night will be no more, and they have no need for lamp light and sunlight, seeing that the Lord God will be illuminating them (Rev.22:5).

DISRUPTION INDEFINITE

The phrases "from the" and "before the disruption" are printed with a lightface "the" in the present CV, to show that there is no article "the" in the Original. But few seem to note this fact or take heed to its message. The disruption here indicated is world disruption in general, a condition, a fact, not any special act, but necessarily beginning with the first of the series. It embraces physical as well as spiritual disruption, the so-called "fall " of Adam as well as making the earth a chaos and vacant, briefly, before, or from the operation of evil in the earth or in humanity. If a particular world had been intended it would have been named and preceded by the article the. We may change the CV to "world disruption" in the future.

CREATED AND DISRUPTED

Just as Adam was created quite perfect in his way, but became a sinner, so the earth also had been created fit for habitation, but became a chaos and vacant. In both cases there was a "disruption of the world," and this phrase may well refer to either or preferably to both, for both together commence an interval in which God, by means of both material and spiritual disruption, reveals Himself as Saviour and Lover, preparing for the revelation of His power when He will create them anew. Each one of us will go through this process also, both physically and spiritually, and, at present, is in a condition akin to the "disruption of the world." This should help us to grasp the force of this expression.

THE WORLD

Only one "world" or SYSTEM could have existed when Cain slew Abel. As this term usually refers to the order or arrangement of human society, it goes back to the subjection of Adam under the Elohim, the Subjectors, and his descendants. It was this miniature world which was disrupted when Adam sinned, transgressed and offended God. The slaying of Abel by Cain was the most flagrant and atrocious result of that disruption, the first time that human blood was shed by a fellow human. If the world had not been disrupted, Cain would not have slain his brother.

BEFORE AND FROM

Before any disruption God loved His Son (John 17:24) and foreknew Him as the flawless and unspotted Lamb (1 Peter 1:20), and chose us in Him (Eph.1:4). This shows that sacrifice was in God's heart even before sin was introduced. But it was not till Adam's sin, or from a disruption, that His Kingdom was made ready (Matt.25:34), blood was shed (Luke 11:50), the works occurred (Heb.4:3). Then the suffering of Christ was due (Heb.9:26), and, in a sense, He was the Lambkin slain as soon as sin entered (Rev. 13:8). The names of all in the scroll of life were entered in that far distant past, so the disruption did not affect their fate (Rev.17:8).

SIN'S DISRUPTION AND REPUDIATION

The effects of the initial disruption could only be met by sacrifice (Heb.9:26). So Abel sacrificed a sin-offering. But Cain refused to do this, and brought a bloodless offering of fruit, which God could not accept, as it failed to recognize the curse of death. It is only at the conclusions of the eons, and of the worlds, that the sacrifice of Christ will have its full effect. Then sin will be repudiated as an instrument of divine revelation, so there will be no more disruptions after the consummation. By means of these disruptions, countered by the sacrifice of Christ, God will draw all mankind into the embrace of His paternal love.

THE HOLY SPIRIT OF GOD

Question: "The Concordant Version's rendering 'holy spirit' (instead of, 'Holy Spirit') seems strange to me. When I try to show my friends how accurate and helpful the Concordant Version is, they are stumbled by the rendering 'holy spirit,' instead of 'the Holy Spirit,' by which phrase they understand 'the third Person of the Holy Trinity.' In any case, why do you use a small 'h' and 's' instead of a capital 'H' and 'S,' especially since you use a capital 'H' on 'He,' 'His,' and 'Him' where these pronouns are used in reference to God or to Christ? Also, what is the difference between 'holy spirit' and 'the holy spirit,' in those instances in which the Greek definite article (as indicated by 'the') is included in the Original? And finally, in texts in which the definite article does not appear, is it correct to say 'a holy spirit' instead of simply 'holy spirit'"?

Answer: I sympathize with you on the problem of the lower case "holy spirit" in the CV, which is an attempt to be neutral in translation. In the Explanatory Information section of the CONCORDANT LITERAL NEW TESTAMENT WITH KEYWORD CONCORDANCE (p.620), it is stated that, "[in nearly all cases,] it is left to the reader to decide for himself which aspect of SPIRIT is in view in a given occurrence . . . . It was decided to keep personal concepts out of the controversy by not capitalizing the word spirit in its various occurrences. This should not be taken as a symptom of irreverence toward GOD'S HOLY SPIRIT but rather as a sign of human incompetence to deal with the problem in a satisfactory manner, without injecting personal opinion, and thus detracting from the laud of His glory." Perhaps a "better" solution (though probably impractical in a version) would be to set this phrase in small caps, as "HOLY SPIRIT," as I sometimes have done in expositions, at least in the midst of exegesis.

Through fallacious thinking (e.g., certain false assumptions as to idiom), it is sometimes possible to misuse the fact of the presence of the definite article ("the"). As a rule, however, noting its presence can be quite helpful. One important point is that "the" can always be converted either to "this" (near demonstrative pronoun) or "that" (far demonstrative) without changing the sense, though often with the result of the clarification of the sense. This helpful practice of noting that "'the' [actually] equals 'this,'" cannot change the sense of any text; but, besides affording clarification, it will often manifest the invalid nature of popular reasoning such as that founded on the common expression "the gospel," from which it is concluded that "there is only one gospel," when sane logic on this very point will preclude such a conclusion.

Where the definite article is not present, however, it does not follow that the (English) indefinite article ("a") is necessarily to be understood. That depends upon the nature of the case. For example, take the case of "HOLY SPIRIT." Unless, in some instance, the particular usage entails a reference to a specific, discrete "HOLY SPIRIT," we should simply say, "HOLY SPIRIT" (instead of either "the HOLY SPIRIT," or "a HOLY SPIRIT"). But where, again, in the nature of the case, it is evident that a discrete entity is in view, then we not only may but should employ the indefinite article (e.g., "a day of salvation; 2 Cor.6:2). If, in such instances, we were to use no article at all, (1) we would fail to indicate the fact that a discrete entity is in view; and (2) we would violate the dictates of good English. Conversely, if, in such cases, we should employ the definite article, those who falsely imagine that its import is "the one and only [such entity]," instead of, its true sense, "[this or that] [such entity]," would be given grist for their mill.

Hence, in answer to your question concerning instances in which the definite article is not included in the Original, while in such cases it would not necessarily be mistaken to say "a HOLY SPIRIT," it would only be correct to do so in instances in which it was evident that a discrete HOLY SPIRIT was in view. In most usages of Greek nouns in cases where they appear without the definite article, however, a discrete entity is in view, and, therefore, in English, the indefinite article "a" should be employed (as in 2 Cor.6:2). This is because, while, in Greek, the idea conveyed by the English "a" is understood (not expressed), in English, according to custom, it must be expressed.

In trying to help your friends who are hindered by tradition, point out to them that holy means "consecrated" (or "devoted"), and spirit means "imperceptible power." Hence, "HOLY SPIRIT" means "consecrated imperceptible power." Now, "[imperceptible] power" is a thing, not a person. Hence, if, in any certain passages (such as Acts 13:2), personal qualities should be ascribed to HOLY SPIRIT, it follows that such usages are not literal, but figurative. They are the figure termed Personification, by which personal qualities are ascribed to non-personal entities, even as in the case of Law, Sin, Death, Righteousness, Grace, and so forth.

In some usages of HOLY SPIRIT, a compound figure is involved, by which (as in Acts 13:2) not only is the usage a matter of Personification, but of Metonymy; that is, of the association of the personified entity with an actual being, namely, God Himself. It is also helpful to note that wherever we read of "HOLY SPIRIT," or of "the HOLY SPIRIT," this is a contraction (hence, the figure of Omission, or Ellipsis) of "HOLY SPIRIT [e.g., which is of God]," or "the HOLY SPIRIT [of God]" (cp Eph.4:30).

These are all objective facts that must be intelligently grasped. They should be wholeheartedly embraced and applied by all, prior to any judgments as to interpretation. Indeed, apart from such knowledge, legitimate hermeneutics is impossible.

One should also become acquainted with what orthodox Trinitarianism actually affirms,[1] noting especially that—be its exponents ever so zealous in their claim that "Jesus is the second Person of the Trinity"—Trinitarianism's own interpretation of the sense in which this proposition is to be understood, entails it also being so that Jesus is only God in a sense that is incompatible with the proposition that He is literally and absolutely (hence, identificationally) God.[2]

Many of our friends seem unable to concentrate sufficiently to grasp such particulars, or else are disinclined to do so. Yet those outside are usually far too prejudiced against our teaching to give it a fair hearing; and unless given special grace, will not thank us for proving their beliefs to be false. This makes it impossible for them to grasp what we are actually saying. Most would have us simplify things more than we can or should. They want our explanations to be sufficiently simple that they themselves need not gain any new proficiencies, nor otherwise put themselves to much inconvenience.

It is all too human simply to "get on a bandwagon," thus avoiding the labor of adequate study. One bandwagon, in

1. cf Unsearchable Riches, "The Doctrine of the Triune God," vol.22, pp.167-192.

2. cf Unsearchable Riches, "One God and One Lord," vol.85, pp.215-224; cp "One God and One Lord," part two, vol.85, pp.251-263; "Yahweh is the Only Elohim," vol.86, pp.10-18; and "The Only True God," vol.86, pp.63-74.

acceptance of Trinitarianism, is promoted by appeals to human authority and tradition, and especially by the bias-inducing claim that one's acceptance of the tenets of Trinitarianism is essential to salvation (however unthoughtfully those tenets may be embraced). The other bandwagon, in rejection of Trinitarianism, often finds its appeal among those lacking sufficient interest in accuracy and fairness, and is often promoted through misrepresentation, mockery, and the destruction of straw men (in its "disproofs" of Trinitarianism). Of course if we would be faithful, we must avoid the latter wagon as surely as the former.

In light of such needs, then, for progress toward maturity, may we "not cease praying," for one another and for all, "requesting that [we] may be filled full with the realization of [God's] will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, [us] to walk worthily of the Lord for all pleasing, bearing fruit in every good work, and growing in the realization of God" (Col.1:9). SPIRIT

Spirit is the invisible, intangible power of action, life, and intelligence. It is an intelligent principle of action (Luke 9:55; 2 Cor.12:18), as the spirit of meekness (1 Cor.4:21), of prophecy (Rev.19:10), of faith (2 Cor.4:13), of sonship (Rom.8: 15), of power and love and sanity (2 Tim.1:7), of slavery (Rom. 8:15), of stupor (Rom.11:8), and of the world (1 Cor.2:12). It is used of the life principle common to animals (Ecc.3:21), and mankind (Gen.6:17). It is also applied to metaphysical beings (2 Chr.18:20) without flesh or bones (Luke 24:39), which are usually unclean or evil (1 Tim.4:1), as well as demons (Luke 4:33) and messengers (Rev.4:5).

Its highest use denotes the divine power as manifested in His invisible, intangible operations (John 4:24), the Spirit of God, that holy Spirit (Matt.1:18; John 3:8; Acts 13:2) which comes on men for power (Acts 1:8), baptizes for cleansing (Acts 1:5) and unifying (1 Cor.12:13), filling for utterance (Acts 2:4; Eph.5: 18), sealing for safety (Eph.1:13), and homing (1 Cor.3:16) for permanent fellowship. THE MYTH OF "FREE WILL"

We all need to see to our "responsibilities," thus fulfilling our duties. By practicing proper "role responsibility," we learn to live "responsibly," which is to say dutifully and uprightly. It is important for us to realize that we are "responsible" for our actions, in the sense of being answerable for them or subject to their consequences. This is simply to say, we are accountable, or subject to judgment, for our deeds.

Accordingly, we must realize that the so-called "fatalistic" notion is false (even as absurd) which affirms that since the particulars of our future course are fixed, therefore we might just as well be careless as careful, while making no more attempt to pursue a life of virtue and industry than of sin and sloth.

Furthermore, we must remember that we act voluntarily, according to our own choices, apart from compulsion (i.e., force, contrary to our own will). Good results require good actions; and good actions require good decisions, according to self-discipline. Therefore, in the words of the Psalmist, let us "withdraw from evil and do good" (Psa.34:14a; 37:27a).

For discipline in righteousness, these are the things we need to know, and be reminded of, even as teach to our children; not prideful notions of "free will" which preclude our being able to thank God alone for our virtues while trusting in His wise and good design concerning all.

It by no means follows from the reality and importance of role responsibility that what is actually contended for by those who advocate "free will," therefore exists. We do well to recognize this simply because it is true; yet especially because of the deleterious consequences of believing in free will.

Free will, in fact, is an untenable position. Either events occur due to that which causes them to occur, or events occur due to nothing at all. If what happens is caused to happen, it cannot be prevented from happening. And, if what happens is not caused to happen, neither can it be prevented from happening. In the former example, the event is the effect of its cause; in the latter example, the event is not an effect, and it has no cause.

But one has no more ultimate control over that which simply occurs, due to nothing at all, than over that which is made to occur, as the effect of a cause. In the former case, determinism is affirmed; in the latter case, indeterminism is affirmed. But in either case, ultimate control is precluded.

Ultimate control is sometimes technically termed "categorical could-have-done-otherwiseness." The common name for categorical could-have-done-otherwiseness, is "free will."[1]

The above considerations prove that whether determinism, indeterminism, or some combination of the two constitutes the true account of human affairs, in any case, the notion of ultimate control (i.e., free will or moral responsibility) is necessarily mistaken.

Whether or not God determines "whatsoever comes to pass" (as affirmed in the illustrious Westminster Confession), is not the issue insofar as the question of whether or not free will obtains is concerned. The point is that free will is impossible—whether determinism is true or false. Consequently, under any possible scenario, free will is false, and, whether God determines all events, some events, or no events.

1. Free will, in turn, is sometimes termed "moral responsibility." This is a most confusing expression; for indeed, as explained above, there is an uncontested sense in which our wills are free as well as our actions of a moral nature, we ourselves being "responsible for" our actions. No such considerations, however, constitute any proof whatsoever that, ultimately speaking, under the conditions that obtained, our past actions could have been different than they were.

The fact that mainstream "freewill responsibility" not only is not true but cannot possibly be true, may be cogently argued as follows:

> If determinism is true, then all events, including any person's decisions and actions, are fully determined by circumstances which are ultimately beyond that person's control. If this is so, then that person could not have decided or acted differently. Hence, the person was not free [in the usual freewill sense].
>
> If determinism is false, then there are at least some events which are not fully determined by antecedent circumstances. To the extent that human decisions and actions are among those events which are not fully determined, those decisions and actions occur by pure chance [i.e., due to nothing]. But what occurs by pure chance is not within a person's control. Therefore, to the extent that decision and action are not determined, the person is unfree.
>
> But determinism is either true or false. Hence a person is never free with respect to decisions, actions, or the results of actions.
>
> But a person is morally responsible for an action or occurrence only if he is free in that respect.
>
> Therefore, no one is ever morally responsible for any decision, action, or outcome.[2]

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF TRUTH[3]

All the details of the life of every person, exist among that class of statements which happen to be true. This is so whether or not we know them to be true, and, whether or not any certain of their particulars concern the past or future. Anything that is true concerning the future, as much so as anything that is true concerning the past, is timelessly true today.

This is so simply on the basis that there is such a thing as truth, and that this has nothing at all to do with the passage of time. Though truth often concerns events which once were not, which later come to be and later still cease to be, the truth itself concerning these events never becomes true, nor ceases to be true; it simply is true.

Now that which is true concerning any particular event entails the certainty of that event. This is because that which is true cannot possibly be untrue; for then it may be untrue, which is contradictory to the fact that it is true. Similarly, the certainty of an event entails its inevitability. This is because that which is certain cannot possibly be uncertain; for then it may be uncertain, which is contradictory to the fact that it is certain.

Whether any individual event should be a past event or a future event is beside the point. Therefore, the events of the future are as inevitable as the events of the past.

It is important to realize that every meaningful statement, regardless of subject, is either true or else it is false. There is no middle ground. This principle thus is appropriately called the law of the excluded middle. It has nothing to do with what tense the statement happens to express, nor with the question whether anyone, man or God, happens to know whether it is true or false.

In principle, it is vouchsafed by the apostle Paul in his instruction concerning supervisors in the ecclesia, that they are to "uphold the faithful word according to the teaching, that [they] may be able to entreat with sound teaching as well as to expose those who contradict" (Titus 1:9).

No such ministry would be possible apart from one's acknowledgement and consistent application of this first principle of sound thinking, "the law of the excluded middle." It is only on a basis of this principle that we are able to judge whether one proposition contradicts another or not. Nothing could be more foolish, then, than the false piety of repudiating the very rudiments of sanity and soundmindedness through their dismissal as being but "vain philosophy." As was declared unto Peter, "What God cleanses, do not you count contaminating!" (cp Acts 10:15b).

THE WISDOM AND KNOWLEDGE OF GOD

Let us remember that God knows all; which is to say that He is omniscient. "If our heart should be censuring us, God is greater than our heart, and He knows all" (1 John 3:20). That is, God knows everything that is true; which includes the knowledge concerning every false statement that it is false, as surely as the knowledge concerning every true statement that it is true.

He therefore knows not only the day and hour of your birth, but He knows, as you surely do not, the date of your death, even the exact moment and the circumstances thereof. Accordingly, then, He knows whether an ant walked across my desk last night, and if so what ant it was, how long it remained, and so forth. This is because He knows every truth about this insect that there is. Similarly, of course He knows when some ant will again appear on my desk, if ever. He knows the number of hairs on my head, notes the fall of every sparrow, knows why it fell and why it was going to fall. This is because God knows, concerning any statement whatever that anyone could formulate, that it is true, in case it is, and otherwise, that it is false. That which His prophets proclaim, is simply that minute portion of the sum of His knowledge which He is pleased to communicate to men.

Consider the further example that it is true that President Kennedy was murdered. This means that it was true that he was going to be murdered: that the future would include that very event. That is, if the statement made now, that President Kennedy has been murdered, is a true one, then, most assuredly, the prediction made before the event, that he was going to be murdered, was true as well. The two statements have exactly the same content, and are in fact the same statement, except for variation in tense.

It is correct as well to say that the murder of President Kennedy was inevitable. This is because no man is able to avoid what is truly described, nor bring about what is falsely described. No one can make false that which is true, any more than make true that which is false.

The true answer to the question, then, "Will President Kennedy ever be murdered?" should such a question have been asked (as it undoubtedly was asked by many) prior to that fateful day of November 22, 1963, would have been, "Yes, he will be murdered; that is the only possible thing that can happen."

Of course it is true that if better precautions had been taken, then President Kennedy would not have been murdered. But then it is true as well that since they were not taken, neither were they going to be taken.

THE POWER OF TRUTH

It bears repeating that either a statement is true or else it is false. Hence a statement concerning the occurrence of a future event is either true or else it is false. Therefore, since statements concerning the occurrence of future events are either true or else they are false, it is incorrect to say that statements concerning future events are neither true nor false.

All that has happened and all that will happen, is a part of whatever is true. Therefore, it is incorrect to say that truth concerning some future events does not yet exist. This is because whatever will happen is that concerning which it is now already true that it will happen.

Since the truth concerning all that will happen already exists, it follows concerning any certain past event that, before it happened, it was already true that it was going to happen. Hence if I should eat an apple tomorrow, it was already true today that I would eat an apple tomorrow, even as that, on the morrow, I could not not eat an apple. These principles are as true concerning all events and all persons, as they are concerning some events and some persons. Whether the subject at hand is myself and my eating of an apple tomorrow, Satan and his mobilization of the nations for battle at the end of the thousand years, or God Himself and His swift response thereunto in sending fire out of heaven to devour them (Rev. 20:7-9)—whatever will happen is that concerning which it is now already true that it will happen; and, already true that it will inevitably happen.

It is neither the pastness nor the futurity of an event that proves an event's existence inevitable; it is rather the existence of the truth concerning it that proves its existence inevitable. Whatever has already happened, cannot avoid its past existence; and, whatever will yet happen, cannot avoid its future existence. This is because all the details, past or future, of the life of every person, are incorporated within the compass of that which is true. Therefore, whatever is true concerning the future is no more avoidable than whatever is true concerning the past.

Every argument against the teaching that future occurrences are as unavoidable as past occurrences, is based upon the assumption that we are free to realize various alternative future possibilities—the very thing that is at issue.

Sound logic and conclusive evidence can only bring conviction to those who are open to conviction and capable of being convinced. In His own time, such logic and evidence is indeed "powerful to God toward the pulling down of bulwarks; pulling down reckonings and every height elevating itself against the knowledge of God, and leading into captivity every apprehension into the obedience of Christ" (2 Cor.10:4,5). But before such a time and apart from the special illuminating grace attending thereunto, sound logic and conclusive evidence are powerless indeed in the face of an opinion nourished by invincible pride. It has well been said that most men would sooner lose their souls than be divested of that dignity which they imagine rests upon their freedom of will.

VESSELS IN THE POTTER'S HANDS

It needs to be realized even in the case of, humanly speaking, unintentional deaths by accident, that such events occur according to divine appointment. In Israel of old, if a man smote another inadvertently, that is, apart from "malicious intent," still, it was to be understood that "the One, Elohim, He had fated him into his hand" (Ex.21:12,13).

Similarly, Samson, contrary to the revealed will of God through the law of Moses, sought to take a Philistine woman as his wife. His parents attempted to dissuade him from his sin, but Samson would only say, "'Get her for me: for she pleases me well.' But his father and mother did not know that it was of Yahweh [that this occurred], for He sought an occasion against the Philistines" (Judges 14:3,4). In violating the revealed (or preceptive) will of God, Samson thus fulfilled the decretive will (or hidden intention) of God.

Samson was a vessel in the Potter's hands; he was decidedly not a "free moral agent" (in the usual "freewill" sense of this expression). Yet, just as surely, he was liable for his actions, subject to their consequences.

It is not at all, as some will claim, that such principles "do not make any sense": they make perfect sense. It is merely that men do not approve of them, and, unwittingly, honor the ethics of the world and the defilements of their own conscience above the Word of God.

Since God is love, even as good and wise in the highest possible degree, He always does what is best. And, God knows which course of historical events, considered not only on the whole but in view of their every detail, would have the greatest tendency toward the ultimate good. He has therefore made the eons (cp Heb.1:2) in such a way that the eonian times should comprise those very events, and no others, which, with respect to His purpose, He deems best. Indeed, He would sin—which He cannot do, for He cannot deny Himself—were He to arrange the course of history in any way but the best way; or fail to arrange it at all, in some respects, thus leaving it to chance that some events might well occur that would not be best, in respect of His purpose.

Since, within the eonian times, to accord with His purpose, God knows that, among men, it is best that there should be "vessels" both of indignation as well as of mercy (Rom.9:21), even as, within the ecclesia, that there should be "utensils" both of honor and dishonor (2 Tim.2:20,21), it is of Him that there are vessels both of indignation and of mercy, even as utensils both of honor and dishonor. In light of these august considerations, we wish only to reply, "to Him be the glory!"

To those who wish to scoff or complain in light of the fact that God still "blames" (i.e., charges with wrongdoing and holds accountable) men for their sins when they have therein fulfilled His intention, we would merely reply with Paul: "O man! who are you, to be sure, who are answering again to God? That which is molded will not protest to the molder, 'Why do you make me thus?' Or has not the potter the right over the clay, out of the same kneading to make one vessel, indeed, for honor, yet one for dishonor? Now if God, wanting to display His indignation and to make His powerful doings known, carries, with much patience, the vessels of indignation, adapted for destruction, it is that He should also be making known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, which He makes ready before for glory—us, whom He calls also, not only out of the Jews, but out of the nations also" (Rom.9:20-24; cp 9:19).

REJECTION AND COMPROMISE

Let us note well that the events of the future are inevitable—period; not, regardless of what we do. It does not follow from the inevitability of future events, that any certain events are inevitable "no matter what." Future events do not come about in spite of what we do, but because of what we do, even as because of other occurrences which affect us, in addition to our own deeds. Therefore, diligence, duty, and discipline, are as important to those who reject free will as they are to those who accept it.

We need not fear the consequences of our unequivocal rejection of "free will" so long as we maintain such a stance not in isolation but in close connection with a strong emphasis upon the indispensability of self-discipline—albeit a self-discipline which is the fruit of divine grace. All that one will "lose" by the rejection of free will is a strong incentive to pride and anger. Only those who take pleasure in these sins, will regret to see the primary agency which fosters them meet its justly-deserved demise.

The teaching of God's deity in itself is of a wholly salutary nature; any foolish misuse thereof may not be charged against it. The man who believes the truth that all is of God—who also loves and pursues righteousness, who is contrite and ashamed when he sins, while longing for and seeking self-reform—should not be faulted for believing that his sin was inevitable. His sin was inevitable, in the counsels of God, and will yet redound to His glory. The man who believes and speaks thus is not making an "excuse," but is rather giving an account. He is not excused from the consequences of his actions, but he is "excused" from having "misused his free will," for he does not have a free will.

We must remember that free will is nearly universally accepted as not only true but as essential both to morality and justice. Since this is so, and yet men are not in ultimate control of their decisions, it should not surprise us that most are unable to transcend their own ethics and prejudices—not to mention emotions and confusion of mind—concerning this theme. Indeed, it is only in the grace of God that any are able to do so.

Nearly all reject the proposition that free will is false, even when confronted with the issues which so easily decide the question. Yet a few, ones who to some extent may perceive the force of the argument against free will, while not overtly rejecting the proposition that such a belief is false, resourcefully still find one way or another to excuse themselves from accepting it.

May we not be startled by such rejection of truth. It must be realized that neither this present writing nor any other will have any widespread impact upon popular error: for it is written that "the era will be when they will not tolerate sound teaching, but, their hearing being tickled, they will heap up for themselves teachers in accord with their own desires, and, indeed, they will be turning their hearing away from the truth, yet will be turned aside to myths" (2 Tim.4:3,4).

TRUTH IS BENEFICIAL

Some who acknowledge that free will is false, nonetheless, whether at work or in the home, commonly speak and comport themselves as if it were true. Most such ones, if not oblivious to or at least uncaring concerning this inconsistency, will appraise it as being, at most, only a minor deficiency. This is so, even though so much of their self-pride, even as impatience and anger toward others, is the direct result of their practical acceptance of free will. It is not that they occasionally lapse into such inconsistencies (as do we all), but that such an outlook constitutes their habitual way of life.

A few have even said that, "for our own good, we need to think, and practically believe, in such a way so as to hold ourselves responsible [in a conventional "freewill" sense] for our own behavior."

That, however, is the equivalent of saying that, "for our own good, we need to think, and practically believe, in such a way so as to hold ourselves to be that which we do not actually hold ourselves to be"; that, for our own good, we need to hold to that which we know to be false.

How we wish that such ones might have as great a zeal for the repudiation of what is false, as they claim to have fear of the misuse of what is true! Obviously, if we would be faithful, we must not misuse the truth; but we must first of all freely accept the truth while living according to its principles; otherwise faithfulness is impossible. Let us never imagine that what we need, "for our own good," is a healthy dose of sheer falsehood.

The man who does not believe in free will, certainly has uncommon insight. But the individual who does not merely disbelieve the myth of free will, but positively believes the glorious truth that all is out of, through, and for God, and, to His glory (Rom.11:36), has been given a rare gift indeed. Perhaps only one condition among men is even rarer still, and that is for one who does indeed believe that all is out of, through, and for God, substantially to apply his belief both to his own practical affairs and to those of the world around him, doing so in a truly beneficial way.

Yet no such positive and constructive course can even be undertaken, until one takes the preliminary step of recognizing that, in any event, free will does not exist.

In anticipation of blessed days to come in which all our brethren will gladly join us in proclaiming, "out of Him and through Him and for Him is all: to Him be the glory for the eons! Amen!" (Rom.11:36), may those of us who acclaim Him thus even today, be speaking the truth in love, with all humility and meekness. J.R.C.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

EDITORIAL

In our lead article for this issue, "Reign, Resurrection and Revelation" (pp.147, 148) Dean Hough writes, "It is God's evangel of light concerning His Son, Who shall reign until all disorder is removed, and death itself is abolished, that enlightens us as we listen to it submissively."

"These three evils, sin, death and increasing ignorance of God, continue to plague humanity; they lie at the root of human afflictions and sorrows, insecurities and fears. Yet God has given us His evangel, which is light (cf 2 Cor.4:6), in which He is revealed as the God of righteousness, power, wisdom and love" (p.148).

These considerations are followed by this issue's banner article, the classic work, "The Kingdom in the 'Old Testament'" (pp.149-168) by Vladimir Gelesnoff. "The great need for clarity on this elementary theme is evident on all sides, and grows as the apostasy proceeds apace. Hence I take this opportunity of commending it to all who wish to aid their fellow saints to gain an insight into God's grand purpose through the nation of His choice and their Messiah, Christ Jesus our Lord" (A. E. Knoch, vol.29, pp.210).

In "True Spirituality" (pp.169-176), I point out that "Above all, to be spiritual, we must be motivated and characterized by love, even if we should often fail therein. Love's greatest goal is to promote the welfare of the beloved, even if the beloved, in his own indiscernment and suspicions, may sometimes doubt love's presence or question love's motives."

My brief article "A Word in Due Season" (pp.177,178) in introductory form, addresses the question "When and how should truth be shared?" I address this same question more fully and specifically in the writing that follows, "Wisdom Are We Speaking Among the Mature" (pp.179-185):

"Concerning the infirm, in our interpersonal relationships with other believers, Paul would have us be taking such ones to ourselves, 'but not for discrimination of reasonings' (ibid). That is, we are not to do so in such a way that leads 'into,' results in, or otherwise draws to the fore, differences of opinion. The apostle would have us know that these faulty discriminations (as to what is true and what is not) themselves are the fruit of the misuse of the ratiocinative process, and that such mistaken deductions can only be expected from those who are infirm in the faith" (p.181).

"It is infinitely better to follow well than to lead poorly. Certainly, we should not seek to lead in a range (cp 2 Cor. 10:13-16) where we have not been invited to serve, lest our labors become more of an interference than a constructive service. The first principle of doing a good job, is knowing whether we are in a position to do a good job. We must not, in any event and no matter how sincerely, merely try to "get in the act" (pp.184,185).

The final article in this issue is, "The Kingdom of God and the Kingdom of the Heavens" (pp.186-191) by A. E. Knoch. "There is a perennial interest in the question, What is the difference between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of the heavens? In many instances there seems to be no distinction at all" (p.186).

"The two kingdoms . . . contain much in common and are often equivalents. But they always keep their own coloring and one phrase can never be used where God in His excellent wisdom has been pleased to place the other.

"The kingdom of God is very seldom mentioned in the epistles, stress being laid upon its character. It is never, however, spoken of as a present reality upon the earth . . . (p.189)." J.R.C.

REIGN, RESURRECTION AND REVELATION

In Romans 1:3,4, our apostle points us to two fundamental and essential glories of Christ which form a vital part of God's evangel concerning His Son. He is the One (1.)Who comes of David's seed according to the flesh, and (2,)Who is designated God's Son with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the dead one's resurrection.

These glories are inserted parenthetically between the words "God's Son" and His identification as "Jesus Christ, our Lord." However, because they appear as an aside does not mean they are disconnected with the evangel. Indeed what is said briefly and parenthetically here is developed in great detail in 1 Corinthians 15:12-57 in connection with the evangel as it is announced as a message of powerful grace in 1 Corinthians 15:1-11. The death and resurrection of Christ (1 Cor.15:3,4) is the basis for Christ's future reign and His work of resurrecting the dead, even (in God's own time) the vivification of all in Him. (And these themes are developed much further in Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians in connection with the secret of Christ.) Nevertheless, in Romans Paul hastens ahead to focus on a third glory resulting from the death and resurrection of God's Son. And that is the revelation of God's righteousness (Rom.1:17; 3:21-26). For there will be no reigning of Christ and no resurrection of the dead apart from the righteousness of God.

The pattern followed here was first set in the opening chapters of Genesis. There God's creation of the heavens and the earth is followed by the earth becoming a chaos and vacant, enveloped by darkness (Gen.1:1,2a). This is reversed by the vibrating of God's spirit in association with God's words, bringing forth order where there had been chaos, and life where there had been vacancy, enveloped in light where there had been darkness (Gen.1:2b-31).

Yet once again, following this "very good" achievement, chaos enters into the world in the form of sin, and vacancy enters in the form of death (cf Rom.5:12). These, in turn, are enveloped by the darkness of removal from the special relationship with God which Adam and Eve enjoyed in the garden.

These three evils, sin, death and increasing ignorance of God, continue to plague humanity; they lie at the root of human afflictions and sorrows, insecurities and fears. Yet God has given us His evangel, which is light (cf 2 Cor.4:6), in which He is revealed as the God of righteousness, power, wisdom and love.

The light of Genesis 1:3 due to God's vibrating spirit operating in His word was the begining of a process in which the chaos and vacancy and darkness of Genesis 1:2a was reversed. Light must come first and cover the chaotic abyss, so that the orderly separation of light from darkness. and waters above from waters below, and atmosphere from the waters, and the waters from the dry ground, could occur. And then came life with the orderly rule of luminaries, culminating in the making of humanity in the image and likeness of God (Elohim) for holding sway over the lower life forms and filling and subduing the earth.

It is God's evangel of light concerning His Son, Who shall reign until all disorder is removed, and death itself is abolished, that enlightens us as we listen to it submissively. But neither the reign of Christ or the vivification of all in Him are the highest results of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is the light of the revelation of God of which His evangel speaks that completes the glory to come. D.H.H.

THE KINGDOM IN THE "OLD TESTAMENT"

THE QUESTION, What is the kingdom of heaven? is of perennial interest. The bewildering diversity of answers has been the subject of anxious inquiry. We have endeavored to answer that question from Scripture, and now place our findings before truth seekers.

It is a canon of exegesis to interpret any phrase or word in the Scriptures by its presence in other parts of the Bible. Adhering to that principle, we find that the phrase "the kingdom of the heavens" is founded on Daniel 2:44 as well as 7:27.[1] An examination of that basic passage in the light of the immediate context and the prophecy as a whole establishes the following facts:

1. The kingdom of the heavens is a kingdom in the sense in which the empires represented by the parts of the great image were kingdoms.

2. It is limited to the earth, embracing the kingdoms under the whole heaven.

3. It is the kingdom of a people.

4. It is a future kingdom.

And now, to clearly comprehend the subject, we must

1. "In their days, that is, of these kings, the Eloah of the heavens will set up a kingdom that for the eons shall not come to harm. His kingdom shall not be left to another people. It will pulverize and terminate all these kingdoms, and it shall be confirmed for the eons" (Dan.2:44); "And the kingdom and the jurisdiction and the majesty of the kingdom under the entire heavens will be granted to the people of the saints of the supremacies. Their kingdom is an eonian kingdom, and all other authorities shall serve and hearken to them" (Dan.7:27).

scan the progressive unfolding of the kingdom idea in the Hebrew Scriptures. In fewest words we deal with the subject.

To begin with, we must concede that the Bible is not merely a book of moral and religious principles in mystical language, but a consistent, systematic disclosure of an explicit purpose which has been in operation since the dawn of time. To grasp that purpose it is requisite to admit that God's ways are admirably adjusted to the physical and moral condition of mortal man, and that His revelation is suited to his mental calibre. Israel's history affords convincing proof of this. When Yahweh descended on Mount Sinai with burning fire and murkiness, the tornado, the blare of the trumpet and the voice of declarations, the sons of Israel trembled at the majesty of the theophany. They cried to Moses: "Speak you with us that we may hear; yet Elohim must not speak with us lest we die" (Ex.20:19; cp Heb.12:19). In effect their argument comes to this: The brightness of the fire is too dazzling for our eyes: the roaring tempestuous trumpet overtaxes our hearing. Let God speak to us through you. We can behold your form, we can hear your voice: but this awful sight and deafening sound we are incapable of bearing.

In fine, they expressed the desire to see the Deity in man's guise, and hear Him speak with a man's voice. God graciously acceded to their request. He said to Moses: "They have done well in all that they have spoken. A Prophet shall I raise up to them from among their brothers, like you, and I will put My words in His mouth, and He will speak to them all that I shall instruct Him" (Deut.18:17,18). Accommodation to Israel's level was complete. Such perfect adaptation, coinciding with their wish in every respect, involved, in the very nature of the case, grave accountability. Hence the solemn warning of verse 19: "Yet it will come to be that the man who should not hearken to My words that the Prophet shall speak in My name, I Myself shall require his blood from him." In accordance with this promise, when the fullness of the time came, the only begotten Son put on the garments of flesh.

As the infinite God has declared Himself through His Son's assuming "the likeness of sin's flesh," so He has conveyed His thoughts in the language of sinful men: He has clothed them in the very words in which mortals interchange ideas; He has used them with the significance which inheres in them in the tongue employed. Ordinarily we speak plainly: so does He. Occasionally we employ figures and emblems, parables and illustrations: so does He. Because an orator chances to use a figure or an illustration to make his point more vivid and impressive, do we, in perusing his oration, change the meaning of the words as alchemy does, or would, the substance of metals? Assuredly not. If, then, God has spoken to us "as man speaks with man," it is clear that we must treat His word in the same way in which we do other literary productions—consider the words in their fundamental and unquestioned usage, and not think of proposing arbitrary or speculative senses for them.

To alter the meaning visible in the words by permutative spiritualization is to make the Bible the convenient material for every kind of "private interpretation," as the confusing variety of opinions on the subject of the kingdom manifestly proves. Men have imagined that God could not have a kingdom in the ordinary sense of the word, and in order to reduce the material to a relation with that preconceived notion, it has been necessary to interpret it in a manner which, it must be admitted, invests it with the qualities of a riddle rather than those of a formal communication.

The first chapter of Colossians views the beloved Son in the effulgent glory of creation and reconciliation. Past and future are vitally related to the Firstborn from the dead. First is the creation of all things in Him (Col.1:16). This is the starting point: it looks to a dateless past. Next comes the reconciliation of all through Him (verse 20). This is the goal: it points to a distant future. We observe that, in both creation and reconciliation, two spheres appear—the heavens and the earth. These two spheres must not be fused, and what pertains to the one must be rigidly excluded from what pertains to the other.

If creation and reconciliation embrace two spheres, earth and heaven, His purpose must necessarily bear this twofold stamp, and as enunciated in Scripture, it appears to do so.

The burden of God's purpose on its terrestrial side is a kingdom. Its focus is a nation—Israel. Its keynote, dominion. The end in view, the restoration of the earth. Israel is an instrument for rule. Through their medium God will establish His government in the earth, shepherd the other nations, and administer the affairs of this nether sphere. The burden of God's purpose on its celestial side is revelation. Its focus is the church which is His body. Its keynote, grace. The end in view, the restoration of the heavens. The Church, both now and hereafter, is a medium for display. Through that spiritual corporation God will exhibit the transcendent wealth of His grace throughout the oncoming eons (Eph.2:7). Hence the astounding statement, almost staggering in its immensity, "we became a theater to the world and to messengers and to men" (1 Cor.4:9).

Leaving for the present the consideration of that side of God's purpose which concerns the heavens, we proceed to trace the development of the kingdom idea, confining ourselves to the Hebrew Scriptures, and resolutely adhering to the sound principle of taking each word at its face value. We shall show that, in the totality of its features, such an interpretation will justify itself by the general cogency of its results.

Lexicons define a "kingdom" as "a territory, people, state, or realm, ruled by a king . . . [a] monarchy" (Funk and Wagnalls Standard College Dictionary). A potentate, a metropolis, a territory, a people, a system of administration and dependencies—these are the ideas which the word suggests; and it is reasonable to suppose that, in adopting it, Scripture intends to convey no other ideas than those ordinarily implied. The assumption thus advanced may easily be tested. But at what point shall our investigation begin?

When the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of His glory, He declares to the nations on His right, "Hither, blessed of My Father! Enjoy the allotment of the kingdom made ready for you from the disruption of the world" (Matt. 25:34). Here we learn that (1) the Father has prepared a Kingdom, and (2) that He has prepared it from the world's disruption. This sends us to the opening page of the Bible.

Genesis 1:1 asserts the creation of the heavens and the earth in the beginning. And it is unnecessary to say that they came forth from the hand of God in utmost perfection and beauty. We have an express statement to the effect that they were not created "waste and void," as they afterward became (Isa.45:18). Genesis 1:2 describes the chaos—the result of disruption. The following verses (3-25) relate the rehabilitation of the ruins. When the earth was made fit for habitation, Adam appears upon the scene, and the Creator delivers to him the following charge: "Be fruitful and increase and fill the earth, and subdue it. And sway over the fish of the sea, and over the flyer of the heavens, and over the beast, and over all the earth, and over all life moving on the land." (Gen.1:28).

Moreover, God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden "to serve it and to keep it" (Gen.2:15). The words "serve"[2] and "keep" suggest, respectively, cultivation and supervision. The task assigned is development of natural resources and their administration, as well as dispensing the products of the soil to the creatures under him, along the lines indicated by the Creator (Gen.1:29). On the surface, we have here something concrete to which each subsequent declaration sustains a relation.

Adam's defection threw the vast machinery of the universe out of gear. It is important to note, however, that though his apostasy changed God's method of dealing, it did not alter His purpose; for, three millennia afterwards, David, in poetic language, muses in wonderment over the truth revealed to our progenitor in Eden: that a man is given authority to rule for God (Psa.8).

Of the earliest age we have only the scantiest outline. The events of nearly two millennia are condensed within the compass of two chapters (Gen.4:1-6:8). Yet, notwithstanding its brevity, this fragment unveils a criminal career of unmatched activity and extraordinary character. Here is murder and blasphemous assumption of deity: violence and abuse of the sexual relation; talent and inventive genius employed in the service of lust; cities sodden in sensuality and reeking in crime. Wickedness assumed such grave character and gigantic proportions that the total destruction of the race—except eight souls which had not participated in the prevailing forms of wickedness—was the only effective remedy.

After the deluge, the charge to multiply and fill the earth, formerly given to Adam, is renewed to Noah and his three sons. The original idea of dominion is confirmed. The corrupt practices of the antediluvians, however, introduced new elements of disorder in the relations of man to nature and the animals. These new conditions are met. "The fear of you and dismay due to you shall come on every living animal of the earth, even on every flyer of the heavens, and in all which is moving on the ground, and in all the fishes of the sea. Into your hand are they given. Every moving animal which is living is coming to be food for you. As the green herbage, I give to you all. Yea, only flesh with its soul, its blood, you shall not eat" (Gen.9:2-4).

2. The Hebrew word for "serve" ("dress," AV) is the same rendered "to till" in Genesis 2:6; 3:23; 4:12. Adam was a tiller of the ground before the fall, not in consequence thereof. Indeed, he was contemplated for that occupation from the outset (Gen.2:5). The only difference before and after the fall lay in this: whereas before, the ground responded generously to his efforts afterwards it yielded scanty returns.

But there is another point. From the experience of the antecedent age emerged another problem. With the exception of marriage, there had been no defined relations and responsibilities. Each man was a law unto himself. There was nothing to safeguard life from lawless encroachments. The extent to which violence had prevailed pleaded for a restraint of some sort. And this is precisely what God proceeds to do. "Yea, and your blood for your souls I will require. From the hand of every living animal will I require it, and from the hand of humanity. From the hand of a man's brother I will require the soul of a human. The shedder of the blood of a human, by a human his blood shall be shed, for in the image of the Elohim has He made humanity" (Gen.9:5,6). The progenitors of the race are invested with authority requisite for the enactment and maintenance of these obligations.

Though there is no categorical statement bearing on the point, the implication that Noah's sons were to establish in their respective lines government on the basis of responsibility between man and man, is required by the trend of the narrative as a whole. From them mankind branches off in three streams, subdivided into lesser divisions, nations, families (Gen.10:5,20,31,32), each with a specific vocation and definite destiny in view, as will be presently shown. The division of mankind into nations was of divine appointment (Gen.10:25; Deut.32:8; Acts 17:26), with the evident intention of founding a supervisory system that would insure effectual enforcement of the principles entrusted to Noah's sons. Moreover, we are informed (Deut.32:8) that, in dividing Adam's sons into nations, the bounds of their habitation were assigned with a view to Israel as a ruling nation, with centralized authority.

This system of administration, in its broad features, is outlined in Noah's prophecy (Gen.9:25-27). Supremacy, political and religious, belongs to Shem. He monopolizes blessing. The tent of God is in his midst. The Deity is known as "the God of Shem." The Japhetic peoples, enlarged by a policy of expansion due to conquest and colonization, surround that center. Subordinate to both are the Hamitic nations. We are not required to understand the "servitude" of this passage in the sense of slavery; it implies no more than subjection; they do not enjoy political autonomy. The occasion to divulge the position and function of a ruling people in a more detailed manner was furnished by the nations attempting to gather around a center of their own on the plains of Shinar (Gen.11:1-9). God upset their scheme, and, by confounding their speech, consolidated the national boundaries, which thereafter became philological as well as geographical. This brings us quite naturally to the next stage.

In the very land where a centralization diametrically opposed to His purpose had been attempted, God appears to a descendant of Shem—Abraham—and speaks as follows: "You go from your land and from your kindred and from your father's house to the land which I shall show you. I will make you into a great nation, and I will bless you and make your name great, and you must become a blessing. I will bless those who bless you, and those making light of you I will curse. Blessed in you and in your seed are all the families of the ground" (Gen.12:1-3). So, we see, the early intimation of a great nation is assuming definite shape. The initial announcement shows its greatness to consist in the enjoyment of blessing in a measure and to a degree not shared by others, and in the further fact of its being a medium of blessing to all the families of the ground.

Upon Abraham's return from Egypt, after his separation from Lot, Yahweh said to him, "Lift your eyes, pray, and see. From the place where you now are, northward and toward the south-rim and eastward and seaward, for all the land which you are seeing, I am giving it to you, and to your seed, till the eon" (Gen.13:14,15). Henceforth, a land is inseparably associated with that nation. Later on, its boundaries are determined and its possession for an inalienable inheritance is pledged to Abraham's posterity by an immutable, unconditional covenant—a covenant in which God assumes all obligations, Abraham being a mere spectator to the transaction—sealed with God's oath (Gen. 15:12-21; cp Heb.6:13-18).

Anterior to this covenant, Abraham was promised an heir and posterity numerous as the sand of the sea. Striking is the strange incompatibility of His counsels with the agents chosen to carry them out. He said He would make a great nation—of whom? A man as good as dead—that is, whose virility was destroyed by senile decay—and a barren woman, past the age of child-bearing. Again, He said: "In Isaac shall your seed be called." But he, too, had a barren wife. "Isaac is entreating Yahweh for the invigorating of Rebecca, his wife, for she is barren. And Yahweh is being entreated by him, and Rebecca, his wife, is pregnant" (Gen.25:21). Also, in the cases of Jacob's wives, we read, "God opened her womb" (Gen.29:31; 30:22).

God is the Fulfiller as well as Giver of the promise; and His method of procedure makes it evident all along that their realization is not "by natural course," but by directive—is it too much to say creative?—acts on His part. The increase in Egypt under conditions where other nations have either perished or lost their identity; the exodus; the passage through the wilderness; the events in the land—in a word, every phase of Hebrew history justifies the saying of the Psalmist, "He has not done so for any other nation" (Psa.147:20), and affirms them to be a people of His own making.

We are now to consider a departure fraught with disastrous consequences to Israel. They reach Sinai. Moses ascends to the One, Elohim. Then Yahweh calls to him from the mountain, saying: "Thus shall you say to the house of Jacob and tell to the sons of Israel, You have seen what I did to the Egyptians when I bore you on vultures' wings and brought you to Myself. Now, if you shall hearken, yea hearken to My voice and observe My covenant then you will become Mine, a special possession, above all the peoples, for Mine is all the earth. As for you, you shall become Mine, a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Ex.19:3-6a).

God bids them take a retrospect of His wondrous doings. As a vulture soaring high in the air scorns every impediment which obstructs a pedestrian's course, so had God carried them through the dangers of the desert. Recall the facts. He led them dryshod across the sea; sweetened the waters of Marah; gave them bread from heaven and water from the rock; He satisfied their hunger and assuaged their thirst. How different their part had been! They had *under*estimated His power. "Can He provide a table in the wilderness?" They had doubted His presence. "Is the Lord in our midst?" And now, in the face of such experiences, they *over*estimate their own strength. "Whatsoever the Lord has spoken we will do." Alas! they had not learned the lessons which one of their illustrious sons learned so thoroughly in a later day, "I am aware that good is not making its home in me (that is, in my flesh), for to will is lying beside me, yet to be effecting the ideal is not" (Rom.7:18); it is only, "For all am I strong in Him Who is invigorating me—Christ!" (Phil.4:13).

They are about to enter the land. Thus far they are not hedged by restrictions. Every step of the way has developed a tendency to resist God's appointments; yet they express confidence in their ability to conform to His requirements without even knowing what is expected of them. Entrance into the land under such circumstances means a certain recrudescence of the scene at Babel. Goodness has been outraged, so they are placed under a stern, inflexible schoolmaster—the law—to learn the exceeding sinfulness of sin. A covenant conditioned by obedience on their part, is entered into. "And no more will the feet of Israel wander from the ground which I gave to their fathers, should they hearken to do according to all which I instruct them, and to all the law they were instructed in by My servant Moses" (2 Kings 21:8).

On the other hand, if they will not hearken to the voice of Yahweh their Elohim, to observe and to do all His instructions and His statutes, then "Yahweh shall lift up against you a nation from afar, from the end of the earth, just as the vulture swoops down, a nation whose tongue you have not heard, a nation strong of face who neither lifts the face of the old one with partiality nor is gracious to the youth" (Deut.28:15,49,50).

The Sinaitic covenant was a temporary expedient to restrain inevitable outbreaks of sin. Imposed unto a period of reformation (Heb.9:10), it could not invalidate the Abrahamic covenant ratified beforehand (Gal.3:17). On entering the land the nation solemnly assumes its duties. Heaven and earth are summoned as witnesses. Six tribes stationed on Mount Gerizim pronounce the blessings; six tribes pronounce the curses from Mount Ebal. As the Levites read the curses, the people respond "Amen" (Deut. 27:15-26; Josh.8:30-35).

Their career in the land was a mournful record of law-breaking and apostasy. King, priest, and people, "did that which was evil in the sight of Yahweh." So, true to the terms of the covenant, "He causes to go up against them the king of the Chaldeans, and he slays their chosen ones by the sword in the house of their sanctuary, and has no pity on young man and virgin, old man and very aged—the whole He has given into his hand . . . And he deports those left of the sword unto Babylon" (2 Chron.36:17,20). But at the moment when the nation is being removed because of its unworthiness, the promise of God is announced (Jer.31:31-34):

"Behold the days are coming, averring is Yahweh, when I contract with the house of Israel,
And with the house of Judah, a new covenant.
Not as the covenant which I contracted with their forefathers,
In the day I held fast their hand to bring them forth from the land of Egypt,
Which covenant of Mine they annulled,
And I loathed them, averring is Yahweh.
For this is the covenant which I will contract,
With the house of Israel after those days, averring is Yahweh.
I will bestow My law within them,
And I will write it on their hearts,
I will become theirs for Elohim,
And they shall become Mine for a people.
And no longer shall they teach, each man his associate,
And each man his brother, saying, 'Know Yahweh,'
For all of them shall know Me,
From their smallest unto their greatest, averring is Yahweh,
For I will pardon their depravity,
And I will remember their sin no further."

The first covenant had failed owing to their mortal corruption: so, by a new covenant, God pledges Himself, without any obligation on their part, not only to pardon their sins and reinstate them as a nation in their land, but also to regenerate them so as to make further defection impossible.

The next stage in the unfolding of the purpose is the choice of a King. Like the preceding, this item, too, is made public in consequence of failure on man's part. The anarchy under the judges and the venality of Samuel's sons led Israel to demand a king. Let it be understood, there was no sin in asking for a king. God intended that Israel should have one. Jacob looks forward to the time when the Prince of Peace shall arise out of Judah with the sceptre (Gen.49:10), and Balaam beholds His star from afar (Num.24:17).

The mistake lay in asking for a king like unto the nations. Samuel makes it clear that such monarchic rule means tyranny. Under Saul they tasted it to the full. At length, after much disciplinary trial, David, the first king of Israel "according to God's own heart," i.e., His definite choice for the throne, is crowned. He desired to build a house for Yahweh. This he was not allowed to do, but on that occasion God made with him an eonian covenant, "arranged in all things and observed" (2 Sam.23:5) to raise him a "seed," the throne of whose kingdom will be "established for the eon" (2 Sam.7:11-17). Along with this promise goes the choice of Jerusalem for a metropolis. The kingdom idea is thus completed.

To clearly understand subsequent developments, we must bear in mind, that, while this covenant is unconditional, and therefore irrevocable (Psa.89:28-37), God reserves the right to inflict such remedial punishment as the delinquency of David's successors may necessitate.

The books of the Kings and the Chronicles detail the history of the Davidic dynasty. Their tale supports the censure of the Son of Sirach:[3] "Except David and Hezekiah and Josiah, all committed trespass: the kings of Judah failed" (Ecclus.49:4). We have observed that David's descendants would be chastised for iniquity "with the club of mortals, and with the contagion of the sons of men" (2 Sam.7:14); in other words, through calamities inflicted by men. A long series of such disciplinary measures failed to produce adequate salutary effects (1 Kings 11:11,12; 2 Chron.12:2; 16:9; 21:10,16; 24:24; 28:5,6,9; 33:11). Therefore He delivered them into the hands of the Chaldeans. But at the time when Zedekiah is deposed and carried to Babylon in fetters, the inviolability of the promise is solemnly reiterated (Ezek.21:25-27):

"And you, violated, wicked prince of Israel,
Whose day comes in the era of depravity's end,
Thus says my Lord Yahweh:
Take away the turban, and heave off the crown.
This shall not remain thus.
The low elevate, and the lofty abase.
Depraved, depraved, depraved will I constitute it.
Moreover, this shall not come to be again till He comes Whose is the judgment,
And I will give it to Him."

This great declaration molds and governs the outlook of exilic and post-exilic prophecy. The crown being removed

3. i.e., the censure of the author of the book of this title, known today as Ecclesiasticus (from the Vulgate). This work is one of the earliest of the deuterocanonical/apocryphal books. It would appear that the original title, according to the afterword in the Hebrew text, was "Wisdom . . . of the Son of Sirach." It is a notable example of the Hebrew "Hokmah- [i.e., 'Wisdom'] literature." Modeled in great part on Proverbs, it concerns itself with ethical maxims and folk-sayings, expressions of praise and lament, besides observations about Jewish life and religious mores in the second century B.C.

from David's house until the Rightful One comes, it looks forward to His advent (Jer.23:5,6):

"Behold! Days are coming, averring is Yahweh,
When I will raise for David a righteous Sprout,
And a King shall reign and use intelligence,
And He will execute judgment and justice in the land.
In His days Judah shall be saved,
And Israel shall tabernacle trustingly,
And this is His name, by which they shall call Him:
Yahweh, our Righteousness."

The kingdom of Judah was reduced to a province of the Babylonian empire. But no sooner are the Jews and the temple vessels brought to Babylon, than Nebuchadnezzar is divinely instructed of the future mapped out for the people he has deported. He fell asleep, absorbed by the question, What shall come to pass hereafter? That night's dream was a complete answer to the thought which had preoccupied his mind: "The great Eloah makes known to the king what shall occur after this" (Dan.2:29-45). A succession of empires are to lord over the Holy Land, but at an appointed time the kingdom shall be restored to Israel.

The decree of Cyrus permitted the Jews to return and rebuild the temple at Jerusalem. A small remnant returned under Nehemiah and Zerubbabel. In the reign of Darius the new temple was finished (Ezra 6:15). Conditions, however, were different from what they had been. Nation, king, and priest had experienced failure through sin and were alike under judgment. The second temple had no coffer ("ark," AV). Without a propitiatory shelter ("mercy-seat," AV), the annual cleansing of the nation from sin was no longer possible. What standing had the people? is the question emerging from the failure of the Aaronic priesthood. The Book of Zechariah has this situation in view.

On the face of things, the vision in Zechariah, third chapter, deals with the removal of the iniquity of the priesthood and the land (verses 4 and 9). It was the second year of Darius (1:7). The Lord has returned to Jerusalem with compassion; the work of the house is allowed to proceed (Zech.1:16; Ezra 4:24). The prophet sees Joshua standing before the messenger of Yahweh in filthy garments. Using his uncleanness as a point of attack, Satan seeks to stave off the prosperity promised to Jerusalem, once more chosen by Yahweh (Zech.3:2; cp 1:13,17). Satan is rebuked. The messenger commands those before him (before Joshua—the priests and Levites) to take off from him the filthy garments, while saying to him, "I cause your depravity to pass off you" (verse 4). Then Joshua is arrayed in rich apparel, and the messenger gives assurance that he and the Levites (that stand before him) will be given charge over the courts of the house (verse 7). But what of expiation? As the vision fades, there comes a voice (verses 8 and 9):

"Hear, pray, Joshua, the great priest, you and your associates who are sitting before you, for they are mortals of a miracle, for behold Me bringing My servant, the Sprout. For behold the stone which I bestow before Joshua; on one stone are seven facets. Behold Me engraving its graving (averring is Yahweh of hosts), and I remove all the depravity of that land in one day."

The stone reminds us of the two stones which were engraven with the names of the sons of Israel and put on the shoulders of the high priest. To signify the removal of all division or difference between the tribes or between them and Yahweh, here we have only one stone. This stone has seven "eyes" or "sparkles," or facets, for seven indicates satisfaction, as this is its meaning in Hebrew. Moreover, men had engraved the stones which Aaron wore, but now Yahweh Himself will engrave their names, so that they will ever be before Him, and His power will preserve them in His presence. So will it be within the house, where Joshua, the great priest, officiates. As a consequence, Yahweh Himself will also remove the depravity of the whole land. The single gem with seven facets engraven with His own hands within the temple will find its external fulfillment in unity, satisfaction, and holiness throughout the land. Only thus will they be able to enjoy sitting under their vine and fig tree; joyful worship and righteous government (Zech.3:6-10).

Then will He "cleanse the sons of Levi, and cupel them as gold and as silver. And they shall come to be for Yahweh, bringing close the approach present in righteousness. Then the approach present of Judah and Jerusalem is congenial to Yahweh, as in the days of the eon, and as in former years" (Mal.3:3,4).

The relations between priesthood and royalty form the theme of chapter 6. Retribution for the heathen which scattered Judah and Jerusalem has been repeatedly affirmed (Zech.1:15, 18-21; 2:9). Now, at length, the prophet beholds its enactment. Four chariots drawn by horses of different colors come out from between two mountains of copper. Three chariots go out, to the north and south (chapter 6, verses 1-6). The fourth is detailed to patrol Israel's land (verse 7). In the opening vision of the series (1:7-11), the angelic horsemen were sent on a tour of inspection and returned with the report "all the earth is sitting still, and is quiet." Now they go forth from the divine presence to rest His spirit, which is to say, to execute His vengeance (cp Isa.48:14; Ezek.5:13).

The intention of the last scene (Zech.6:9-15) is obvious: it supplements Ezekiel's words at the time of the exile with regard to the passing away of the crown from Judah until He comes Whose right it is. Was the crown to be restored now that the seventy years had elapsed? What follows supplies the answer. The prophet is instructed to take silver and gold from the returned captives and make a crown. The announcement follows (Zech.6:12,13):

"Behold the Man! Sprout is His name.
And from under Him shall it sprout.
And He shall build the temple of Yahweh,

Even He shall build the temple of Yahweh, and He shall bear the splendor.
He shall sit and rule on His throne,
And there comes to be a priest at His throne,
And the counsel of welfare shall come to be between the two of them."

The announcement over, the prophet is directed to deposit the crown in the temple as a memorial to keep alive the hope of Israel. Zechariah extends the exilic predictions of the Coming One in one important particular: The Branch will unite the royal and the priestly with beneficial results—"the counsel of welfare shall come to be between the two of them."

The promise of a personage who combines the royal and the priestly, not through blood descent, but by divine appointment, recalls two instances where a priest-king appears to confer blessing after Israel's enemies have been reduced to subjection.

Abraham the Hebrew, returning from the slaughter of the kings, was met and blessed by Melchizedek, king of Salem, priest of God Most High (Heb.7:1).

Psalm 110 commemorates the making of Jerusalem the seat of government after the discomfiture of Jebus. The story is told in 2 Samuel 5-8. David proceeded to make it the center of religious life. Gathering "all the chosen men of Israel," he took up the Coffer of God. In the course of these proceedings, though a king, he performed priestly functions: "Girded with a linen ephod . . . . David offered burnt offerings and peace offerings before Yahweh" (2 Sam.6: 14,17; 1 Cor.15:27; 16:37, AV). This was a realization of the language of the psalm: "You are a priest for the eon, according to the order of Melchizedek" (Psa.110:4).

In other ways, besides the offering of sacrifice, the king played a priestly part. We read of Melchizedek that he "brings forth bread and wine" and "blessed" the patriarch (Gen.14:18,19). So also it was with David: "He blessed the people in the name of Yahweh of hosts. And he apportioned to all one perforated wafer, and of broiled beef, and a portion of wine, and a cake of raisins" (2 Sam.6:18,19). In this particular also, the King of Israel walked in the footsteps of Melchizedek.

Malachi draws a dark picture of the remnant in the land. The symptoms of decay appearing at the time of the return have developed into full-blown apostasy. At the fore is a corrupt priesthood, sodden in formalism, steeped in self-righteousness, and an indifferent people bringing polluted offerings to God's altar. In the background, far away in the darkness of heathendom, Yahweh's name is great among the nations, and incense and a pure offering are offered unto Him (Mal.1:11). The foreview is the same as in Zechariah (Mal.3:1):

"Behold Me sending My messenger, and he surfaces the way before Me. And suddenly, the Lord Whom you are seeking is coming to His temple, and the Messenger of the covenant, in Whom you are delighting. Behold! He comes! says Yahweh of hosts."

Were it not for the traditional ideas imbibed from youth, we would never have imported anything entirely new into Matthew's gospel. It continues the story where Malachi left it. The same temple, the same indifferent priesthood, the same corrupt people, the same outside nations bringing a pure oblation. The only difference is: Malachi says of the messenger, "I send him"; of the Lord, "Behold! He comes!" But in Matthew the messenger has come, the Lord is present.

To recapitulate: Taking the word "kingdom" in its ordinary usage, we have traversed the Old Testament and found a doctrine in no sense mysterious or recondite in character. Beginning with the general idea of dominion, the disclosure moves steadily onward, terminating with a king.

Let us retrace the steps. Adam is invested with authority to rule for God and to exercise dominion in the earth. To Noah and his three sons the general idea of dominion is confirmed. In their days mankind is divided into nations, and government established on the principle of mutual obligations between man and man. At the time of Abraham another factor appears—a great nation with the promise of a land and a seed. In the reign of David three items are added: a city, a throne, a king.

After Malachi no prophet's voice was heard in Israel for three centuries. Decade after decade wore wearily away, bringing no relief to the favored nation. Dismayed by the delay, many abandoned the hope of a Messianic kingdom as an idle dream. Holy men and women suffered all the pangs of hope deferred. At length, the time of visitation dawned. Before ever that day arrived, however, and while as yet the sinful nation persisted in departing from God, John the Baptist, greatest of women-born, had monitions of coming glory, and he has told us (John 1:33) of mysterious messages that came to him respecting the Coming One. He was grieving over the sin of his nation, then in imminent danger—"already the ax is lying at the root of the trees. Every tree, then, which is not producing ideal fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire"—when, in response to the tidings that reached his ears from the far-off regions of glory, he lifted up his voice in the desert, and the point and substance of his message was—"The kingdom of the heavens has drawn near!"

CORRECTLY CUTTING THE WORD OF TRUTH

The apostle Paul's entreaty to Timothy about "correctly cutting the word of truth" (2 Tim.2:15), is surely ideal counsel.

Elaborating on this principle, Miles Coverdale, in 1535, wrote: "It shall greatly helpe ye to understande Scripture, if thou mark, not only words, at what time, where, to what intent, with what circumstances, considering what goeth before, and what followeth."

TRUE SPIRITUALITY

For is any of humanity acquainted with those things which are human except by the spirit of humanity which is in it? Thus also, those things which are of God no one knows, except by the spirit of God. Now we obtain, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that we may perceive those things which are graciously given to us by God, which we are speaking also, not with words taught by human wisdom, but with those taught by the spirit, matching spiritual blessings with spiritual words. Now the soulish human is not receiving those things which are of the spirit of God, for they are stupidity to him, and he is not able to know them, seeing that they are spiritually examined. Now he who is spiritual is indeed examining all, yet he is being examined by no one. For who knows the mind of the Lord? Who will be redirecting Him? Yet we have the mind of Christ. (1 Cor.2:11-16)

Literally, we are "matching spirituals—spirituals"; that is, matching "that which is spiritual with those who are spiritual" (CV, 1966 edition); and, "matching spiritual blessings with spiritual words" (CV, 1976 edition). Not only is the soulish man, who does not have the spirit of God (cp Jude 19), unable to receive those things which are of God's spirit (1 Cor.2:14), but "minors in Christ" as well, since they are still fleshly, cannot be spoken to as spiritual, for they are only able for milk, not solid food (1 Cor.3:1,2).

Nevertheless, the time comes, as it did for the Corinthians, when it is then expedient at least to present more mature considerations before those who cannot yet fully grasp them, that they might somewhat come under their influence even so, and be nourished thereby accordingly.

To be sure, some, indeed many, will continue to resist the very help that they need. For example, many may well fail to see the importance of the subject of this present writing, and so will make little attempt to hear and heed our message. After all, at present, we are not dealing with any single biblical doctrine, as such, in the usual sense, but are "only" considering the underlying principles of understanding vital to them all!

Yet the faultfinder will declare, and perhaps not only to himself: "Where is the love in such writing! Indeed, where is love in the life of such a one who insists on speaking thus! Since other good authors, ones which I far prefer, write in a different tone and manner, how can such a tone and manner as this be either needed or worthy? Since I deem the love of God attenuated at best in any such exposition, surely such exposition is woefully inadequate!"

Yet others, appreciating not being talked down to, while recognizing the indispensability of sound principles in the acquisition of truth, may benefit much by being pointed in the right direction. Perhaps in the process, they may become suspicious as well that we may not be so deficient in love after all, as they formerly had supposed.

But whatever the individual reactions of various believers may be to such efforts, how we rejoice to know that even those who at present may yet be spiritually supine, nevertheless one day "will be made to stand, for the Lord is able to make [them] stand" (Rom.14:4). Hence we would speak of all such ones with respect and fraternity, apart from scorn or spirit of condescension.

A SPIRIT OF SANITY

There is much confusion among believers concerning the nature of the spiritual, even as of the intellectual. Many disparage the intellectual, or at least minimize its importance. Many imply that it is as well somehow unloving to stress the intellectual, suggesting that we can hardly do so while remaining spiritual ourselves. Some would identify the pursuit of truth with lifeless "head knowledge," never realizing that one's quest for truth instead might well be from the heart, out of a love of God and a longing to be faithful and well pleasing to Him.

In our society today, there is much antipathy toward the intellectual. Accordingly, there is also much resistance to learning. Specifically, there is much resistance, as adults, to learning that which we did not learn as children or in our youth. So long as we remain intractable, intransigent in our disinclination toward further learning, such a disposition will prove impervious to the communication of knowledge. We resent being told that we "have to think," and are prepared to justify whatever claim can most convincingly excuse us from this obligation.

It is often supposed that the spiritual largely obviates the intellectual. In some cases, the irrational is maintained on the grounds that, in any case, it is "spiritual," whether rational or not. There is often little concern whether the convincingly spiritual is also the actually sane. Even among those of normal demeanor, ones who are by no means given over to the sensational or the abjectly superstitious, most fail to see the importance of language skills, critical thinking, and logical discipline.

Even those who are zealous Bible students, commonly seem to imagine that there are no special disciplines essential to competency that must be mastered; at least none beyond those in which they suppose themselves already to enjoy a sufficiency. Be they ever so naïve and unaware, so long as they are sincere, studious, knowledgeable in their way, while being willing to glean whatever seems right to them from various helps, they are confident that they can "know the Bible" quite as well if not better than the next fellow.

Such believers seem to be little aware that it is not so much "study" that is needed, but a special spiritual gift of discernment in the hearing of the Word. Yet they seem even less aware that this gift is not operative apart from a vital connection to certain intellectual abilities, ones that are indispensable and that cannot be circumvented.

It may well be that such ones do not need us, or even our counsel as such; but they are simply deluded in failing to realize that, in any case, they do need—and need to gain—both the gift and agency of which we speak.

I would distinguish here between one's own possession of such abilities, and one's capacity to recognize such abilities in others, ones within the ecclesia who are more able to help us than others. It is not at all that we ourselves must have such skill and competency, but that we must, in any case, be able to recognize and value such proficiencies, wherever they may be found, that we might avail ourselves of them.

It is by no means so that every believer must possess great astuteness, transcendent perspicacity, and extraordinary acumen. But it is instead, if we would understand truth, that we do need to have the ability to grasp simple and sound, decisive points of teaching, while possessing the objectivity and willingness to act upon them, in order that we might follow truth wherever it may lead. Hence, we must pray for a spirit of wisdom and revelation (Eph.1:17), which necessarily incorporates a corresponding spirit of discernment and intellectual capacity. Unless God should grant us this further spiritual endowment, we can only reject the proffered help of those who could help us most, while embracing instead the well-intentioned but misguided efforts of those who can only mislead us.

To say that we neither need intellectual abilities ourselves nor the capacity to recognize them in others but can do without them altogether, while gaining a knowledge of truth instead by immediate divine imposition apart from rational means, is itself an irrational claim. To "know," is to perceive with the mind, which entails rational activity and precludes irrational activity.

Except in the trivial sense of merely formally holding a correct position, it is likewise irrational to speak of possessing truth, apart from recognizing truth. Truth is "that which corresponds with the actual facts, in contrast to the false" (KEYWORD CONCORDANCE, p.310). We do not possess truth with our hands or feet, but with our minds. We cannot possess truth apart from rational mental activity. Therefore, besides becoming fond of what is "good . . . just, benign, [and] self-controlled," may we be becoming fond as well of what is "sane" (Titus 1:8).

WALKING ACCORDING TO KNOWLEDGE

If we would know what it means to be "spiritual," we must first define "spirit." "Spirit" (pneuma, BLOW-effect) is "the imperceptible, intangible power of life, action, and intelligence. The divine power as manifested in His invisible, intangible operations" (KEYWORD CONCORDANCE, p.282). We are only truly *spirit*ual, then, to the degree that we know the truth and live according thereunto.

The spiritual is not indicated by the illogical, not to mention the irrational; nor is it reflected by strange "religious" mannerisms or vocalizations, any more than by quarrelsomeness or uncleanness. Nor is the spiritual reflected by contempt for or failure to deal graciously with those who may err in such intellectual or behavioral matters.

The spiritual is instead manifested in a mind that understands the evangel of grace, even as in a walk which has come under the influence of the evangel of grace. As vital as living according to truth surely is—and it is certainly possible to live contrary to what we know—it must be realized that we cannot live according to (i.e., based upon) that which we do not yet know.

Above all, to be spiritual, we must be motivated and characterized by love, even if we should often fail therein. Love's greatest goal is to promote the welfare of the beloved, even if the beloved, in his own indiscernment and suspicions, may sometimes doubt love's presence or question love's motives. Even so, love is patient, and love is kind. Love finds no satisfaction in the shortcomings of others. Love no more exhibits contempt than it creates unrest; love rather manifests pity, in a spirit of humility.

INTELLIGENCE VS. STUPIDITY

As such, it is of no importance whether we express ourselves through the use of technical terms and in an academic manner, or in the most elementary speech and uncultivated way. It is only a question of whether what we say is correct, even as sufficient, whether expressed formally or informally.

Fundamentally erroneous notions concerning education, however, whether sins of commission or omission, ones that are of such a nature as to greatly hinder or even preclude one's growth in truth, must be repudiated before greater progress in truth can be made. These include: (1) anti-intellectual bias; (2) the presumption that non-scholars do not need and may safely ignore scholars; (3) the claim that understanding exists even where its professed possession, when expressed, evinces a profound lack of understanding; (4) ignorance of the fact that it is over-simplification and sheer inaccuracy which are the real dangers, not needless complexity, which constitutes only an unnecessary burden.

The plain person who understands key issues correctly, even though conceived in the simplest of terms, may be far advanced in truth beyond the most erudite scholar who fails to understand key issues correctly. The plain person, however, who understands key issues incorrectly, does not understand truth, and lags far behind the erudite scholar who understands key issues correctly.

Both the ordinary person and the scholar need to be humble believers. Prideful ignorance is no more a virtue than pride of knowledge. And, both the ordinary person and the scholar need to be intelligent believers.

"Intelligence" simply speaks of the ability to learn or understand. In the Scriptures, "stupidity" does not speak of a lack of normal intelligence, in the everyday sense, but of being insipid or dull; of lack of *sens*ibility, in certain respects, in relation to truth.

The "stupid" are in a stupor; they are "stunned," or in a state of stupefaction. "Because, knowing God, not as God do they glorify Him or thank Him, but vain are they made in their reasonings, and darkened is their unintelligent heart. Alleging themselves to be wise, they are made stupid" (Rom.1:21,22).

A "stupid" man, then, lacks discernment; he fails to recognize the truth. He has no taste for it, and so cannot distinguish it from the false. Of course this may only be so in relation to certain subjects, not all subjects. Indeed, the most brilliant of men, whether on the whole or in relation to their field of expertise, may be altogether "stupid" in certain other connections.

In speaking of our need to be "intelligent" believers, we have in mind the ability to learn what is necessary in order to understand vital points. In consideration of aptitude, we refer primarily to wisdom, good sense, and a willingness to learn, whether one's general intelligence quotient, in the conventional sense, should be high or low. Intellectuality, then, thus understood, is not some elitist advantage for the few (much less is it a superiority complex or spirit of aloofness), but is rather the privilege of all who would recognize their need to think with their mind, even as to speak with their tongue.

It is irrational to imagine that we can understand what we have never learned. It is not a question of the form of our education, but of whether we have learned (not merely assented to) what is to be known. Learning is a means of grace; it is the means of grace which God has ordained with a view toward our possession of understanding. If we know anything, it is entirely of God that this is so. Boasting in self is wholly excluded.

Yet since we would love our God and Father, not only with our whole heart and whole soul, but with our whole comprehension (e.g., Matt.22:37) as well, we long to be found faithful, and realize that for this we must first of all learn what is true.

THE KNOWLEDGE OF THE TRUTH

"Stand, then, girded about your loins with truth" (Eph.6:14)! This reminds us of a similar appeal which our Lord Jesus once pronounced during His earthly ministry: If ever you should be remaining in My word, you are truly My disciples, and you will know the truth, and the truth will be making you free (John 8:31,32). Though these words were spoken to believing Jews, the fact still stands today that it is truth alone which can liberate mankind; everyone who harbors delusions is in bondage, and is caught in a net from which truth alone can free him. When Paul exhorts us to pray for all mankind, for kings and all those in a superior station, he does so because God wills that all mankind be saved and come to a realization of the truth (1 Tim.2:1-4).

All saints have a measure of truth. At least they believe that Christ died for their sakes while they were still sinners, even though they may not see that they are justified in His blood, and will be saved from God's indignation (Rom.5:8,9; 1 Thess.1-10; 5:9).

A WORD IN DUE SEASON

Question:

When should we seek to tell others of the salvation of all mankind even as of universal reconciliation? I would like to share these great truths with everyone I know. In fact, I frequently mention these things to others, even though few indeed accept what I say. Eternal punishment is such a dishonor on the name of God, and I want others to know the truth! Recently, someone with whom I had shared the truth, a person who did not accept it or reject it but only cautioned me concerning it, said, "Even if what you say may be true, you should be reserved in making such a claim, since most are more apt to be stumbled than helped by such knowledge." Can you help me with these concerns?

Answer:

Surely not many holding to the salvation of all, even any who may hold it in foolishness and shame, would be apt, on average, to be any more injured through such a misuse of this truth, than by their unblinking acceptance instead of its opposite. I doubt very much that the "sensitive spirits" of those who proved themselves so able to bear the burden of eternal torment with nary a whimper, would have their tender psyches disturbed overmuch by any possible worry that the salvation of all just might be true. The danger we normally face, instead, is that of "fighting" over doctrine (2 Tim.2:24), together with all the sorrows and evils which so frequently attend controversy. Engaging in

"controversy for nothing useful, to the upsetting of those who are hearing" (2 Tim.2:14), is neither good for us nor for our opponents.

The truth that God will one day abolish death and become All in all (1 Cor.15:26,28), even as the related truth, that of God's purpose, through Christ, to reconcile all, whether those on the earth or those in the heavens (Col. 1:20), should not be announced in isolation, apart from either adequate foundation or competent defense. Nor should we, as such, equate this teaching with "the truth," as if to suggest that we are called to be doctrinaires, ones who are overly-occupied if not pre-occupied with this specific "doctrine" itself, as such. Such an unbalanced approach is unseemly, and brings opprobrium upon the very truth for which it seeks to stand.

This is especially so in the case of the immature who need to learn restraint, to whom "God . . . All in all," may mean little more than "no eternal hell—all will be saved." Such "teaching" is often more reactionary against contrary tradition than it is instructive in positive truth. While good intentions are commendable, surely we need to be circumspect and prudent in what we say.

Though what I present above captures my primary thoughts on this question, I would not be understood in the slightest "legalistic" spirit. Such is by no means my intended sense. I realize that none of us can but approach such ideals, and I would not at all wish to "jump on" others where any may seem to go contrary to such advice. I would only help those to whom God gives help through my efforts, wishing all others well in their chosen course.

This question at hand, which I shall concisely express as, "When and how should truth be shared?" is another question which we often receive. The following writing presents various considerations related to this topic.

J.R.C.

WISDOM ARE WE SPEAKING AMONG THE MATURE

WHERE, in reference to his original ministry to the Corinthians, the apostle Paul declares that (during that former period) he decided not to "perceive" anything among them "except Jesus Christ and Him crucified" (1 Cor.2:2), I take him to be indicating that, for a time (cp Acts 18:11), he taught them little else beyond this basic theme, even if he presented many particulars within this revelation. He sought to lead them to the level of progress in faith where it was now evident that they had truly grasped the message of "Christ crucified," for it is this glorious truth alone which forms the basis of all else. The apostle came to them in weakness and in fear, and in much trembling. His appearance was not impressive (cp 2 Cor.5:12; 10:1; Gal.4:14), and neither did he use the sort of methods that the dictates of human wisdom would commend as "effective persuasion techniques."

Where God truly grants faith, such man-made methods are hardly necessary, but are rather an affront; yet where such techniques are employed, though many "converts" may be gained, most of them may not be genuine. Indeed, even any among those whom God truly has called who nonetheless are subjected to such improper influences, are not made the better but the worse, as a result of the usual "Christian tactics," which prevailed even in Paul's day. But that the Corinthians' faith might not be in the "wisdom" of men but in the power of God, the apostle conducted himself in such a way as he herein relates (1 Cor.2:3-5).

By his words, "Yet wisdom are we speaking among the mature" (2:6), I take him to mean just what he says. "Wisdom is too high for the fool" (Prov.24:7); or, "Unattainable to a foolish man are the dictates of wisdom" (Rotherham). Most, indeed, are not truly grounded even in the rudimentary elements of the oracles of God, and so have need, not of "solid food," but of a proper and adequate understanding of "milk"; that is, of the rudiments of Christ, as rehearsed in Hebrews 6:1, 2.

Since this counsel, here, however, is to the Hebrews, whose expectation was the new covenant heralded by the prophets, it may not be that Paul would necessarily have those who receive his evangel fully follow this pattern. Still, we all do well to learn of those basics at some appropriate juncture, and to be led forward toward the gaining of an understanding of in what sense it is that any of these do or do not apply to ourselves, even as in the various respects in which we may benefit through an appreciation of God's counsels for others. My most basic thought, then, from this passage in Hebrews, would simply be that of learning the principle: rudimentary elements (milk), first; advanced teachings (solid food), second.

Yet, alas, like the Hebrews, the situation today among most is one in which even good and moderate teaching is often perceived as "[just so many] words, many and abstruse . . . since you have become dull of hearing" (Heb. 5:11). There are not many who, "because of habit, have faculties exercised for discriminating between the ideal and the evil" (5:14). Indeed, this is so, for most take the true to be false and the false to be true; this is especially so where the false is popular or otherwise persuasive.

The immature and infirm mostly do not recognize their true state. Consequently, they take faithful dispensers to be fraudulent workers, yet fraudulent workers to be faithful dispensers. Humanly speaking, the situation seems (and is) quite hopeless. Yet we must go on, seeking to be faithful ourselves, remembering that God is able to do superexcessively above all that we are requesting or apprehending (Eph.3:20). On certain occasions, we observe Him doing just this, granting enlightenment and sanity to some, together with corresponding assurance and joy.

LOGIC VS. "REASONING"

We must not deprecate or demean others, no matter how deluded we may suppose them to be. Spiritual delusion is no more to be the object of ridicule, than moral weakness or physical malady. Let us truly be walking in love, manifesting pitiful compassions unto all, besides kindness, humility, meekness, patience, bearing with one another and dealing graciously among ourselves, if anyone should be having a complaint against any (Col.3:12-14).

It is not that "correct doctrine" is not important; it is very important. It is simply that the reality is that because of "reasonings" (i.e., both in a pejorative and metonymical sense), there is much infirmity among believers which is the fruit "of reasonings," as reflected in the wide diversity of opinion which prevails (cp Rom.14:1).

Concerning the infirm, in our interpersonal relationships with other believers, Paul would have us be taking such ones to ourselves, "but not for discrimination of reasonings" (ibid). That is, we are not to do so in such a way that leads "into," results in, or otherwise draws to the fore, differences of opinion. The apostle would have us know that these faulty discriminations (as to what is true and what is not) themselves are the fruit of the misuse of the ratiocinative process, and that such mistaken deductions can only be expected from those who are infirm in the faith.

We all must "reason" continually, in the non-pejorative sense; that is, we must ever be logical, deciding according to the facts and the truth entailed thereby. The problem is, though, that most do not know what is truly at issue, are unaware what facts bear upon a question, are frequently illogical, or are otherwise unable to deal sanely and competently with the Scriptures.

The point is that we will be foolish ourselves—even if we ourselves are not markedly infirm in the faith as such—if we should nonetheless engage those who are infirm, in any sort of dialog which results in "discrimination [or "difference(s)"] of reasonings"; that is, in strained relations as the result of disagreement over contested issues. Such arguments need not even be quarrelsome ones (in the metonymical sense of "argument"), but simply, in the literal sense, the exchange of reasons for or against a certain opinion.

Paul does not here envision, which we only rarely experience anyway, a circumstance in which another truly comes to us for help; in humility, seeking direction and assistance from us. Instead, he contemplates the usual situation which commonly obtains in which one party simply is believing "this," and yet the other party is believing "that"—and yet neither is seeking the other's instruction or assistance. Where we perceive the other person to be infirm in the faith (the body of teaching heralded by Paul as revealed to him by Christ) and yet have occasion to have fellowship with him, Paul would encourage us in this, but not "for [into] discrimination of reasonings." If others do not seek our help (and few indeed truly seek our help), Paul counsels us not to engage them in such disputed questions as are apt to result in "discriminations."

Since we are often perceived as "heretics" or worse, most who view us thus simply refuse my fellowship peremptorily. Yet I have a few community friends or others who though they have some notion as to certain distinctives in my faith (ones which they reject), nonetheless enjoy my friendship, both personally and even as a believer in Christ. They know that I am somewhat a knowledgeable person, but this has by no means led them to seek my assistance. So long as we speak of everyday affairs, or even, on occasion, briefly, of the death and resurrection of Christ itself, everything is fine. But years ago, and ever since, whenever I dared to go even a little farther, it soon became evident that my endeavors were not expedient. Hence, in the case of any involvements I continue to have with any such fellow believers, while I seek to maintain their friendship, I do so by being simply a personal friend.

IMITATING PAUL

If any among us should seek to do the work of an evangelist, pastor, or teacher, whenever we are therefore engaged in presentations before others, obviously, we should seek to follow Paul's pattern and instruction as relates to such service. But even such ones themselves, do well to follow Paul's advice here (in Romans 14:1) in their everyday "private-citizen encounters" with the "Christian public."

With Paul, the time came in his service to the Corinthians when, even though they were still immature and infirm (many being fleshly ["jealousy and strife"] and boastful; 3:1-4; 4:6-8), it had become needful to write the epistle to them which we call 1 Corinthians. In this letter, Paul presents all manner of glorious and intermediately-mature revelations. As to how much of it they understood, even as whether he had an opportunity later on to elucidate and clarify that which he herein simply presents, we can know but little. And, of course he goes even further in presenting the completed teachings of maturity, in his prison epistles.

Thus the facts seem to be that, for the apostle Paul, the time came when he began to present somewhat more advanced, still more advanced, and then finally ultimate, mature teachings. So when he says, "yet wisdom are we speaking among the mature" (2:6; which decidedly excluded the Corinthians), I take it that he is speaking primarily in a connotative sense, by association, thus indicating that it was his (and Sosthenes'; cp 1:1) custom of seeking to elaborate upon and freely consider in a fuller way, "wisdom" among the "mature."

That is, Paul sought to confine his "speak*ing*" of things of "wisdom," to those who were at least beginning to be in a position to benefit from such speech. Thus he sought not his own expedience, but that of "the many" (10:33; cp Col. 4:5,6). Those teachings which are not only "full of wisdom" themselves, but which, the point is, require substantial wisdom on the part of the hearer if he would receive them and be benefited by them, he endeavored to be "speaking," among those who had matured sufficiently to be profited thereby. No doubt, even Paul himself could only approximate this ideal; yet we should endeavor to do the same.

In seeking to apply these considerations to our own situation today, I would conclude that we must first decide whether we ourselves do well to serve as teachers (cp James 3:1). If we soberly conclude that perhaps we are able, sufficient to engage in such service faithfully, then let us by all means do so. But if wisdom should dictate (God giving us wisdom) that such is not our service, this will not be the slightest disgrace upon ourselves. Yet—if I may employ the apt old joke—it will be to our disgrace, in God's sight, if we should misinterpret the clouds shaped in the form of the letters "PC," as "Preach Christ," when to us their intended message instead was, "Pick Cotton." In the words of the beloved comedian, Jimmy Durante, "Everybody wants to get in the act!" Yet—and this was his whole point—for most, it would be far better to enjoy the show from the audience, than to spoil the show from the stage.

It is infinitely better to follow well than to lead poorly. Certainly, we should not seek to lead in a range (cp 2 Cor. 10:13-16) where we have not been invited to serve, lest our labors become more of an interference than a constructive service. The first principle of doing a good job, is knowing whether we are in a position to do a good job. We must not, in any event and no matter how sincerely, merely try to "get in the act."

Where such counsel goes unheeded, we may be sure that this too is in the purpose of God. But if we desire truly to be "found faithful" (1 Cor.4:2), may we pray for wisdom in a realization of what this entails.

You, then, child of mine, be invigorated by the grace which is in Christ Jesus. And what things you hear from me through many witnesses, these commit to faithful men, who shall be competent to teach others also. Suffer evil with me, as an ideal soldier of Christ Jesus. No one who is warring is involved in the business of a livelihood, that he should be pleasing the one who enlists him. Now if anyone should be competing in the games also, he is not given a wreath if ever he should not be competing lawfully. The toiling farmer must be the first to partake of the fruits. Apprehend what I say, for the Lord will be giving you understanding in it all. (2 Tim.2:1-7)

Yet whether we serve as teachers to certain others or not, wherever we encounter those who are infirm in the faith, ones who, in any event, have not come to us seeking our assistance, we ourselves greatly err in not heeding Paul's advice, "Now the infirm in the faith be taking to yourselves, but not for discrimination of reasonings" (Rom.14:1).

Even if we do not teach, where God opens a door, He may still give us opportunity to minister to others in a wonderful and invaluable way, by giving us the service of directing friends or acquaintances to the ministry of those who can best be of service to them in the teaching. As a result, old friendships may be fostered and new friendships made, with much joy and good fellowship among all. Such fellowship may then include the blessing of intelligent, edifying discussion in things of consequence, speaking God's wisdom in a secret, "among the mature" (1 Cor.2:6,7).

THE KINGDOM OF GOD AND THE KINGDOM OF THE HEAVENS

THERE is a perennial interest in the question, What is the difference between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of the heavens? In many instances there seems to be no distinction at all. In Matthew 19:23, 24 we read of both kingdoms in connection with the rich man who clung to his possessions. Their general identity is recognized again and again when the "kingdom" is spoken of without any word to tell us which one is referred to. Parallel passages abound in the gospels where Matthew uses the phrase "kingdom of the heavens" and the other evangelists use "kingdom of God."

The former phrase occurs only in Matthew's account. But Matthew also uses the phrase "kingdom of God." These cases are of special interest, therefore, in helping us to an understanding of the distinction between the two expressions.

"The kingdom of God" occurs as follows in Matthew. The three most ancient manuscripts omit it in Matthew 6:33.

Now if I am casting out demons by the spirit of God, consequently you have a foretaste of the kingdom of God. (12:28)
. . . for the rich to be entering into the kingdom of God. (19:24)
. . . the tribute collectors and the prostitutes are preceding you into the kingdom of God. (21:31)
. . . the kingdom of God will be taken away from you. (21:43)

If we can discover some element in these passages foreign to the rest, which makes it repugnant to our spiritual apprehension if we substitute "heavens" for "God," then we will be able to enjoy the light and blessing which He has intended by using two phrases rather than one only.

The basic thought of the "kingdom of the heavens" is found in Daniel 2:44, where we read: "In their days, that is, of these kings, the Eloah of the heavens will set up a kingdom that for the eons shall not come to harm. His kingdom shall not be left to another people. It will pulverize and terminate all these kingdoms, and it shall be confirmed for the eons." It will not be restricted by treaties with other nations, nor will it be subject to the powers of darkness.

This passage, combined with a close reading of all later references to this kingdom, show us plainly that it is confined to the earth. Its limits do not extend beyond this planet. Besides this it belongs to a people. It is the sovereignty of one people or nation over other nations, such as was the case with Babylon, Medo-Persia, and Greece, which once had world-wide sway. It is a future kingdom which is not yet set up.

In contrast to this, the kingdom of God was already in exercise in heaven, though not on earth, as our Lord taught His disciples: "Let Thy will come to pass, as in heaven, on earth also" (Matt.6:10).

The kingdom of God, while it will include the earth, is not confined to it, but embraces the universe, except such parts as are in rebellion against Him. The kingdom of the heavens has no place outside the earth. The former is a present reality in heaven, but neither are yet established on earth.

The kingdom of God is the sovereignty of a Divine Person. The kingdom of the heavens is a kingdom which, indeed, finds all its authority in Him, yet is delegated to a people. "And the kingdom and the jurisdiction and the majesty of the kingdom under the entire heavens will be granted to the people of the saints of the supremacies.

Their kingdom is an eonian kingdom, and all other authorities shall serve and hearken to them" (Daniel 7:27).The twelve apostles shall be seated on twelve thrones, judging (i.e., ruling) the twelve tribes of Israel (Matt.19:28). Others shall have authority, some over five cities, some over ten. This authority is referred to when he tells them to teach or disciple all the nations (Matt.28:19).

An example may help to impress what we have been seeking to set forth. What, we will ask, was the difference between the kingdom of King George V and the kingdom of Great Britain? The king's dominion extended over England and all its dependencies. In England he was the king; in India he was the emperor. But there is a sense in which every Englishman who voted in the home country had a hand in the government of India. So, too, a place in the kingdom of the heavens, includes a place of authority over the other nations.

The earthly kingdom has no jurisdiction over demons. So the fact that He cast them out was a sign that the kingdom of God had come upon them (Matt.12:28).

The case of the rich man (Matt.19:24) is true of both kingdoms, but entrance is even more difficult in respect to God's personal rule.

The tax gatherers and harlots will have nothing but judgment in the kingdom of the heavens. The tax gatherers were traitors to that kingdom. But the self-righteous Pharisees, who had a great deal to say about their own fitness for the divine presence—they had even less right than those whom they despised. And this shows another characteristic distinction, arising from the fact that one kingdom involves subjection to God Himself where no deception is possible, while the other has to do with authority vested in human hands. The kingdom of God will have no such history as the kingdom of the heavens. In the latter there will be feigned subjection, which will break out into rebellion when Satan is loosed from his chains. Loyalty to God Himself has a personal element similar to loyalty to a sovereign, which is much more than the subjection of a dependent realm.

Our last quotation deals with the fruits of the vineyard. There is no question here of the relation of Israel to the other nations. In subjection to God they would have furnished Him with the wine which cheers both God and man (Judges 9:13). So it is not the kingdom of the heavens which is taken from them, but the kingdom of God. This will be given to a nation which will bring forth its fruits. It will be taken from the apostates and given to the faithful and spiritual.

The two kingdoms, then, contain much in common and are often equivalents. But they always keep their own coloring and one phrase can never be used where God in His excellent wisdom has been pleased to place the other.

The kingdom of God is very seldom mentioned in the epistles, stress being laid upon its character. It is never, however, spoken of as a present reality upon the earth. It is spoken of as future (1 Cor.6:9,10; 15:50; Gal.5:21; Eph. 5:5; 1 Thess.2:12; 2 Thess.1:5; 2 Tim.4:1,18). It is associated with the Circumcision (Col.4:11).

THE KINGDOM OF THE FATHER

The "kingdom of the Father" is another phrase which contains a precious truth in advance of either of the ones we are considering. If the kingdom of the heavens expresses the relation of dependencies to another people and the kingdom of God the personal loyalty to a sovereign, then the Father's kingdom expresses the position of the King's children. This filial relationship promises no political prestige, but speaks rather of provision and character, which his fatherhood implies. He is the Father of the righteous (Matt.13:43). He it is who is petitioned for bread and forgiveness (Matt.6:10), and He will provide the wine in the coming kingdom (Matt.26:29). Its full and perfect expression awaits the consummation, when the Son gives up the kingdom to God, even the Father (1 Cor.15:24). It is a kingdom in name only, for all sovereignty and authority and power are unnecessary and unknown.

THE KINGDOM OF THE SON

There is one kingdom, however, which is in power at the present time. This is the kingdom of God's beloved Son (Col.1:13). The authority of darkness, with spiritual forces of wickedness, who are the real sovereigns in this sombre scene (Eph.6:12), is strictly a spiritual kingdom. It does not displace the sovereignties of this world at all. So also is the Son's kingdom. It is a strictly spiritual sovereignty. We were once subjects of the domains of darkness. Now we are subjects of the kingdom of the Son of His love. All the while, however, we are still subject to the human governments under which we live. We are not loosed from them. We are exhorted to be subject to rulers as to God's ministers (Rom.13:6).

Some day the kingdom of God's Son will find expression on earth. That will be after this old earth has been replaced by a new one. Then God will dwell with all mankind and all will be willing, worshiping subjects of His beloved Son. So perfect will this reign be that the time will come when all sovereignty and authority and power will be abrogated and the Son Himself will become subject to the Father (1 Cor.15:27).

Just as the early ministry of Paul was the spiritual counterpart of the millennial reign, in which he acted as a priest in the evangel of God (Rom.15:16), so the present kingdom is a spiritual foretaste of the succeeding kingdom of the Son, which follows it, in the eon of the eon (Heb.1:8). We have not the powers of the coming eon, but the affectionate perfection which characterizes the rule of God's Beloved.

So long as sin and insubordination hold sway, there can be no happiness apart from government. But when, at length, all is perfect, when sin is gone, and not the least breath stirs contrary to His wish, what need for government? The "kingdom" will exist only in name, giving place to the Father's guiding hand.

Then, when government itself is gone, will we learn the real lesson it was meant to teach: that His will alone is good—good for His glory and for our welfare. And when this is acknowledged by every heart then will God indeed be All in all.

GOD ALL IN US

Perhaps it would not be too much to say that God is something in everyone in this life. Even the unbeliever and the atheist, especially in their earlier years, have at least a tinge of God-consciousness, especially when overwhelmed with sudden terror or dismay. But it is not until He reveals Himself to His chosen, that they begin to realize the part He plays in their lives, and that He becomes the focus of their consciousness. At first this may be very weak; but, as they become mature, He takes a larger and larger place in their experience. The heathen have idols made by human hands. Let us beware lest we also worship a deity who is not and will not be our all, made by human heads.

Most delightful, then, is it to contemplate that distant day when God will be All in all. Because of the unbelief of Christendom we are prone to emphasize the second all, and rightly insist that it admits of no exceptions. Every creature of His hand will then be close to His heart. Yet we should not confine our contemplations to the number alone, but also maintain the full meaning of the first All. God will not occupy a small fraction of our lives, nor even half or three-fourths. He will be everything to us. There will be nothing in our experience that will not be divine. Every occurrence, each incident, large or small, important or trivial, will come to us consciously as a gratuity given by God, and it will bring a constant response of adoring worship.

REPOSING IN EXPECTATION

Our good friend, Ed Bumgarner of Bessemer City, North Carolina passed away in April of this year. He loved reading Unsearchable Riches and looked forward to the day when his favorite verse: 1 Corinthians 15:28, will come to pass. He was 87 1/2 years old and is survived by his wife Lorena, and his son Andrew. It was always a blessing to visit with Ed, Lorena and Andrew and his wife, Carol, at the Bible fellowships.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

I see Thee, Lord, in everything

That nature brings to view—
The buds that blossom in the spring,
The birds that in full rapture sing,
The flowers of varying hue.

I see Thee in the sun, whose beam
Adds splendor to the day,
And in the moon's nocturnal gleam;
Their welcome rays from heaven stream
To drive the gloom away.

I see Thee in each tiny star
That twinkles in the night.
Those lights from circling spheres afar Declare Thy glory, Lord, and are A witness to Thy might.

I see Thee in Thy Word, and praise
The wisdom of Thy plan.
Thy Word of truth, O Lord, displays
The endless wonders of Thy ways
Revealed therein to man.

I see Thee best in Him, Who came
From realms of light above,
To suffer trials, death and shame,
That He might glorify Thy Name,
And show Thy boundless love.

The countless seasons onward roll,
Thy purpose to complete;
Thus wilt Thou reach Thy final goal,
When all respond to Thy control
And worship at Thy feet.

EDITORIAL

THIS issue features the first two articles comprised in the series Studies in Philippians by A. E. Knoch. The first of these articles is preceded by a chart, "Framework of Philippians, Complex Reversion" (p.5).

"The Philippian epistle is a divine commentary on the latter half of Ephesians, and, like it, is especially concerned with the deportment demanded by the transcendent doctrine developed in the first half of the Ephesian letter. This is the key to its contents. It does not deal with doctrines, but with deportment. This will illuminate many a difficult passage in it and this has been allowed to color the wording of the version.

"As shown in [this] literary framework, the epistle is a perfect, though complex reversion. Its controlling theme is Participation in the Evangel, not only by its public proclamation, but especially by a conduct consistent with its teachings."[1]

As stated in the first of these two articles included herein, "Introduction" (pp.6-20), "As Ephesians is the great exposition of the truth of this secret administration so Philippians opens up new vistas of service." (p.6).

In the second of these two articles, each in its own way introductory in nature to the Philippian epistle, "The Philippians' Contribution" (p.21-31), Brother Knoch states, "Among the most precious privileges which come to us with the reception of Gods unspeakable gift, is that of giving, of participating in the service of heralding the evangel by supporting the efforts made to spread the knowledge of God" (p.21).

On page 30, we have included "Translation Notes" concerned with two changes in vocabulary from the previous CV editions as these appear herein, reflective of our prospective revision at Philippians 1:7. "The word 'right' is used in place of 'just,' and 'setting (my) mind' is substituted for 'disposed.'"

Next is Dean Hough's exposition, "Joint Participants of Grace" (pp.33-36): "The revelation of God's righteousness in dealing with human unrighteousness is sourced in Jesus Christ's faith in dying for sinners, and this is for the cause and invigorating power of our faith" . . . . God's righteousness is revealed by means of [Christ's] faith, that is, out of (Greek, ek) His faith, and this is for (the cause of), that is, directed into (Greek, eis) the believer's faith" (p.33).

This is followed by my writing entitled, "Deeming It to be Refuse" (pp.37-44). "Many who are friends of Christ, are nevertheless enemies of the cross of Christ, insofar as its significance is concerned in the achievement of God's purpose to become All in all (1 Cor.15:28). The consummation which is theirs ('whose consummation') for such unfaithful service is that of a certain 'destruction' (or 'loss'), namely that which will obtain when they, even as ourselves, are manifested before the dais of Christ and are requited for their practices through the body, whether good or bad (2 Cor.5:10)" (p.44).

The concluding article for this issue is, "Do Not Worry About Anything," (pp.45-48) by William Mealand. "There is an elixir of life in words like these. Touching life at all points, they embrace every experience, and affect every problem. How positive they are, how emphatic! There is no room left for the smallest doubt to intrude. The words are just an exquisite echo of the Psalmist's thought—'fret not thyself!'" (p.45). J.R.C.

FELLOWSHIP IN THE EVANGEL
THE LIVING EXPRESSION OF THE EVANGEL

INTRODUCTION

PHILIPPIANS, almost more than any other epistle, must be considered as a unit. Its truth is so little known or practiced, and so distinctive in character, that a passage outside its context, or severed from the main theme, may suggest a thought quite contradictory to its message. "Work out your own salvation" (AV rendering) is only one of such statements which may be used to give the truth an entirely false twist. Unless the theme of the epistle is seen to be service, even those who are well aware of their transcendent blessings in Christ will be stumbled by passages which seem to call in question the precious truths already taught.

As Ephesians is the great exposition of the truth of this secret administration so Philippians opens up new vistas of service. The tendency observable in Paul's earlier epistles, in contrast with the book of Acts, is carried on to its consummation. Not only is Israel set aside, but all that pertains to the flesh and the earth is forfeited in order to gain Christ and conform to our celestial citizenship. The cross finds its full expression first in this epistle. This is sorely needed today, for without a due appreciation of its meaning we will be sure to fail in our walk and service.

I would especially urge those who seek to serve the saints to take Philippians to heart. The more I have meditated upon it, the more I have been appalled at our great lack in living up to it.

Another thought has impressed me. In these perfection epistles there is no enigmatic teaching. We do not observe as in a mirror, but face to face (1 Cor.13:12). This should make it clear and easy, but, not being mature, most of us find it difficult. For instance, the statement "it is God Who is operating in you to will as well as to work" goes right to the root of the matter, and leaves no haziness whatever, as was the case in almost all previous revelation, which leaves us with the impression that we are the operating force in willing as well as in working. Let us never seek to modify or annul such clear declarations, which give us the final analysis and take us back to first causes, by bringing in others which deal with apparent processes, as used by God in testing men.

On the contrary, we should take Philippians as final, and God's previous unfoldings as more or less superficial and partial and obscure. It can be explained by the latest revelation, but not the latest by it. Of course Philippians is "extreme," for the cross is extreme and God is extreme in His desire to become All in His creatures. So let us not allow this word to frighten us and keep us from obeying the truth.

And let us not fail to note the joyous, yes, jubilant character of our service. True, it may be done in weakness and suffering, amid failure and envy and strife, yet beneath all is the promise and purpose of God, and in all we have the nearness of our Lord. Although this is the time of our humiliation, we anticipate the glory. While looking our afflictions in the face, we shout to all our fellow slaves (Phil.4:4): "Be rejoicing in the Lord always! Again I will declare, be rejoicing!"

THE SLAVES' EXHORTATION
(Philippians 1:1-2–4:21-23)

THE PHILIPPIAN EPISTLE comes to us from two slaves, not from an apostle. It is an exhortation, designed to affect our feet, rather than a revelation for the enlightening of our minds. Paul and Timothy do not present the truth as to our position in Christ, but the path to be pursued by the Philippians, after they know their place in Him. It consists principally of four "living expressions" of the evangel, which are set forth for us to follow. Christ, Timothy, Epaphroditus, Paul—these are the patterns who give us a clue to the conduct which becomes us today—Christ and Paul in particular.

Philippians follows Ephesians. Whatever we may hold as to the sequence of the books in the Bible, Paul's epistles come to us in an order undoubtedly divine, for it is the same in all the manuscripts. The Roman Group—Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians—form a unit by themselves, and do not depart far from the great truths of justification, conciliation, and glorification. Romans, like Ephesians, has a completeness all its own, yet it is supplemented by the two epistles to Corinth, as to conciliation and glorification, and Galatians is a most masterly commentary on its treatment of justification.

Philippians occupies the same relation to Ephesians that the Corinthian epistles do to Romans. This similarity is even more strikingly seen in Galatians and Colossians. Galatians is practically confined to the first of the three great subjects of Romans—justification. It leaves conciliation and glorification to the Corinthian letters. So Colossians also deals principally with the first aspect of the secret of Ephesians—our relationship to God. It leaves the other two to Philippians. In this epistle, then, we may expect to find set forth the conduct which flows from our relationship to Christ and to our fellow saints. The power of the appeals will depend largely on our apprehension and appreciation of the last two items of the secret—that we are a joint body, and are joint partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus, through the evangel of which Paul became the dispenser.

Just as Galatians is an excellent help in understanding justification, and the Corinthian epistles in developing conciliation, so Philippians may assist us in further founding and confirming our knowledge of Ephesians, although it is intended for those who already apprehend that great unfolding of present truth. It will especially help to correct such faulty ideas as we may have in regard to the last two items of the secret. This is especially true of the evangel, for the Philippians were active participants in it from the first (1:5). And this very same evangel remains with them. He unfolds no new one to them. Now, however, they are joint partakers in its grace, whereas, at first, they partook of it as guests of Israel (Eph.2:12).

Both Ephesians and Colossians are easily divisible into two parts, doctrine and deportment. No such division can be seen in Philippians, for it is all devoted to conduct. It, indeed, divides into two complementary halves, for a glance at its structure will show that it is a reversion, dealing principally with living expressions of the evangel. In the first half are the examples of Christ and Timothy. These are balanced in the second by those of Epaphroditus and Paul. In the first part we are exhorted to imitate Christ (2:1); in the second we are bidden to imitate Paul (3:17). These facts are of vital value in the interpretation of this epistle, for some passages in it, divorced from its controlling theme, may be made to appear to teach truth quite beyond and contrary to Ephesians, but when kept within the bounds set by the epistle itself, and applied to our experience, they are in fullest accord with the previous epistle and its transcendent revelations.

A casual reading of Philippians gives little idea of the symmetry and beauty of its structure. Yet, for a close consideration of the epistle, there is no key comparable to a clear exhibition of the literary framework. The mind is likely to be lost in a maze of detail and forget the theme under discussion. Indeed it is not always easy to seize the real subject without some such aid as the structure affords. Perhaps the common impression of this epistle is that, like our own letters, it is a jumble of this and that and the other, without any designed relation between its parts. A so-called "analysis" is apt to be arbitrary and is usually derived from the interpretation, instead of aiding it. But a real "framework" should be as self-evident as the skeleton of an animal, with all its parts symmetrical and complementary, making their relationships quite obvious to all.

THE FOUR EXAMPLES

The framework of Philippians shows that its subject is participation in the evangel. We must not limit this to the heralding of "the gospel" to unbelievers. It includes all of the glad message as it was revealed, not only as imparted to faith, but as expressed in life. In the second half of Ephesians we are told how we should walk; here we are shown. There the basis of conduct is truth. Here it is illuminated by example. The greater part of this epistle is devoted to living expressions of the evangel. The service and suffering of its greatest exponents are presented for our consideration. Christ Himself, in His descent from the form of God to the shame of the cross, is presented for our imitation. Corresponding to this we have Paul's descent from a self-righteous Pharisee to conformation to the death of Christ. The center of the epistle depicts two ideal characters—Timothy for service, and Epaphroditus for suffering.

In accord with its character, the hortatory passages in Philippians are not grouped together at the close, as in Ephesians and Colossians, but are scattered symmetrically throughout the epistle. They appear before and after the two great examples, The apostle pleads for a humble and obedient disposition like our Lord's (2:1-5,12-18). He exhorts us to imitate himself and beware of those who act otherwise (3:1-3,17-21). The question may arise, Since Ephesians has already dealt with the conduct which comports with its new revelation, what room is left for exhortation in Philippians? The answer is that here also we see the special character of this epistle. The exhortations are general in Ephesians, here they apply particularly to service. Ephesians indeed dealt with the slaves of masters on earth. Philippians deals with the conduct of all saints in their character of slaves of a heavenly Master.

To correspond with their special character, both Philippians and Colossians, unlike Ephesians, are written jointly by Paul and Timothy. In Colossians Paul speaks as an apostle, Timothy as a brother, but in Philippians both bow themselves under the yoke of servitude to Christ Jesus. They are slaves. Here there is no secret unveiled, as in Ephesians. Here we are concerned with deeds rather than with words, with walk on earth rather than with our position in the heavens.

As the conclusion shows (4:21-23), the saints in Rome, especially those of Caesar's household, join him in greeting the saints in Philippi. Both are eloquent witnesses to the service of these slaves.

THE SAINTS IN PHILIPPI

Philippi does not enter into his ministry until after Paul's separation by the spirit (Acts 13:2) and his further separation from Barnabas (Acts 15:39). It enters soon after Timothy becomes Paul's companion. Very definite leading by the holy Spirit, which forbade his speaking in the province of Asia and Bithynia, forced him to the seacoast at Troas, where he had the Macedonian vision. Thereupon Paul crossed over into Macedonia to help them (Acts 16:6-10). Philippi was the first stopping place, as it was the foremost city of that part of Macedonia, and a Roman colony. There it was that Paul met Lydia, the seller of purple in Thyatira, and drove out the python spirit from the maid. And there he was flogged and jailed and put in the stocks, and prayed and sang hymns to God. There it was that the jailer was saved, and exulted, believing in God, with all his house.

Such is the background in the book of Acts. All is still on kingdom ground. There is baptism, and the casting out of demons, and a miraculous earthquake, all of which belong to the kingdom which is the theme of the "Acts" (Acts 1:6;28:31). Since then vast changes had taken place. The record of Acts itself had practically closed. Israel had been thrust aside. God's salvation is dispatched directly to the nations, without their mediacy. The apostle has made known the great truths of justification, conciliation, and glorification in his epistles to the Romans, the Corinthians, and the Thessalonians. These he undoubtedly made known to them in his later visit (Acts 20:6). But of these truths the Acts knows nothing. Far less should we look there for the latest revelations, which Paul sent from his prison in Rome. So that we must leave the Philippi of Acts in the far distant background, with great spiritual changes between that and the writing of this epistle.

Not only is this epistle written by slaves, but it is written especially to supervisors and servants. It is very evident that, in respect to service, there were distinctions between the saints. This is necessary wherever a number of individuals unite in striving to accomplish a common end. The experienced should supervise. The capable should serve. This is fitting and proper.

ORDER IN THE ECCLESIA

It is evident to everyone that the order in the various churches of today is not that found in the Scriptures. No church has several "bishops," or supervisors, as in Philippi, except those few who are striving to conform to the divine model. In those days, besides the gifts, apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers (Eph.4:11), there were supervisors and servants for service, as well as elders for rule. The function of a "bishop" has usually been confused with that of an elder, so that today we have "episcopalian" (ruled by bishops) and "presbyterian" churches (ruled by elders). Ephesians does not deal with the local ecclesia, hence there is no mention of local elders or supervisors or servants. So also, Philippians is concerned with service, not with rule, hence elders are not mentioned, although their work of supervision is brought before us.

SUPERVISORS OR "BISHOPS"

When we see how far modern ecclesiastical organizations have departed from the ideal set before us in the Scriptures, there is a tendency to recognize no order as divine in the ecclesia. But this will lead us from one error into another. This epistle reveals the root of the present apostasy in this regard in its opening exhortation. Supervisors and servants are especially exhorted to imitate the humility of Christ and to follow Paul in his repudiation of earthly honors. Contrariwise, they have been transformed into "bishops" and "deacons." Instead of visiting the saints in their own ecclesia, the bishop has a high place over the clergy of many churches. In order to recover the divine idea of the office of a bishop we will need to note carefully all that is said on the subject in the Scriptures. In order to get the exact significance of the word, we set forth a concordance of its occurrences. The word in parenthesis is the Authorized Version rendering.

Titus	1: 7	a supervisor must be unimpeachable (bishop)
1 Peter	2:25	Shepherd and Supervisor of your souls. (Bishop)

As is usual, the Authorized Version itself is witness to the true meaning of this word, for it renders it overseer (Acts 20: 28) and taking the oversight (1 Peter 5:2). It is characteristic that the Authorized Version should introduce one of the ecclesiastical titles used in the church at the time it was translated, for it was particularly desired not to disturb the church order then existing. Luther also made it plain that he was not of those who discard everything not found in the Scriptures. He wished to leave everything in the Catholic ritual as it was unless definitely contrary to the Word. Hence the ecclesiastical order of the Lutheran church still contains much which has been carried over from Romanism. But, even when translated "bishop," the spiritually intelligent will detect a vast gulf between the ecclesiastical dignitary of today and the humble supervisor of the early church. Who would class a bishop with a servant, or even with a "deacon" (Phil.1:1)? And who would expect to find several bishops in one church, as in Philippi? And who would exhort a bishop not to lord it over the flock? Is that not the very essence of his office? Today we have one bishop over many churches, then there were many in one ecclesia. Now bishops rule over ministers and deacons, then they were associated with them in serving the saints.

ON-NOTE

The Greek words we are considering are formed from epi, ON, and skop, NOTE, ON-NOTE, and are the usual terms for visit, visitor, visitation. It seems from this that the principal duty of the supervisor is to visit or "look after" the saints. It is the service done by a pastor. The word pastor is literally, shepherd. When Paul was passing Ephesus for the last time (Acts 20:28), he exhorted the elders, "Take heed to yourselves and to the entire flocklet among which the holy Spirit appointed you supervisors, to be shepherding [or to be pastors of] the ecclesia of God . . . ." This was evidently a Presbyterian-Episcopal church, for the elders were also bishops! And they were the ones who did the pastoral work as well! Ecclesiasticism is difficult to avoid in these days, but those who give themselves to the Lord's work and are entitled to live of the evangel should strive their utmost not to lord it over the saints. Now that there are no apostles, church government is a local matter, in the hands of the elders in each ecclesia. The Word does not sanction any ruler outside the ecclesia except the Lord Himself.

The terms, elder, bishop, pastor, and teacher should not describe distinct ecclesiastical offices. Though the chief function of an elder is to preside (1 Tim.5:17), yet when Titus was instructed to constitute elders in each city, Paul also calls them supervisors: "If anyone is unimpeachable, the husband of one wife, having believing children, not accused of profligacy or insubordinate—for the supervisor must be unimpeachable . . ." (Titus 1:6,7). And the supervisors are to shepherd, or be pastors (Acts 20:28). Besides, some of the elders had the gift of teaching, and one who toils in the Word is to have special honor and to be supported in his work (1 Tim.5:17,18). Paul probably combined all these gifts and services in himself. Any layman in an ecclesia may become a servant, and when he becomes older, a supervisor and an elder, besides exercising one of the gifts, evangelist, pastor, or teacher.

Apart from apostolic supervision, the Pauline ecclesias were given no human head to unite and rule over the ecclesia as a whole, or over any groups of them. All of the functionaries, servants, supervisors, and elders, were local, and had no service or jurisdiction outside their own ecclesia. The gifts, indeed, may have had a wider sphere, but it is likely that evangelists and teachers, when they went to other fields, cooperated with the local ecclesia, if there was one, and deferred to the elders in matters of church order. One might almost say that the early church had no head. The need for a human head was not felt until the church lost contact with its heavenly Head, and wandered away from His Word. If all were subject to Him there would be the fullest cooperation and unity. Israel did not recognize Yahweh as their King, so they asked for a man. After the same example of unbelief, the church has chosen bishops and popes, and has called councils, and conferences and assemblies. These have succeeded, not in uniting the saints into one body, but in dividing them into many hostile camps.

All "church government" in the Scriptures, apart from the apostolic office, is local. No bishop, no elder, has any jurisdiction beyond the assembly where he lives. There were no unions of several companies, or of all in a given city, or district, or country. There were no ecclesiastical authorities outside the local gathering. Every ecclesiastic who rules over more than one group of saints or over the local officers is usurping the place of Christ, for God has given the headship of the church to Him.

Since there was no corporate unity among the saints on earth, their relation to the government was an individual one. And this consisted simply in submission to the superior authorities (Rom.13:1) and in praying for them (1 Tim.2:2). If each individual believer would do this the probability is that the saints would lead a mild and quiet life. Their ability to carry on the functions for which they are left on the earth would be much greater than under the present system, when by organized numbers, they seek to influence governments in their favor, to their own eventual loss.

SERVANTS OR "DEACONS"

Perhaps no better evidence can be offered for the defection of the church from the spirit of humility inculcated in Philippians than the change from supervisor to "bishop," and from plain servant to "deacon" or "minister." It is evident that the latter term once meant no more than servant, or our translators would not have rendered Matthew 20:26, "whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister". In Matthew 23:11 they translate the same word servant. Some of the functions of these "deacons" or "ministers" are: keeping house, like Martha (Luke 10:40), drawing water (John 2:9), and it is specially used of those who waited on the table at meals (Luke 22:27; Acts 6:2).

Hence it also has the sense of serving out or dispensing. It refers to lowly duties, not dignified display. I well remember my first experience as a deacon. The office fell to my lot without appointment or election. My duties consisted in cleaning out the meeting place each week. I had others do such things for me in business and at home, but I considered it an honor to perform such a service as to the Lord. It gave me much joy and satisfaction, and to this day I feel more confident of a reward for wielding a broom in those happy days than for the higher work of wielding a pen in the defense of the truth in the long years that have followed.

A concordance of diakonos shows that it is not the special title of a church official. Magistrates are also "deacons" or "ministers." It is a general term, applicable to all who serve others or serve out something. It also shows that the terms minister and deacon are equivalents in the Scriptures, though they are so far apart in modern ecclesiastical usage. Every deacon is really a minister and every minister a deacon. To escape such confusion the Concordant Version avoids ecclesiastical terms wherever possible. It has made servants out of the deacons and ministers.

THE FUNCTION OF A MINISTER

"Minister" is used by the Authorized Version at all times for another Greek word, leitourgos, for which it is more appropriate, and the Concordant Version follows its example. As it is also a form of service which the Philippians, as a whole, rendered to Paul (2:17,30) through Epaphroditus (2:25), it will be well to include it in our study at this time, although such ministers have no permanent place in the church order. The term was applied only on special occasions, when some public service was performed, as can be seen when its occurrences are consulted in a concordance.

The public nature of the service rendered by a "minister" is evident from the occurrences, as well as the derivation of the word. It is literally PEOPLE-ACTer, one who acts for other people, who officiates. Thus it is used four times of the priesthood (Luke 1:23; Heb.8:2;9:21; 10:11). A priest ministers or officiates. When Paul acted as a priest of the evangel of God, he was a minister (Rom.15:16). Paul was not the minister of Philippi. On the contrary, the Philippians were ministers of Paul (Phil.2:17,30). This consisted in the supply of his temporal needs. They had failed in this until Epaphroditus was sent to minister to Paul for them.

To give a modern example: One morning a brother, a baker by trade, called at the publication office and handed over a special collection taken by the ecclesia for the work. He was their "minister" on this occasion. When a special effort is to be made in which the whole ecclesia joins, they may choose one of their number to act for them in forwarding their bounty. By this act he becomes their "minister," in the true, biblical sense of the word. Too often our Lord's words (Matt.20:26) are literally, instead of figuratively, true. In these days the "minister" expects to be treated as the greatest in the ecclesia, instead of the least. True greatness does not consist in superior education, manners, or social position, but in lowly service.

ELDERS

Elders, as we have seen, are not in view as such, in Philippians. Age should teach wisdom, and experience should develop ability to direct. Therefore the older men were usually looked upon to preside over the affairs of an ecclesia. As elders, they were over those who served. But they usually did their share in serving also. It seems to be taken for granted that they would supervise (Titus 1:5-7). Such as did so appear in Philippians, classed as supervisors. Paul's epistles to Timothy and Titus deal with rule in the ecclesia. Hence elders are brought before us there. In Philippians we are interested in the service of all, including the elders.

The question as to the manner of choosing elders, now that there are no apostles to constitute them, should seldom come up. Those who have the necessary qualifications should be evident to all, and they should be recognized without further ceremony. This has worked practically for many years even in these days. Other methods lead to much that is evil. Especially is this so when there are definite terms of office, with elections occurring frequently. The church of God is not a democracy, ruled by the majority. They should bow to the Word and to those who possess the qualifications which are therein prescribed. Elders may ask the opinion of anyone or of the whole ecclesia, but they should not base their action on this alone, but upon the experience and wisdom which their years should bring, in accord with the Scriptures.

THE SALUTATIONS

The epistle begins with Paul's usual, but highly significant salutation of grace and peace (1:2). In accord with this theme-setting word of greetings a striking phrase closes the epistle in the salutation at the end. "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit!" The striking absence of physical blessing in the epistle is emphasized at its close by limiting God's grace to the spirit, in contrast to the body and the soul, which were prominent in the evangel of the kingdom. Contrast the salutation of the apostle John to Gaius. He emphasized the soul (3 John 2). But Philippian service brings in a new note. There is suffering in present service. Christ descended to death. Paul is in bonds, and his afflictions are intensified even by his fellow slaves. Epaphroditus is infirm and risks his soul. All grace is in spirit. Hence, in closing, Paul calls down this grace upon the Philippians—and upon us—that we may find our highest bliss in serving Him in the midst of physical infirmity, not in flesh, but in spirit.

AMONG the most precious privileges which come to us with the reception of God's unspeakable gift, is that of giving, of participating in the service of heralding the evangel by supporting the efforts made to spread the knowledge of God. In this the Philippians as a whole are our example, for they seem to have excelled all others in their contributions to the evangel from the beginning to the very end of Paul's career. Therefore an entire section is set aside for this subject both at the commencement and at the conclusion of the epistle. Let us seek to enter the delightful atmosphere which pervades it and lifts it heaven-high above the plane on which this matter is usually found in the churches of today.

God loves a gleeful giver. Giving grudgingly or of compulsion is of no real advantage to anyone, and an abomination to God, as though He were in need, and wished to exploit His creatures instead of contrariwise to lavish His abundance upon them (2 Cor.9:7,8). It is the motive that counts. In some lands there is a regular church tax, and payment is compulsory. Let no one imagine that much of this will be reckoned as given to the evangel. In other lands all sorts of expedients are used to lure the cash out of the pockets of reluctant members. What a falling off there would be if only those whose hearts were stirred by God's grace should be allowed to contribute to His work! But the real value would not be less.

Paul did solicit contributions from the saints, yet not for himself, but rather for the poor among his own people in Judea, according to his agreement with James, Cephas, and John, when their fields of service were separated (Gal. 2:10). This was on a much lower plane, however, and fits only in that intermediate administration when the nations accepted the spiritual riches which belonged to Israel, and sought to pay for them by sending material aid (Rom. 15:27). They were in the position of debtors at the time, and were under obligation to the nation of God's choice. So will the nations be in the next eon, and even in the last, when their kings bring their glory into the new Jerusalem (Rev.21:24). This is not the motive which moved the Philippians to make their contributions to Paul.

It is not at all likely that Paul received enough to keep body and spirit together for his service to the saints. He had a trade at which he worked when he could. At Corinth he was employed in tent-making along with Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18:3). Although, in answering the Macedonian call, he had found much response to the evangel in that province, not one of the ecclesias sent him help after he left them except the Philippians. More than that, there were times when he was in actual need (Phil.4:16). The last years of his life as a prisoner relieved him of the burden of self-support, yet here it is that the gift of the Philippians fits in. Taking his career as a whole, Paul, perhaps the most deserving of all God's slaves, did not receive even a slave's rations for his service to the saints.

But he did not complain. Rather he exulted that he had preached the evangel to the large Corinthian ecclesia gratuitously. Note the words he uses. He despoiled other ecclesias, getting rations for dispensing to them. He was actually in want in Corinth, but he did not become an encumbrance to them, but received help from Macedonia. He always endeavored to keep from becoming a burden (2 Cor.11:7-9).

Not that he did not know his rights in the matter. Strangely enough, he has to defend himself to these very Corinthians, who did so little for him when he was among them. Listen to his expostulation: "Have we no right at all to eat and drink? Have we no right at all to be leading about a sister as a wife, even as the rest of the apostles and the brothers of the Lord and Cephas? Or have only I and Barnabas no right not to be working? Who is warring at any time supplying his own rations? Who is planting a vineyard and not eating of its fruit?" (1 Cor.9:4-7). Possibly no man ever deserved as high wages as Paul. He sowed a most marvelous crop of spiritual seed among the nations, and, in justice, he should have harvested a tremendous crop of worldly wealth. But how much nobler was his course, as he himself said: "We do not use this right, but we are forgoing all, lest we may be giving any hindrance to the evangel of Christ" (1 Cor.9:12).

With such an experience back of him, no wonder that Paul had a very soft spot in his heart for the Philippians, whose practical sympathy came from the depths of their heart and never needed any prompting on his part. The material donations were transformed into the fragrant incense which delights the heart of God as well as provides for the needs of His unselfish slave.

With this before us we can better appreciate the opening and closing strains of the Philippian epistle. Paul begins: "I am thanking my God at every remembrance of you, always, in every petition of mine for you all, making the petition with joy, for your contribution to the evangel from the first day until now . . ." (Phil.1:3-5). The very first time that he preached the evangel in Philippi, Lydia generously urged him to come to her house and remain (Acts 16:15). He seems to have stayed there until he left, as he returned there, after coming out of the jail, before leaving the city (Acts 16:40). Soon afterward he was in Thessalonica, and it seems that they sent several times during his sojourn there. No doubt they were responsible for the contributions sent from Macedonia to Corinth (2 Cor.11:9). And this is crowned by their latest donation, sent to his prison in Rome, by the hand of Epaphroditus (Phil.2:25).

It is this persistent continuance which gave the aged slave the confidence that they would not fail in the future, that "He Who undertakes a good work among you will be performing it until the day of Jesus Christ" (1:6). Let us not dilute this statement into a mere promise that God will save everyone whom He calls. That is true and precious, but it applies to all. This is a rarer grace, which is, alas, not found in every ecclesia. In fact we do not read of it in connection with any other, and we know that it was lacking in some. It may be that the Philippians could not send him much at a time, but they continued to send what they could, and this recurrent token of their affection for him and their desire to have a share in his service led to the conviction that they had become "incorrigible" givers. May we emulate their example.

No one can blame Paul for being partial to the Philippians, in view of their attitude toward him. When he was free and went about confirming and defending the evangel they had him in their heart, and were given grace to do their part in supporting his hands. And, now that he is in bonds, they did not reason that his bread and water are sure, being supplied by the state, but they sent their "apostle and minister," that is, they commissioned Epaphroditus to go to Rome with supplies to use in ministering to Paul. Being now aged, his life could no doubt be made much easier. This seems to have especially touched his heart. In a sense he was laid aside and had not the same claim on their aid as when he was actively going about and heralding the evangel. But they remained true to him, so that he longed for them all in the compassions of Christ Jesus.

As a result of this interchange of loving service, Paul is led to pray for the Philippians (1:9-11), that the love which has led them to care so faithfully for him and his service may be superabounding still more and more in realization and all sensibility for them to be testing what things are really of consequence, in order that they may be sincere and no stumbling block for the day of Christ, having been filled with the fruit of righteousness which is through Jesus Christ, for the glory and laud of God (1:9-11). Here we have a hint of what is on Paul's heart in writing the epistle. They have been giving to him, and now he desires that they, in turn, receive all that is theirs, in the latest and highest revelation, which he has just made public, and of which they have doubtless read in the so-called epistle to the Ephesians.

As in his marvelous opening prayer in Ephesians, he prays that they may be granted the realization of Him Who has given new treasures of grace (Eph.1:17)—the very same word which expresses his desire for the Philippians. In reality the word embraces even more than this, and might be rendered appreciation. This is all that is needed to make a saint happy. This is more than enough to repay us for all that we may do to forward the evangel or contribute to the support of its heralds. Paul could not repay his friends in material goods, but in spiritual wealth he had unutterably more than was needed to recompense even the model Philippian ecclesia.

But how can he convey it to them? Merely to write it out for them is not enough. Ephesians has now been before the saints for centuries, with very little realization or appreciation of the grandeur of its grace. The Philippians had doubtless heard it only recently. To them it would be new. For them it would involve a spirit of wisdom and revelation quite beyond the average. Yet this alone is the field in which their love can unfold still further, and so the Lord's slave prays that this gift may be theirs as well.

Yet he does not develop the thought as in Ephesians, but, in harmony with the trend of the epistle, he adds the word sensibility. He would trace the truth further, in its operation through their faculties (SENSE-KEEPers). He is concerned with the conduct which should characterize it. He would have them live it out in their lives. The new revelation brings with it a flood of apparent problems which will confuse their feet if they are not able to fully realize its import. Many practices which hitherto have seemed vital now fall away. To let go that which belongs to the past and grasp that which lies before, such is the crisis which confronted them at this time.

THINGS OF CONSEQUENCE

Christendom is chiefly occupied with the husks of divine truth and knows but little of the kernel. This is because it has failed to realize the latest revelation. Hence it fails to function accordingly, and is occupied with things which are no longer of consequence. Indeed, there are hardly any, even among intelligent believers, who realize that there is any such thing as a crowning revelation in Ephesians which clears away all the enigmas of the fragmentary unfoldings which went before, and which brings the saint to maturity. As a consequence there is but little real sincerity. Almost everything is partly sham. And the path of both saint and sinner is strewn with stumbling blocks which will cause much loss in the day of Christ, when the conduct of the saints is tested by fire.

The word "consequence" is a difficult one to translate concordantly into English, and it may be that in this passage, it carries with it the ideas suggested by its elements, THRU-CARRY. In Hebrews 10:14 a word with the same elements is rendered "to a finality." That is, things of consequence are those which are not merely the scaffolding of truth, which will be removed at last, but the final forms, which are permanent. Israel had mostly shadows. We now have the substance. The process of divine revelation deals much with the flesh. The end is found in spirit.

As this epistle itself points out the things which are of no consequence, we need not linger over the thought. Paul especially deals with the prerogatives of the Jew in flesh, and is glad to forfeit them all, and deems them refuse in order to gain Christ, which is of the greatest consequence. Hitherto the saints were concerned with terrestrial things; now it is of the most vital importance that we recognize our celestial citizenship. Now it is necessary that Paul be taken as a model for our walk. Otherwise we will be sure to do the inconsequential things which, alas, are not lacking in dire results.

THE FRUIT OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

Righteousness should bear fruit. It may be that the particular righteousness here in view is the conduct of the Philippians in contributing to Paul's support and the evangel. That was just. Some may reason that the glad tidings are free, that grace demands no payment for the benefits it brings. That is true. But is it right to drink of a fountain and not even tell others about it? In the last analysis, the Philippians had done no more than their duty in contributing to the evangel. But the fact that it was not done as a duty, but was the spontaneous outgrowth of the new life they had received, gives it a precious character not possessed by righteousness alone. It produced satisfaction and pleasure such as we experience when tasting of luscious fruit. It is delicious.

And this brings us to the most excellent and final fruit of all. It will be for the glory and laud of God. Briefly summed up, the prayer of Paul expresses his desire that these saints, whose love for him and the evangel has been practically expressed by many a gracious gift, may lead to their appreciation of God's greatest and latest revelation of His grace in giving the nations an equal place in the celestial honors of Christ's body. But, beyond this, he especially wishes that they may walk in accord with this final unfolding, and thus bring to God the glory and the applause which is the object and end of all things.

This phase of the joint participation in the evangel—the contribution of the Philippians to its support—is taken up again in the corresponding section, near the end of the epistle shown above. We will skip all in between and consider what Paul writes there as well (4:14-20). Here he changes the formula "a good work" to "do ideally." Many versions have practically blotted out the fine distinction between the good and the ideal. In fact the Authorized Version almost always renders both by "good," though sometimes by "well," as in this case. But here we have a deed which is more than merely good. It perfectly fits the circumstances, and is eminently acceptable and appropriate not only in the eyes of Paul, but of God.

I take it that there is a correspondence between their gift to Paul, and the grace which he has for them. He speaks of superabounding, of being filled full, of being paid in full, and it is very probable that he, as a Roman prisoner, was not in actual need, as had been the case before. It would seem that this gift was a material counterpart of the lavish grace then being dispensed to the nations, hence an acceptable and ideal contribution at this particular crisis. It was good for them to relieve the physical needs of the apostle during his itinerant ministry. It is ideal that he is overwhelmed with good things at the time when he has opened the flood gate of blessing for the nations.

Paul had not always been so satiated with good things. Yet was not this in spiritual accord with his ministry? He had been dispensing grace, but so long as Israel was the channel of blessing the vast riches of grace could not be revealed. Now that God goes to the nations directly, Paul's physical surroundings change to accord with it. This, of course, is no excuse for the ecclesias of Corinth, who would have allowed him to hunger if Philippi had not come to the rescue. Undoubtedly their excellent conduct in this matter, humanly speaking, entitled them to receive the supreme epistle on the subject of conduct, and enabled them to live according to a standard which is the highest presented to mortal man.

FRUIT, NOT GIFTS

In these days of systematized budgets, and envelope systems, and all sorts of schemes to finance the work of the church (we will not say, of the Lord), we have forgotten the great difference between gifts to support the work and fruit which pleases God. We want quantity, not quality. We reason that the unbeliever's money will buy just as many Bibles as the believer's. Not so thought our Lord. The widow's mite in His sight was more than a whole chest full of common coin. This is the point in Philippians. That Paul should be supplied is only a secondary side of the matter. That they should have given expression to their hearts, without any prompting or coercion, but simply as the outflow of their appreciation and love, makes their gift acceptable to God and is entered to their account, to meet them again in the day when all will receive awards for the good done in the body.

A FRAGRANT ODOR

This is the quality which pleases God in our efforts to work for Him. Not great doings, but gracious deeds rise to perfume His presence. Not mere service but sacrifice ascends to Him. Not the high achievements of a master mind and an indomitable will, but the humble attempts of a submissive and grateful heart are pleasing in His presence. Some may be too rich, or too great or too strong to procure a proper perfume for our God, but no one is too poor or too small or too weak to find a fragrant odor in which He can delight.

On the occasion of the collection for the saints in Judea, Paul, speaking of the saints in Macedonia, says that "the corresponding depth of their poverty superabounds to the riches of their generosity." And again, "according to their ability . . . and beyond their ability, of their own accord, with much entreaty beseeching of us the grace and fellowship in a service for the saints . . ." (2 Cor.8:2-5). This seems to show that the church chosen to be our example in acceptable giving was a very poor one. How happy would it make their hearts to hear the words of Paul as he assures them: "Now my God shall be filling your every need in accord with His riches in glory in Christ Jesus" (4:19). God will not be outdone in giving. With all His riches in glory in Christ Jesus He is able to repay a thousandfold every generous impulse of the lowliest saint.

The epistle proper closes much as it began, with an ascription of praise to our God and Father, closely related to the subject of giving. In this eon we can expect but little public response to the gracious gifts of our God. But in the eons to come His gifts will receive more appreciation, and His glory will no longer be hid. And the most potent means of displaying to the whole creation, in the heavens as well as upon the earth, the excellent graciousness of His gifts, and the love which is their source, will be the story of that secret by which He fills the heights of heaven with the lowest dregs of earth.

TRANSLATION NOTES

TWO CHANGES in vocabulary from the previous CV editions appear in the prospective revision at Philippians 1:7. The word "right" is used in place of "just," and "setting (my) mind" is substituted for "disposed."

Even though the word JUST is used as the English standard for all Greek words in the -dik- family, and this is mostly reflected in our translation (just, justice, justify, justly, etc.), its usage does not correspond to the scriptural usage of these Greek words as well as righteous (or, right). Both English words are used to refer to that which is right, but "just" is used more in a judicial sense, while "righteous" covers more ground, and is able more clearly to express the sense of "without wrong" when used of God or Christ, as well as describing our future state (cf Rom.5:19). Most English translation have recognized this by translating the noun (dikaiosunê) "righteousness" rather than "justice." However, English does not include the word "righteous-ify"), so we must continue to use "justify" for the Greek word dikaioō. Of course Paul was not claiming that he was absolutely without wrong in all his doings (as God is), but he was without wrong in setting his mind as he did with regard to the Philippians.

As for the use of "setting (one's) mind" instead of "disposed," (and "mindset" for "disposition"), the change makes the intended sense more explicit and clear. It is true that the Greek word used here (phroneō) does not include their word for "mind," but it may have developed from their word for the diaphragm, suggesting perhaps an idea in ancient Greece that our thoughts are pumped up in us by this inner structure as long as it operates. In any case, the English verb "be disposed" was used in the CV hopefully to convey a sense of mental inclination, which is supported by the Greek word in its contexts. Yet an even more forceful sense of active mental engagement is conveyed by the (relatively new) English word "mindset" and its verb forms. This is especially true when it is used of both Christ and the believer in Philippians 2:5. D.H.H.

JOINT PARTICIPANTS OF GRACE

PAUL'S letter to the Philippian saints is concerned with conduct as it reflects God's evangel concerning His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord. What he writes here is built on what he writes in the first five chapters of Romans, and corresponds especially with what he writes in Romans chapters 6 through 8.[1] Paul is not ashamed of the evangel even though it leaves no room whatsoever for human contribution and boasting. It is God's power, not human power, for salvation, and it reveals God's righteousness (not requiring human righteousness, but rather Christ's righteous response to His Father's sending, cf Rom.5:18) in gratuitously justifying the human by means of Jesus's faith (Rom.1:16,17; 3:21-28). God's righteousness is revealed by means of [Christ's] faith, that is, out of (Greek, ek) His faith, and this is for (the cause of), that is, directed into (Greek, eis) the believer's faith.

Four Greek words in Romans 1:17 provide, in a nutshell, the evangel and its operation in the believer: ek pisteōs eis pisteōs ("out-of faith, into faith"). The revelation of God's righteousness in dealing with human unrighteousness is sourced in Jesus Christ's faith in dying for sinners, and this is for the cause and invigorating power of our faith.

Philippians emphasizes the "into faith" part of this message. But, like Romans 6-8, it is built on the "out-of faith"

1. This is not to deny its special relationship with Ephesians and Colossians, but to recognize that even the evangel of the untraceable riches of Christ (Eph.3:8) is built on God's evangel of grace concerning His Son as expounded in Romans (cf Eph.2:8,9).

part, which tells of the faith and obedience of Jesus Christ. That is never left behind when further revelations are made regarding the future and the present lives of believers. Yet not only is Philippians built on that message of God's sending of His Son concerning sin, and His Son's faith in and faithfulness to that sending, but this evangel appears implicitly throughout the letter, and at significant places most explicitly. This is the message of God's gratuitous grace which God worked out in the Philippians' lives, as He jointly worked it out in Paul's (Phil.1:7; 2:13).

OUT OF FAITH

We must not take up the matter of conduct apart from God's evangel concerning His Son. This evangel is not a summons to righteousness, nor even to faith. Rather it is an announcement of grace which is a revelation of the righteousness of God and a commendation of the love of God, bringing joy and peace and spiritual invigoration to the believer. Philippians begins with Paul thanking God (not the Philippians) for what the Philippians had become and were doing (Phil.1:3-7).

In Romans 3:21,25 and 26, the words, "out of faith," become "through Jesus Christ's faith," then "the faith," and then "out of Jesus's faith." These references to the death of Christ for sinners as His "faith" are repeated in Galatians 2 and 3 as well, and in Ephesians 3:12, and also in Philippians 3:9. But in Philippians 2:5-8 they become the disposition, or "mindset which is in Christ Jesus." The faith of Jesus Christ, which is His mindset, is defined first as His emptying of Himself, followed by His humbling of Himself in becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

The basic meaning of "grace" is JOY. Joy and peace come to us from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. They come from God Who spares not His own Son, but gives Him up for us all (Rom.8:32), and thus through the Lord Jesus Christ, Who was obedient even to the death of the cross. They do not arise from the law, but from Jesus Christ's faith. And this is for our faith. This is for our believing, which brings with it joy and peace, and working in us, by God's grace, it infuses in us a mindset which corresponds to that of Christ Jesus.

FOR FAITH

Faith is a spiritual endowment of grace given to us by God and much needed today (cf 1 Cor.12:1,32; 13:13). Our faith is not the cause of justification and deliverance from sin and death, but is graciously given to us by God (Phil.1:29) on the basis of Christ's faith. As with Abraham, justification gained by Christ is reckoned to us who are believing what God says to us (Rom.4:20-25).

The evangel which Paul was bringing is for the progress and joy of faith (Phil.1:25). It does not bring a sense of wretchedness as the law brought to young Saul of Tarsus (Rom.7:21-24). Rather it brings a glorying (boasting) in Christ Jesus, which grows and superabounds more and more as we set our minds on it.

In Romans 5:19 the faith of Jesus Christ is called His "obedience" (UNDER-HEARing). That is, He listened attentively to the will of His God and Father for Him, and submitted Himself under its every term. While we are still sinners He dies for our sakes (Rom.5:8). In Romans 6:16,17 our apostle guides us to become slaves who are obeying this obedience of Christ. This means that the teaching of Christ's obedience is that message from God which we are to be listening to submissively. God does not put us under instructions of what we are to do (such as He did for our Lord), but under the declaration of what Christ Jesus has done, which powerfully affects our conduct.

This same pattern comes before us in Philippians 2:5-13.

The Philippians were always obeying the evangel Paul brought to them. They were hearkening to the message of the mindset of Jesus Christ in emptying Himself, taking the form of a slave, and humbling Himself in obedience unto death. And as they put their hearing under that evangel of grace (with joyful fear and exultant trembling) God was working in them to will as well as to work for the sake of His delight.

They were thus carrying their own salvation into effect, not by obedience to the law, but by setting their minds on the mindset of Christ in dying for their sake. That also is where and how God is working in us today.

As Saul of Tarsus, a Hebrew of Hebrews, Paul had gained much by listening to the words of God given in the law. But now God had made him acquainted with Jesus Christ as His Saviour, the One Who was obedient unto death. And he deemed what he had gained by his attentive listening to the law as a forfeit "because of the superiority of the knowledge of Christ Jesus" his Lord. Now he was having righteousness from (Greek, ek, out of) God. God was working out righteousness in Paul's life as he focused his mind and heart on the knowledge of Christ Jesus His Lord (Phil.3:4-12).

Here we see once again how much is missed, not only when righteousness is perceived to be the fruit of works of law, but when it is understood as based on our faith. What is said of Christ Jesus our Lord must not be taken to be of the human. This is so that what is said of Him may become operative in the believer. Our conduct is the result of God operating in us as we are believing and setting our minds to what Christ has done.

That explains why our conduct is crowned in Philippians 4:4, with these words: "Be rejoicing in the Lord always! Again, I will declare, be rejoicing."

D.H.H.

DEEMING IT TO BE REFUSE

(Philippians 3:1-21)

For the rest, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord. (3:1a)

As we consider Paul's entreaty here for faithful service to our Lord, let us continually be rejoicing in the Lord. While whenever we are not distracted from so doing, we cannot but rejoice in Christ in connection with our future salvation and glorification, here we are not called to a contemplation of these, but are instead enjoined to be rejoicing in our Lord in consideration of our service as slaves for His sake.

To be writing the same to you is not, indeed irksome for me, yet it is your security. (3:1b)

It is as if Paul is apologizing for repeating his entreaty so often for us to be rejoicing in the Lord. But since few seem even to grasp the point of his words in this connection, and even those who understand them need special grace in order to heed them, it is critical that he repeat and stress them on behalf of us all.

It is by no means irksome for Paul to be writing the same to us, for it is our security that he should do so in the interests of our faithful service, lest we be left to our own devices and be put to shame.

Even if inconsistent in their theology, in their way, all believers rely on Christ for salvation. Few indeed, however, have no confidence in the flesh (Phil.3:3b), which is to say, no confidence in themselves but in God (cf 2 Cor.1:9) as concerns their service for their Lord, upon Whom they are wholly dependent for any success therein.

Because of the darkness of our minds, intuitively, such an approach seems out of the question, since it conflicts with our received ideas as to moral responsibility. We fail to recognize that in our endeavors in which we effect (or produce) our own salvation as concerns our practical affairs, it is in fact God Who is operating in us for the sake of His delight both the willing and the doing in which we engage unto this end (cf Phil.2:12,13).

Yet if we should come to realize that as the Image of the invisible God, it is Christ Himself Who as our Lord motivates and inspires us so that we therefore enjoy a demonstrable measure of ability (i.e., "invigoration") in His service, how can we not but rejoice in Him? "For the rest, brethren mine, be invigorated in the Lord and in the might of His strength" (Eph.6:10). Hence, "Be rejoicing in the Lord always! Again, I will declare, be rejoicing!" (Phil.4:4).

Beware of curs, beware of evil workers. (3:2)

Those who are figured here as "curs," who, however fine fellows they may be in their own person, are in a certain respect not doers of good, but "evil workers." This is because, however unwittingly, they stand in opposition to the apostle in his insistence on our putting no confidence in the flesh, whether as concerns not only our ancestral pedigree but even our own righteousness which is of law.

Those who see value and importance in those very things which Paul deems his refuse, who therefore insist on retrieving them out of Paul's refuse container, are indeed, in this respect, like the wild dogs of the east, who are quite undiscriminating in what they are willing to ingest.

Beware of the maimcision, for we are the circumcision who are offering divine service in the spirit of God, and are glorying in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in flesh. (3:3)

In the present administration, unlike in previous ones, "Circumcision is nothing . . ." (1 Cor.7:19). What was once a token of covenant relationship with the Deity, is now a mere mutilation of the flesh. Conversely, as those who place no confidence in the flesh and are glorying in Christ Jesus, we become the genuine Circumcision, for this is what the rite signified, in the cutting off of the flesh. Circumcision—as the type of all law-obedience for salvation—has become a badge of apostasy. Beware, then, of the maimcision!

And am I having confidence in flesh, also? If any other one is presuming to have confidence in flesh, I rather: in circumcision the eighth day, of the race of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews, in relation to law, a Pharisee, in relation to zeal, persecuting the ecclesia, in relation to the righteousness which is in law, becoming blameless. (3:4-6)

All of these are concerned with confidence in the flesh; most have to do with a place of nobility for an esteemed Israelite under law, while two of these (membership in the sect of the Pharisees, and zealotry for the putative virtue of persecution of the ecclesia) are concerned simply with the approval of one's peers in the pursuit of "orthodoxy."

But things which were gain to me, these I have deemed a forfeit because of Christ. But, to be sure, I am also deeming all to be a forfeit because of the superiority of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, my Lord, because of Whom I forfeited all, and am deeming it to be refuse . . . (3:7,8a)

The Greek word which the CV translates "refuse," skubalon, is an interesting term. It is a New Testament hapax legomenon ("[something] said only once"); that is, a word that occurs only once in a single corpus or body of literature.

The AV translation "dung" accords more with the usage in Josephus (Jewish War, 5.571) where in the final siege of the Romans in the Jewish War (66-73 A.D.) some of the Jews were reduced to such straits that they searched the sewers for old cow dung and ate the "offal" (skubalon; i.e., the residual garbage) therefrom.

The CV translation "refuse" corresponds to the usage found in the apocryphal work Sirach (or Ecclesiasticus; 27:4): "As when one sifts with a sieve, the refuse [skubalon] remains; so also the filth of man in his speech." Similarly, in the collection of the Rylands Papyri (2.149.22; 39-40 A.D.) the writer speaks of animals grazing on "the gleanings [skubalon, i.e., 'residuals'] of my vegetable-seed crop." Apart from connotative usage, then, the essence of skubalon appears to signify that which remains as a residue, which is appropriately discarded as worthless.

These things which had been "gain" to Paul, he now deems a "forfeit" (i.e., something to which the right is lost). He does so gladly "because of Christ"—with a view to "gaining Christ" in his own awareness and practical service, in consideration of the true significance of the cross, in the victory achieved there.

Paul accordingly not only forfeits all (giving up the rights and benefits thereof), but deems it as refuse as well, which is to say as mere residue, which is to be discarded as worthless.

It is "the righteousness which is in law" (Phil.3:6) and "of law" (Phil.3:9), which includes God's law given to Israel but is not confined to it, which most cannot believe we are to deem as refuse and so discard accordingly insofar as our standing before God is concerned. Yet it is here that we are "complete" in Christ (cf Col.2:10), and so simply have no need of law-obedience for our justification.

Further, we cannot "fully follow [Paul]" in his "teaching" (2 Tim.3:10) for our service in which he gives no entreaty for us to heed any directives of Moses at all per se, while at the same time taking it upon ourselves to look to Moses' law for instruction concerning our walk. Instead, our apostle declares, since we are complete in Christ, "Let no one, then, be judging you in food or in drink or in the particulars of a festival, or of a new moon, or of sabbaths, which are a shadow of those things which are impending—yet the body is the Christ's" (Col.2:16,17). As those who are so closely identified with Christ as to be figured as members of His own body (Eph.5:30), we simply have no need to be "scrutinizing" days and months and seasons and years (cf Gal.4:10) within a code of law never given to us, which we are nowhere enjoined to heed.

The "all" which Paul deems a forfeit and as worthless refuse includes all that which the Israelite people deemed most valuable—in which they placed their confidence, albeit, as aptly termed by Paul, a "confidence in flesh," whether of heritage, peer approval, or obedience to law.

Insofar as their standing before God was concerned, they were confident that their pedigree and law-obedience were the sine qua non ("without which, not") of divine blessing.

Today, perhaps all believers are enlightened sufficiently to know that, in Christ, it is simply not important whether we are of Israelite descent at all, or whether we have obeyed the law concerning circumcision. Many, however, suppose that what is in fact a certain "righteousness in law" is essential to their salvation. This is so whether such a righteousness in law is based upon various portions of the law of Yahweh given to Israel, particular instructions of Jesus given to his disciples, or sundry imperatives of service contained in the epistles of Paul.

Many suppose that they must avoid various sins while achieving at least some minimal level of virtue or else they will be confined to hell for all eternity.

Others, more enlightened in a way, recognize that one's outward acts (whether of sinful deeds or virtuous endeavors) are simply not determinative of one's destiny.

Such ones, however, insist that a certain inward activity of mind in which one willingly acquiesces to the influences of the spirit and thus accepts Christ as one's Saviour, is determinative of one's destiny unto salvation.

Such a mental act, however, is deemed not as simply a proximate cause of one's salvation, one which itself is but the fruit of divine grace, but instead as a requisite act, ultimately under one's own control, which is the ultimate cause of one's salvation.

In the end, then, those holding this position finally make man his own saviour just as surely as those who do so more overtly through explicit appeals to law-obedience if one would escape hell and gain heaven.

. . . that I should be gaining Christ, and may be found in Him, not having my righteousness, which is of law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is from God for faith: (3:8b,9)

Thus we "gain Christ" in a true recognition of Him; we decidedly do not gain Christ as our Saviour by our correct understanding of His truth, but by God's own choice "before the disruption of the world" (Eph.1:4), in accord with the grace given to us in Christ Jesus before times eonian (2 Tim.1:9). We would be found in Him as those not having their own righteousness which is of law, but that which is through the faith(fulness) of Christ, the righteousness which is from God, [based] "on the [i.e., 'this'] faith" (literal rendering).

This is all unto the end:

to know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, conforming to His death, if somehow I should be attaining to the resurrection that is out from among the dead. Not that I already obtained, or am already perfected. Yet I am pursuing, if I may be grasping also that for which I was grasped also by Christ Jesus.

Brethren, not as yet am I reckoning myself to have grasped, yet one thing—forgetting, indeed, those things which are behind, yet stretching out to those in front—toward the goal am I pursuing for the prize of God's calling above in Christ Jesus. (3:10-14)

We may conform ourselves to His death, by "reckoning [ourselves] to be dead, indeed, to Sin, yet living to God in Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Rom.6:11). Then, in contending the ideal contest of the faith, we may, in spirit, even seek the attainment of "the resurrection that is out from among the dead," as those who would "get hold of eonian life" (1 Tim.6:12; 19) even now.

Even Paul could only pursue this goal that he might grasp it; he had not yet obtained it or become already perfected therein. Thus he emphasizes the importance of "forgetting" (figuratively, at least) those things which are behind that he might stretch out to those in front: namely, the pursuit of the prize, that of a vital, present-day foretaste of God's calling above in Christ Jesus in the coming eon, which itself is not a prize at all, but a gracious gift, granted to us gratuitously in God's grace.

Whoever, then, are mature, may be disposed to this, and if in anything you are differently disposed, this also shall God reveal to you. (3:15)

How encouraging these words are! If we are not yet sufficiently mature to grasp the true sense of Paul's words here, do not be worrying about anything (cf Phil.4:6), God shall reveal it to us in due course. To our own master we are standing or falling. Now we will be made to stand, for the Lord is able to make us stand (cf Rom.14:4).

Moreover, in what we outstrip others, there is to be a mutual disposition to be observing the elements by the same rule. (3:16)

As we observe the elements of our faith and its concomitant faithfulness (cp Rom.4:12), while recognizing that we possess an enlightenment enjoyed by few others, let us be disposed not to this fact alone. Instead, let us have a "mutual disposition" which includes a mindfulness as well to this "same rule" of outstripping others when it comes to "elementing" our faith, that is to engaging in a faithful walk, suited to the nobility of our position as sons of God and ambassadors of Christ (cf Gal.6:15,16; Eph.1:5; 2 Cor.5:20).

Become imitators together of me, brethren, and be noting those who are walking thus, according as you have us for a model . . . (3:17)

In all of these things, let us be imitating Paul, while noting others as well who are walking thus, for we have all such ones as a model (cf 2 Tim.3:10,11).

. . . for many are walking, of whom I often told you, yet now am lamenting also as I tell it, who are enemies of the cross of Christ, whose consummation is destruction, whose god is their bowels, and whose glory is in their shame, who to the terrestrial are disposed. (3:18,19)

Many who are friends of Christ, are nevertheless enemies of the cross of Christ, insofar as its significance is concerned in the achievement of God's purpose to become All in all (1 Cor.15:28). The consummation which is theirs ("whose consummation") for such unfaithful service is that of a certain "destruction" (or "loss"), namely that which will obtain when they, even as ourselves, are manifested before the dais of Christ and are requited for their practices through the body, whether good or bad (2 Cor.5:10). "If anyone's work shall be burned up, he will forfeit it, yet he shall be saved, yet thus, as through fire" ((1 Cor.3:15).

For our realm is inherent in the heavens, out of which we are awaiting a Saviour also, the Lord, Jesus Christ, Who will transfigure the body of our humiliation, to conform it to the body of His glory, in accord with the operation which enables Him even to subject all to Himself. (3:20,21)

Our realm inheres in the heavens, where God rouses us together and seats us together among the celestials, that, in the oncoming eons, He should be displaying the transcendent riches of His grace in His kindness to us in Christ Jesus (Eph.2:5-7). How we long to have the body of our humiliation conformed to the body of His glory. Yet this is just what He will do, "in accord with the operation which enables Him even to subject all to Himself." How great is our Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ! J.R.C.

DO NOT WORRY ABOUT ANYTHING

"DO NOT worry about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God, and the peace of God, that is superior to every frame of mind, shall be garrisoning your hearts and your apprehensions in Christ Jesus" (Phil.4:6,7).

There is an elixir of life in words like these. Touching life at all points, they embrace every experience, and affect every problem. How positive they are, how emphatic! There is no room left for the smallest doubt to intrude. The words are just an exquisite echo of the Psalmist's thought—"fret not thyself!"

How complete, how inclusive the injunction is! Do not worry about anything. Not a single thing. But can we realize it? Is it possible to live up to such a counsel of perfection? A thousand times, yes! And for the great reason that this rare paragraph enshrines a God-given assurance. There is a promise, a pledge of a superior peace—the peace of God, His perfect provision for the keeping, the steadying of our hearts in Christ Jesus.

What an expression of God's solicitude! And for each of us to make true in the circumstances of life. How true, rests with the quality of our reliance upon God, in how far we leave things to Him, for His working out. And His appointment is never a disappointment. Therefore, on no account are we to worry. It does no good, changes nothing, nor ever gives us back the thing we prized. It enfeebles and wastes our strength, keeps the brain excited, the blood feverish, and the heart beating wildly.

If, then, we must not worry, and there are things in life calculated to make us anxious, how may we displace worry? By taking God into our confidence as we voice immediate needs. "With thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God." Note the proviso—with thanksgiving, which in itself affects the burdened mind. Indeed, thankfulness for the simple things of life, the ordinary, forgettable things, means much.

The tragic indictment of the ancient world was that, "knowing God, not as God do they glorify or thank Him." Stars in the heaven are thanked, and saints in the calendar, but not God. May we be giving thanks always, for all things, to God. Untold occasions call for it, and a voiced acknowledgment deepens our consciousness of His daily care.

No aspect or department of life is outside the interest of God, our Father. He is at all times an interested Listener. Our requests, therefore, may be unreservedly made known. Let them flow forth, without any concern as to how they will be met. That rests with God's will and wisdom, according to which, all the intricacies of life are appointed. Has He not ordered them, appointing each one, both good and ill?

There are some things in life God would not have us change! And happy are we, if, in the acceptance of them, we see the Father's own rare ordering. Let us so live, in the spirit of a line from a hymn: "I do not ask to see the distant scene, one step enough for me." It suffices that we make our requests known to God, and leave them with Him. This done, with thanksgiving, there will come to heart and mind, God's own wonderful peace.

"And the peace of God, that is superior to every frame of mind, shall be garrisoning your hearts and your apprehensions in Christ Jesus." Here, in a peace which surpasses all power of thought, lies the strength and joy of Paul's counsel of perfection. It is the peace of God, in contrast with and superior to all human counsel, palliative, or panacea.

Gift of the God of peace; it is the only calm in a world of unrest. But O, how this peace differs from that which the world offers! We see the word used all around us. Yet how little it conveys, how far short it falls, of all that such a word "peace" should stand for! Does it not look lost, as a wandering star from its orbit?

Only as linked with God and His ministering grace, does the Word hold real comfort and consolation. In such union it has vital power, confirming its frequent and heartening occurrence in the calm of a rich content. The peace of God. Grace and peace. Yes, yes. In spite of all around us, and the tangle of daily events. For our hearts shall be as a citadel, gloriously kept. "The Lord is thy Keeper."

What a glad secret of life! One that Christ Himself exemplified. He did not worry or fret impatiently. He trusted, He rested supremely in God. He gave Himself completely over to God. He prayed, "My Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass by from Me. Moreover, not as I will, but as You!" (Matt.26:39).

How sublime an example of utter submission to God's will! There has been but One, and there will never be another so altogether acquiescent to the Father's will. The purpose, will, and majesty of God, the Father, was everything to Him. How much so we have yet to see. In the meanwhile, let us hold by this superior peace. It is resident in Him. He is our peace, and He is on the throne, even the throne of the universe.

Therefore, "do not worry about anything." Rather, "with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God." In these two statements we have first a prohibition, then an injunction. Is it not that prayer should be the death of care? It follows, however, that the source or cause of worry should not be self-made. It should be that imposed on us, and not something fashioned by ourselves which we persist in carrying. This we must throw away. Life, to be happily lived, must have in all its aspects, a felt consciousness of God. At all times there should be a sense of God's ruling. For, not only is God operating the universe in accord with the counsel of His will, but Christ is carrying it on by His powerful declaration. What control is here, and how complete! Just to feel that we are entirely in God's hands, flung upon His care and control, is to know a peace inviolate.

What small resemblance to the faith of Christ our faltering trust displays. Self looms so largely with us, and thus disquietude. Not so with our Lord. He displayed the dignity of complete assurance. Rejecting His disquietude, He puts in its place the thought of the majesty and power of God the Father.

Let us learn of Him to quietly accept our Father's will. Let us be disposed to that which is above, where Christ is, enthroned at God's right hand. Then shall we know the peace of God, and how superior it is to every frame of mind. And the God of peace shall be with you, in every moment, every hour.

"Drop Thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease;
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let our ordered lives confess
The beauty of Thy peace."

HARRY WATTS

War veteran, bus driver, husband, father, friend of many, brother in the Lord, Harry Watts was a servant of a small monthly assembly in Kitchener, Ontario, for many years. He died at the age of 95 on May 10, 2019.

He was a man of optimistic expectation (not simply "hope"). This was because God graciously granted him faith centered in the giving of His Son for sinners. Those who knew him will miss him for awhile. But God's purpose for him in Christ will be realized, as it will for us all together.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

AS WE CONTINUE to give special attention to Paul's letter to the Philippians, let us rejoice with our apostle in all that he writes concerning Christ Jesus, our Lord. No matter the motive, "Christ is being announced" still today, and we are rejoicing in this also, and we will be rejoicing as Paul was rejoicing, nevertheless, even in the restrictions placed on his ministry (Phil.1:18). What a joy it is for us to meditate on these things of consequence (Phil.1:10) together with our readers!

"Short as it is, no other book contains the word rejoice as often as Philippians" (p.77).

God's evangel of grace (JOY) and peace which Paul was bringing does not accord with human wisdom, but it is "God's power for salvation to everyone who is believing it" (Rom.1:16). This salvation "is not only a future event, but a present power and should be the preponderant influence in our lives" (p.74).

We hear the message of what has been done in bold and faithful terms in Philippians 2:6-8, and of that which shall be in 2:9-11. In accord with the apostle's special concern in this epistle for our present conduct, this evangel is introduced with his entreaty: "Let this disposition ["mindset," revised CVNT, cf p.52] be in you, which is in Christ Jesus also" (Phil.2:5).

Consequently, in our present lives we are to be setting our minds and subjecting our hearing to this message of Christ's mindset and obedience. As we do so, God will be working in us to will as well as to work in carrying our salvation into effect, for the sake of His delight (Phil.2:12,13).

Regarding this, we direct attention especially to the articles beginning on pages 79 and 87.

We present now the particular sections of Philippians (as currently being revised) under discussion in the articles that follow: D.H.H.

PAUL'S AFFAIRS (Phil.1:12-30)

PAUL'S AFFAIRS

(Philippians 1:12-30–4:10-13)

THE AFFAIRS of Paul, the slave of Christ Jesus, at the crisis which introduced the present administration of God's transcendent grace, are of extraordinary interest and importance to those who wish to walk in accord with the will of God. As the framework of Philippians shows, he discusses his affairs twice, in two balancing sections, one near the beginning, and the other at the end of the epistle. First he brings up his bonds in Christ (1:12-18). Corresponding to this he speaks of his strength in Christ (4:13). In the early part of the epistle he expands on his indifference to death (1:19-26). In the latter he declares his complacency in want. Besides this, in each section, he touches on the experience of the Philippians, their suffering with Paul (1:27) and their care of him (4:10).

PAUL'S BONDS IN CHRIST

The vast divergence between the Kingdom and the present is graphically set forth by the bonds of Peter and Paul. Herod had Peter bound with two chains, besides the four quaternions of soldiers to guard him (Acts 12). Paul, in Rome, seems to have been bound with only one chain (Acts 28:20; Eph.6:20; 2 Tim.1:16) with a single soldier to guard him (Acts 28:16). Yet God is not hindered by man's might. He acts in accord with His spiritual plans. The Kingdom is a display of His power on earth. Hence its chief representative must be freed. The present is a display of God's weakness, hence Paul is not set at liberty by miraculous means. To Peter God sends His messenger.

The very gates of the jail opened to him spontaneously. He is extricated out of the hands of Herod. So long as the Kingdom was being heralded, Peter had power superior to all of earth's rulers.

And, so long as this Kingdom was the subject of Paul's preaching he also was freed from jail, as at Philippi itself (Acts 16). But now that the Kingdom has been definitely rejected by the Jewish nation, God has changed His mode of operation, so that it is quite the reverse. The symbol of the evangel becomes a chained ambassador (Eph.6:20). Nothing else could so graphically illustrate the fact that God is conciliated toward this warring world. He is for peace with mankind, and even the most flagrant provocation, such as the imprisonment of His ambassador, will not change His attitude toward it. So, for two whole years at the commencement of this economy, God stages a picture which portrays its essential features.

To us, with our dull minds and feeble apprehensions, this change in the outward fortunes of God's chosen witness may not mean very much. But this was especially real to the Philippians, as Paul's release from prison, with the accompanying earthquake, must have been one of the most cherished memories of the jailor and all the members of the ecclesia at Philippi. At first sight it would seem to them, as it does to most of us, that Paul's imprisonment must be a great hindrance to the evangel. Not merely that he himself could no longer go about to make it known, but that his sufferings would intimidate others, so that the evangel would cease to be heralded at all, or at least with far less boldness than before. All of this arises from a failure to realize the vast change the evangel itself had undergone, which made so striking a contrast in its symbolic expression.

With this in mind we are able to understand why Paul assures the Philippians that his affairs were no hindrance, but rather had come to be for the progress of the evangel. Since they had given the message such hearty support, this would be most welcome in their ears. Paul has not been robbed of an audience. Quite the contrary, he has been brought to the most desirable audience that could be found. The whole pretorium heard of him. This was not necessarily, as some translations have it, the "palace" of the emperor, but the guard, which had an enormous influence, and may have been used by God as a means of spreading the evangel far more effectively and expeditiously than if the apostle had been at liberty. He came into touch with Caesar's very household (4:22).

It may also have been intended by God to serve notice on the political powers that this evangel could not come into conflict with their authority. The Kingdom message and the mixed message of the church in these degenerate days are a menace to the governments of the earth, but the true evangel for today has no right to interfere with this world's politics. Can we not see all this in the fact that Paul was put under the power of the Roman guard in the capital city itself? There was no friction there, and this may have been a great help in allaying suspicion elsewhere, for the Romans were quick to crush any sect which had political aims. Moreover, Paul was allowed many privileges. Perhaps it was the gift received from Philippi which enabled him to hire a house of his own (Acts 28:30).

It is only as we realize that Paul's bonds are in fullest accord with the evangel in its latest form, that we are able to appreciate his insistence on boldness in making it known. A prisoner of Caesar's can hardly be bold. But if the bonds are in Christ, and according to God's will, and calculated to advance the evangel, then it may be heralded freely and boldly, as it is fitting that it should. Hence Paul asked for prayer that he might open his mouth with boldness, to make known the secret of the evangel, for which he was conducting an embassy in a chain, that in it he should be bold, as he must speak (Eph.6:19-20). We have every reason to think that this prayer was answered, and that, though he was bound, the evangel was free and was heralded with the utmost fearlessness.

Nor was Paul alone in this. The majority of the brethren, instead of being timid in their heralding lest they also be put in a chain, are more exceedingly daring to speak the word of God fearlessly. They realized that God had placed Paul in an ideal position to defend the evangel. Here he could "teach that which concerns the Lord Jesus Christ with all boldness, unforbidden" (Acts 28:31). The evangel wins its way in the very capital of its enemies. This must have been a very great consolation and encouragement to him. Instead of his imprisonment becoming the death blow of the glad tidings, it is the signal for fresh confidence and new delight.

So great became the confidence—one is almost tempted to say carelessness or recklessness—that some even pretended to preach Christ in order to bring Paul into trouble. Possibly their faction did not realize the full truth of the secret of the evangel, and heralded a semi-kingdom mixture as many have done since, to which the authorities could rightly object. Be that as it may, even their envy and strife, so unbecoming to those who pretend to proclaim peace, even that does not hinder the evangel, for Christ is announced nevertheless. Hence Paul is rejoicing in the advance of the evangel, which seems to make better progress against the wind than with it. May we also learn this lesson, and rejoice that neither foe nor friend can find a means of defeating His gracious purpose in Christ Jesus our Lord.

PAUL'S INDIFFERENCE TO DEATH

To magnify Christ is the one object now before His aged slave, and he tests everything which comes to him from this standpoint alone. Of course the great question before him and before his friends, the Philippians, is the outcome of his imprisonment. He must face the possibility that the verdict will be death. But this does not disturb him. Either life or death must be met in the same way. He is concerned rather that he may not be put to shame in anything, that even the fear of death shall not make him timid, that his customary boldness in making Christ known may not be lacking as he faces the fate of a martyr.

So he weighs all the possibilities and finds that he has no real choice in the matter. Living, to him, meant Christ. Dying, as a witness for Christ, would be gain to both himself and the cause of Christ. If he lives, there will be fruit from further efforts. Whether these will equal the results of a martyr's death could not be known, so he does not give his preference (1:22). At this point the attentive reader of the usual versions finds that Paul goes on to contradict what he has just been saying. He has made it clear that he is indifferent, yet he now goes on to say that he is in a strait betwixt these two, which is quite the opposite of indifference. But then he makes it clear that he is not in a strait at all, but prefers to "depart" (which must mean death). This, he says, is far better. In brief, he wished to be convicted, yet made every effort to defend himself!

The lack of all consistency in the passage, as ordinarily translated, is matched by its utter lack of conformity to the Original, in which there is no such confusion of thought. What Paul has said as to his own attitude is not denied. He is quite complacent as to the outcome of his trial, so far as he himself is concerned. Yet from their standpoint he realizes that his continuance in the flesh would be of more advantage. Therefore he is confident that he will remain and abide for their progress and joy of faith, that their glorying may be superabounding in Christ Jesus, through his presence with them again. He was later released, and doubtless was with them as he had hoped. But, as this part of his career is not symbolic of the present grace, it is suppressed in the Scriptures. We are to look upon him as bound in body but free in spirit to the last.

When I was in Rome I was surprised to find that the statues of Paul usually put a sword in his hand, until my guide explained that it was customary to depict each of the saints with the instrument that caused his death. Judged by the other relics in Rome, especially the traces left by Peter (who never was there) we may be quite certain that Paul was not executed with the sword, if he was killed at all. The legends to this effect cannot be substantiated by the Scriptures. This relieves us of another incubus of theology, the mythical second imprisonment of the apostle. All such additions to the sacred text are mischievous and altogether unnecessary for faith.

Paul, in characterizing his death, speaks of it as a libation, a dissolution, (2 Tim.4:6). This has no suggestion of violence, as is the case with Peter. The course and outcome of Paul's trial is given us in his second epistle to Timothy. "At my first defense no one came along with me, but all abandoned me. May it not be reckoned against them! Yet the Lord stood beside me, and He invigorates me, that through me the heralding may be fully discharged, and all the nations should hear, and I am rescued out of the mouth of the lion. The Lord will be rescuing me from every wicked work and will be saving me for His celestial kingdom . . ." (2 Tim.4:16-18). These words seem to show clearly that he was released, and that his confident words to the Philippians were fulfilled.

In view of all these facts the ordinary renderings, which make Paul desirous of death, are to be viewed with suspicion. In that case his release was "far worse" than his death! A concordant rendering, as usual, disposes of all of the difficulties. Paul was not in a strait betwixt life and death, but there was pressure from both which took him out of them. The accurate, literal rendering is I-AM-BEING-pressed YET OUT OF-THE TWO. Neither life nor death has the attractive power of another, a third alternative—to be together with Christ. This is what should always be before our hearts, as it was with Paul. This is the solution to the question, life or death? The answer is neither. Rather let us have immortality when we are together with Christ, for it, rather, is much better.

Death is not far better than life, and Paul could not have made such a statement. This whole passage has lost its force because the church has lost its proper expectation. Death was always banished from the presence of Christ when He was on earth. No one goes to Him in death. If any did they would be dead no longer. It is His presence which calls them back to life in the resurrection. Let us be like Paul. Between life and death we would not choose, but rather let us yearn for that gracious and glorious event which is ever imminent—the presence of Christ and our gathering together unto Him.

PAUL'S COMPLACENCY

Paul's experience with the evangel, as well as his varying supply of material support had taught him one of the most blessed of all lessons—that of contentment apart from prevailing circumstances. He had learned to be content in that in which he was (4:11-12). Humbled and hungry, or superabounding and satisfied, he did not wish it otherwise. The reason was that he had been initiated. This word mueō is closely connected with the word mystery musterion. In earlier eras God not only hid what He purposed in the future, but, as a result, it was unknown why He dealt as He did with His creatures. Since He has made His purpose fully known, we have the privilege of going behind the scenes, and know that every detail of our experience has a blessed sequel, hence do not wish to change aught in the least. We know why God sends us wealth and want, and we are content, even if it does not suit our souls.

THE PHILIPPIANS SUFFER WITH PAUL

Philippi was a Roman colony, so that it was a Rome in miniature and much would be made of the duties as well as the privileges of citizenship. Paul uses this as the basis of his exhortation for the future. They have heard of his concerns. Now he hopes to hear of theirs, that they are standing firm in one spirit, one soul, competing together in the faith of the evangel (1:27). Later on he uses this same figure to enforce the great truth that their citizenship belongs to the heavens (3:20). But here we have rather the unity or community of effort which should characterize every local company of believers who seek to spread the glad tidings. Not only is there the sevenfold unity of the spirit to unite them (Eph.4:3-6), but there should also be a unity of soul and of effort in service.

Faithful heralding of the evangel is bound to stir up opposition. It reveals the destruction of the stubborn as well as the salvation of those who believe, notwithstanding its insistence on peace, and that God is now conciliated, so that all may be reconciled to Him by simply receiving the proffered gift of Christ. The city that flogged and imprisoned Paul because he had done a good deed, which interfered with the sordid gains of a few of their number, would not hesitate to mishandle those who followed in his steps.

There is one thing which is even better than serving our blessed Lord, and that is to suffer for His sake. It seems to be a special grace granted to the faithful, more especially as they have fellowship with Paul and with the struggle which came to him when he first made public the present secret administration. Much of this suffering arises from the great changes which were introduced and because only a few cut cleanly with the past. Others held on to it with its religion and fleshly prerogatives. This was aggravated as time went on. All Asia and eventually nearly all the saints everywhere forsook Paul and his final message. The few who have had even an inkling of it have had to suffer, not merely from unbelievers, but from their own fellow saints.

These are not the sufferings of Paul which came to him from lack of support, or danger, or his many enemies. These could not touch him now. But they were none the less real and painful. In this very epistle he speaks of envy and strife and faction (1:15,17), of evil workers, of the maimcision (3:2), of the many whose walk made them enemies of the cross, who are disposed to the terrestrial (3:18-19). And if such were present in his days, what must be the case today? Is there envy or strife or faction? Are there evil workers, Judaizers, enemies of the cross among the saints now? Are some disposed to the terrestrial? Very few of us are not included in these terms. If Paul were present he would be a great sufferer, even if he had no wants and endured no afflictions. And so it will be with us if we are fully in fellowship with him (2 Tim.3:12).

Paul lamented over the enemies of the cross. What a lamentation there would be if any number of the saints were so sensitive at the present time! Even where the death of Christ is preached, the manner of it, and its utter condemnation of the flesh and the world are seldom seen in our conduct. And celestial citizenship has been exchanged for terrestrial dominion or service, with good government or social reform or sanitation as its aim. It is simply that we whose eyes are opened to these lamentable conditions have been hardened to them. If we were not callous our suffering would incapacitate us for service.

But ours is not to dwell upon such things, but rather on the side of rejoicing. The suffering will have a glorious compensation in the future. And the present is never without ground for joy. To correspond with the section which speaks of the Philippians' suffering with Paul, we find him rejoicing greatly that their disposition toward him had found expression. In the living language of the epistle it is compared with a plant which was waiting for warmth in order to bloom. Now that their disposition had blossomed in their contribution, he has occasion to rejoice greatly.

Such were Paul's affairs at the beginning of this economy. And, in a very real sense, such are his affairs today. The difference is only one of degree. It is only as we are in living sympathy with his way at this juncture that we will be able to walk and please God under the very special conditions which pertain to the present grace. I will not apologize in the least for going into his affairs in some detail. It can hardly be overdone. When so much time is spent in following in the footprints of Christ when He was ministering to the Circumcision, leading to endless perplexity, it is high time that we consider the conduct of the one whom God has given as a model for us who are of the Uncircumcision. This alone will enable us to walk worthily of the special and supernal calling with which He has called us.

Who can walk worthily of a calling which he does not apprehend? Let us not strive to be what we are not. All God asks of us is to live up to what He has made us.

The preparation for such a walk, the power for such deportment, lies in a consciousness of our high social standing among God's nobility. Among men we readily recognize a nobleman by the superficial niceties of his conduct. We ought to be the true nobility, known by the deeper and more enduring virtues which adorn the doctrine we profess.

A. E. Knoch

THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST

(Philippians 2:1-18)

PRACTICE is more powerful than precept. Deeds may do more than declarations in directing our lives. In Ephesians we have already been told how we should walk. In Philippians we are given examples of such conduct in the careers of others. We are pointed to the kenosis of Christ (He "empties Himself"), the forfeits of Paul, the solicitude of Timothy, and the suffering of Epaphroditus. These are the special characters in Holy Writ who are presented for our emulation within the boundaries of this present secret administration. Hence they should be frequent and foremost in our exhortations. They should be the leading characters in Christendom.

How far have we failed in this matter! More picturesque characters occupy the attention of Christians, and are hailed in their literature and songs. Even the children sing, "Dare to be a Daniel, dare to stand alone." But who does it? He would not be a second Daniel, but a fanatic. It is well to be reminded of the patience of Job. But we must not count on his reward. And it is excellent to consider the heroes of faith in the eleventh of Hebrews. But the object and end of their faith are not the same as ours. All of this is instructive and profitable, but cannot compare with the special examples selected by God for us, to guide our feet in His service in this era which is so different from all that preceded, or that will succeed it. Let us henceforth focus our attention on these models exclusively for a while, and see if we can profit by their example.

This is especially true of the Psalms. In the dim light of the Reformation and even among those more enlightened in later days, the Psalms have been acclaimed as the greatest source of strength for communion and conduct. Good as they are, they never attain, not even in their highest strain, to the grace and glory which should empower our conduct at the present time. In one way, indeed, the Psalms are in antithesis to present truth, and, we fear, hinder its full apprehension. Being concerned with Israel and the Kingdom, they are disposed to the terrestrial, which we should not be. When we leave them in their own setting, they are even more wonderful and helpful while singing with grace in our hearts to God (cf Col.3:16).

This celestial character of our walk is especially clear in connection with the example of Christ (Phil.2:5-8). In setting forth a synopsis of His humiliation, no details of His earthly life are given. The earth seems to serve only as a place on which to erect the accursed tree. There is no mention of His ministry to the Circumcision, or of His royal rights. He comes in the form of a slave, in the likeness of humanity. His life on earth serves as the supreme example for the Circumcision. He was their copy, their "underwriting." They are to follow Him in His footprints (1 Peter 2:21). For them no other example is needed. But with us it is different. Only His relation to the earth as the place of humiliation is put before us. The details must be filled in by others. These are involved in His cross, but they are not apparent until the depth of human infamy has been sounded by the apostasy of Israel.

EXHORTATION TO A MUTUAL DISPOSITION

We now come to the first of the four exhortations which are found in Philippians. It is strikingly like the opening exhortation in Ephesians 4:1-6. There humility was coupled with unity. The unity of the spirit is to be kept with the tie of peace. Where pride prevails this unity fails. So also here. Humility is associated with a mutual disposition. The slight difference in viewpoint arises from the character of the epistles. It may be seen in the words used. In Ephesians it is one. In Philippians it is same. The spirit's unity consists in one body, one spirit, one expectation, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God. Corresponding to this, in service there should be in all the same disposition, the same love, souls joined together, disposed to one thing (Phil.2:2). This might be called the unity of the soul, for it is the effect of the unity of the spirit, the outward evidence of the inward power.

Unity of spirit and a mutual disposition are the great need for effective service, even among believers. This is because we are by no means perfected as yet. We are still selfish. We are prone to two sins which should be utterly absent—strife and vainglory. These are products of pride. If we consider ourselves better than others it will lead to contention. If we desire that our superiority be recognized it will be naught but vainglory. No one knows how subtle and widespread these failings are because no one recognizes them as such. They are not condemned, but condoned. We do not expect anyone to allow his pride to be touched. We almost demand that this be resented. Humility—true humility—is considered a weakness unworthy of a man and a Christian.

It is not easy for us to recognize the justice of this. If we really possess superior qualities or have advanced to attainments beyond others, why should we not claim due recognition? The answer is very simple. All true worth will be rewarded in the future. But now is the time of service. It is most likely that, in that day, only that will be found genuine which did not fight for recognition. All other glory will be found without solid contents, an empty shell. It is impossible for us to decide even of ourselves, nor is it necessary. The truth for today is found only in unity, and the service for today should be a mutual effort, unmarred by strife and vainglory.

Even the highest gifts are no ground for self-exaltation, for all comes from God and should be a cause of thankfulness, not pride. The best of us have nothing that we did not receive. Nothing has originated in us. We have no more right to it than the most despised of humanity. It is only when we lose sight of God's deity and our creaturehood that we preen our feathers or blow our horn. Then it is that we resent any lack of appreciation of our gifts or interference with our work. And this soon leads to dissension and division, which constitute the most glaring faults of Christendom, and are the conclusive evidence of its apostasy and shame.

Normally, we should look to Christians and Christendom to see the fruit of evangelical truth. That is what the "heathen" are compelled to do, apart from reading the Scriptures. What a consolation to look away from such hypocritical Christianity to Christ! Self-abasement, not self-exaltation—such is His disposition. What a comfort there is to be found in His love, which was fixed on others, not Himself. Here we can have real communion of spirit if our eyes and hearts are open to the truth. With Him we can have compassion and pity for those beneath us, not disregard or contempt. It is only by meditation on His career that we may realize the shortcomings of our own. His disposition is the test and corrective of our tendency to exalt ourselves.

There is a notable difference between the ecclesias of Corinth and Philippi. In the former there seems to have been much in the way of gifts and physical endowments. They sneered at the apostle's style of speaking. Yet they were full of factions. They wanted to reign. Yet they were fleshly and immature. Notwithstanding their own estimate of themselves, the apostle could not reveal to them what was on his heart. We do not read of many gifts in Philippians. Instead of criticizing Paul's oratory they contributed to his support. So that we do not read of any schisms among them. And to them Paul writes as to those who have received the highest truth.

May every gathering of saints take these things to heart! It is far more important to have the humble disposition of Christ than to have the most perfect spiritual and physical equipment. A good speaker, with an agreeable presence, and equipped with much truth, is not to be despised. But, alas, too often, as in Corinth, he may divide instead of unite. Apollos did not wish to split the saints, but he did so by his good qualities. What should be cultivated by us all is this mutual disposition for, apart from our own pride, we have the same objects before us. And this can come only in the measure in which we partake of the disposition of Christ Jesus, as summed up in the phrase: He stooped to serve.

THE DESCENT OF CHRIST

As the kenosis, or emptying of Christ, is fully discussed elsewhere[1], we will confine ourselves here to the lesson which it should bring us. It is the ideal for all creation in relation to God. Christ humbled Himself: God highly exalted Him. With us, alas, the tendency is just the opposite. We exalt ourselves so that God must humble us. In His case we have true humility exemplified as in no other, for He went from the place supreme to the deepest depth, and God has made Him Lord of all. Leaving the form of God He took that of a slave. Becoming like a man, He humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

1. In our 48-page booklet, The Pre-existence of Christ, and "The Kenosis Of Christ," Unsearchable Riches vol.21, pp 197-231.

Apart from being God Himself, nothing can be higher than having the form of God. God Himself is invisible (1 Tim.1:17; Heb.11:27). To bring Him within the range of human comprehension He must be depicted by an Image, having a Form. The living God cannot be made known by lifeless representations. Hence He has chosen One, His creative Original, in Whom all was created, to represent Him, to be the visible Image of invisible Deity (Col.1: 15). His shape or form must be that which is suggestive of God, especially of the character which He assumes on any occasion, in order to reveal Himself to His creatures. Christ Jesus was that Form. In Him God was seen in such a theophany as suited the weakness of the human frame. Yet in visions He appeared in soul-dismaying splendor, as when Isaiah beheld His glory. This passage, as all else in this epistle, deals with service, not essential being.

As the subject of this passage is the height from which Christ descended, it does not treat of His relationship to God in other respects. The equality here spoken of does not arise from intrinsic identity but extrinsic form. Outwardly, to human gaze, He was God, Elohim and Yahweh. This it was which He did not deem pillaging. The fact that He could take the place of God without taking anything from Him is here introduced to show His supreme position in the universe. He was the Effulgence of God's glory (Heb.1:3), the most magnificent and sublime percept to be found. As there was no higher height, He could not be exalted without a previous descent.

Our disposition, and that of the world, is to hold fast to all the wealth and power and dignity to which we are able to attain. Indeed, we are disposed to seek still more, even when that which we possess has become a burden. The motto of the respectable and esteemed is "Ever upward"! It is pressed upon the aspiring youth and preached as gospel in our churches. Ever higher is the aim of the ambitious man. Even in the church this has found its full expression. It is seldom that a preacher does not desire a larger church, or welcome a higher ecclesiastical position. Alas, the most prominent men in Christendom have gone up and not down, and in most cases, have given an example just the reverse of that which our Lord has set before us.

That, despite His supernal dignities, the disposition of Christ was one of love and compassion, and utterly lacking in selfishness and pride, is shown by His self-abasement. He empties Himself. What this means is clearly indicated by the change in form. He was not God and He did not become a slave. But He had God's form, yet He took a slave's form. He did not carry with Him any of the former into the latter. This is clearly shown by the word empties, Only when He was trans*formed,* as on the holy mount (Matt.17:2), did His face shine as the sun and His garments become white as the light. In this vision He anticipates the form which He will have in the Kingdom, after His exaltation. But it was not a permanent form, only a vision. When He descended the glory was gone.

Not only does He empty Himself by taking the form of a slave, but He also humbles Himself, seeing that He came to be in the likeness of humanity. It is humiliating to belong to the human race. Let us take a place among those messengers from other spheres who have visited the earth, and know something of human history. What a sad, sordid, sinful spectacle do we see as we contemplate man's mistakes and misery! Apart from his future, I question whether any creature outside the earth would care to belong to our sin-cursed, death-doomed race. Normally we should be like our first parents, and hide ourselves for very shame. Were we not blinded to our state, and hardened to our fate, we would humble ourselves because we are not merely like humanity and fashioned as a man, but we actually belong to this base band.

Christ Jesus was not a human being as we are, for God was His Father, yet He bore our likeness. He was not a man like the rest, for He had no sin and had life in such abundance that it would counteract the disease and death which is our portion. Though He had the likeness and the fashion of a man, He did not possess the mortality and the sin which is the cause of our humiliation. He was human in appearance, not in fact. He did not humiliate Himself simply because, like all of us, He shared the general disgrace. So sensitive was He to sin, that His association with it was enough to humble Him. Thus it was that He became the Man of Sorrows, and made close acquaintance with our grief.

We must not think that all this was independent of the will and heart of God. Quite the opposite. It was a path of obedience to God. And it was a revelation of the Deity quite as much as His previous condition. Indeed, the highest service lies in the lowest sphere. His humiliation revealed God's heart as His more glorious condition never could have done. Becoming like a man is only a step in His humiliation. He must stoop lower still, and become like the very worst of men, like the outcast of society, like the very vilest criminal.

It is disgraceful to die, but we do not discern the dire dishonor of it because we all share the shame. But it is far more humiliating to be executed as a criminal, to be deemed unworthy to live even among such sinners as mankind. Even here there are degrees of disgrace. But an agonizing and lingering death, exposed to public scorn, and in the special form on which the curse of God had been pronounced, with every token of human and divine displeasure, such a death is the deepest depth of degradation which can be imagined. Christ did not merely descend to share our common fate of dying and death, but to suffer so as to bring upon Himself the utmost humiliation from man and the deepest abhorrence from the Deity.

The cross of Christ! How little do we realize the abyss to which He sank! As men cover the grave of a corrupting corpse with flowers, so Christendom has sought to obliterate the offense of the cross by giving the rude stake itself an artistic form. No cross-piece gave the crude pole on which He was gibbeted picturesque proportions. It was never intended to beautify the architecture of our churches or to be fabricated of precious metal and costly gems to adorn the vain worship of the flesh. How terribly has this so-called symbol been altered, both in form and in intent! It should be a symbol of shame, to be shunned with shuddering. In its popular form it has become a symbol of man's utter failure to grasp the deep and dire significance of the manner in which God's Christ was done to death by human hands.

O that the saints could grasp the vast distinction between the death of Christ and the manner of it! Too often, when we speak of the cross, we merely mean His death. Had He died a common death, it would not have revealed the heart of man or the indignation of God. That human beings have brought upon themselves the blood of God's Anointed tells the tale of their alienation as no other act could do. That this was done by those in closest official touch with God, the priests of Israel, is the best evidence of human depravity. Not only was Christ humiliated at the cross, but men were shown to be so low and vile, that naught but divine grace and love could ever give them the right to exist. Indeed, justice demands that they be crucified for this deed. Not only Christ, in fact, but the world, in truth, was on the shameful tree of Golgotha.

CHRIST'S EXALTATION

"Wherefore, also, God highly exalts Him . . ." (2:9). Christ emptied and humbled Himself, but God exalts Him. He did not exalt Himself. Only God can truly exalt His creatures. For them the way to the heights lies through the depths. They should share the disposition of God's Anointed, and, in due time, God will raise them up. As the result of His descent to the deepest humiliation He is now on the way to the highest place in God's universe. Already, in countless hearts, His Name ranks far above every other name. It is not merely great but gracious. None of the names on earth can compare with it. It does not inspire fear or admiration merely, but love and adoration.

The word here used is full of precious significance. God has graced Him with the Name which outranks all others in the universe. The root thought of this family of words is JOY. The verb chairō means rejoice. One of its nouns, charis, is grace, favor, gratitude, bounty. So this verb charizomai, JOYIZE, speaks of an act that brings joy. Usually this is produced by granting an undeserved boon, or bestowing benefits where the opposite is deserved. But here this winsome word tells us of the pleasure which the Name delectable will bring, not only to Him Who bears it, but to those who find it a Shelter and a Satisfaction to their hearts.

The name Jesus is full of precious significance. It is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Joshua. This seems to be shortened from Yahweh-Hoshea, Yahweh-Saviour. Yahweh is the title of the Deity as associated with time, especially the eonian times, that great group of eons in which God is revealing Himself through darkness and light, evil and good, sin and salvation. The cross of Christ stands in the very midst of these eons, and through it He will transmute all the evil into good. Yahweh is He Who will be and is and was. Hoshea is added to describe His work. Jesus is the appropriate name of the Saviour Whom God has given to rescue the creation from the thralldom of sin and destruction and death during the eonian times.

The worship and acclamation of the universe—such is the reward which comes to our blessed Saviour for His descent and humiliation. And this will not wait until the consummation, when all are reconciled to God. During the eons many shall bow the knee to Him and acclaim Him Lord, for the glory of God, the Father. Even now His saints adore His Name, and own His lordship in their feeble way. Already He is at God's right hand, messengers and authorities and powers being made subject to Him (1 Peter 3:22). When He comes, the earth will own Him King. Even beings under the earth, of which we know so little, will adore and obey Him. Celestial, terrestrial and subterranean—all will bow the knee in worship and use their tongues to acclaim the Crucified before the eons end. Low as was His humiliation, so high will be His exaltation.

"For the glory of God, the Father." This is the object of it all, as well as the key to our understanding of it. Christ descended in obedience in order to glorify God, His Father. He was exalted for the same reason. And it is for this cause that every knee shall bow and every tongue acclaim Him Lord—because this not only elevates Him to the place supernal, but at the same time brings to God the glory which is His due. But it is not to God, as Creator, or as judge. The name Jesus sets forth the Saviour; He glorifies the Father. There is no constraint here, except that of love. Those who worship Him as Saviour and acclaim Him as Lord become children of God, and give Him glory.

THE SAINTS' OBEDIENCE

Having meditated upon the obedience of Christ Jesus and its blessed results, Paul exhorts the saints to emulate His disposition in their own small sphere. Hitherto the Philippians had always been obedient to the truth which he had imparted to them when he was present with them. Now that he has still greater and grander grants of glorious grace for them, which he must send to them in his absence, he exhorts them to carry this out also, in their daily life. It is a high salvation indeed, but it calls for a lowly walk in humiliation and suffering. It leads down, not up, so long as we are in these bodies of humiliation. With fear and trembling, bowing ourselves under the mighty hand of God, Whose spirit in us is the effective force, we should seek to work out what is within.

Salvation is not only a future event, but a present power and should be the preponderant influence in our lives. God has a glorious goal for each one of us, just as He has for His Anointed. Let us learn from His example that self-emptying and humiliation, with all their discomfort and distress and agony, are God's will and the only way to attain the future exaltation. Let us not strive against it but be disposed to it, when it lies in the path of obedience, even though it brings fear and trembling with it. Let us be satisfied when our will is not consulted, and our work is not done, realizing that God's will and work are to be carried out through us, for His delectation. It is God Who wills as well as works in us for His delight. So great is the light shed upon the human will by this word that we will devote a later chapter to its discussion.

When we realize that God is the power of our life, it is revolutionized. Nothing enters it by chance, or by any means without the will of God. Why then murmur when it is not to our liking? It is a comfort that He knows our trials and a consolation that He sympathizes with us in our sorrows, but how much better to realize that it comes from Him and is a step, into the depths it may be, which leads to our exaltation? It is not a cause for murmuring, but for thanksgiving. Murmuring had no place in the life of our Lord. Not that He lacked occasion. The wise and intelligent in His day did not receive His message. Was He discontented? Quite the opposite. He said, "I am acclaiming You, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, for You hide these things from the wise and intelligent and You reveal them to minors. Yes, Father, seeing that thus it becomes a delight in front of You" (Matt.11:25,26).

This is a very practical point with the writer and readers of these lines. We have marvelous things to teach. Humanly speaking, it seems impossible that the intelligent, even scholarly, leaders in Christendom should not grasp them eagerly. But they do not. Their wisdom seems to be useless in the realm of revelation. The fact that they do not receive it seems to reflect on our message, and we are tempted to murmur. Then, again, it is far pleasanter and more respectable to have many men of mental ability and high standing in the world to support and propagate the truth. Would it not have been better to choose priests and scribes as apostles rather than ignorant fishermen? By no means. Let us not murmur at God's ways in choosing the stupid and the weak and the ignoble and the scorned, for only thus can He give the flesh its proper place. Let us rather rejoice.

How many of us are prone to reason that, if this had only been so, that could not have happened. But all such reasoning is vain and a delusion. So intricate are the complex interrelations of human life and conduct that no rational reasoning is possible. It is almost invariably the product of unbelief. God's ways are not to be the subject of our syllogisms, for we are not at all equipped for logical deduction. Once we believe and realize that God's hand is operating all things in our lives, as well as in the universe, all desire to reason will leave us. Faith will replace reason, and dissatisfaction and perplexity will be replaced by contentment and understanding.

Should we come to be in complete concord with the control of God, it will make us "blameless and artless, children of God, flawless in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation . . ." (2:15). The world, and the saints who have not yet given God His place in their lives, do not fall in line with His will (even if they fulfill His intention), hence they lie athwart His way and are perverse, or they vary their course, and are crooked. So long as we parallel His course, and do not plot and scheme to improve or evade His plans for us, we will be like His children, in Whom no flaw can be found. Such is the conduct which should come from the contemplation of the course of Christ. It should be the glad obedience of those who make God all in their lives and cheerfully acquiesce in His way for them, seeing that the suffering must precede the glory.

LUMINARIES IN THE WORLD

Such saints are not only a delight to God, but the light of the world. This world is a very dark and dismal dungeon. In their day, the disciples of our Lord were the light of the world (Matt.5:14). Since then the light has left Israel, as figured in the olive tree, some of whose boughs were broken off (Rom.11:17). Now the oil is found among the nations, some of whom have been grafted in. But the real luminaries are only those among them who live the evangel, "having on the word of life." They are clothed, as it were, with the luminous garments of God's revelation, and shine in a manner like our Lord when He was on the holy mount.

It is a glorious privilege to give expression to God's truth by verbal utterance or the written pages, by means of the words He has given us to make Him known. But here we have a different method, and, perhaps, a more effective mode of shedding the light of God. Not words for the ears, but works which can be heard by the hearts of our hearers, are the means brought before us in Philippians. These deeds will appear again in the day of Christ, to receive the reward which is their due. In these is Paul's boast, for they show, as nothing else could do, that his efforts had not been empty of results (2:16).

That the path of the Philippians had been a painful one, yet pleasing to God, is apparent from Paul's description of it. It was a sacrifice. The sacrifice of "burnt offering" or ascent offering, which was wholly God's and ascended to Him as a savor of rest, was accompanied by a libation of wine, to express the joyful character of the sacrifice. How well this fits the circumstances here! Paul also suffers in his service, yet rejoices in it. The sacrifice is a joyous one. They rejoice, and he rejoices with them, and, to make it mutual, he would have them rejoice with him.

Notwithstanding its strong strain of humiliation and suffering, our service is one of joy and rejoicing. Short as it is, no other book contains the word rejoice as often as Philippians. Paul made his petitions with joy (1:4). He rejoices and will rejoice in the announcement of the evangel (1:18). He will abide for their joy of faith (1:25). He would have them fill his joy full (2:2). He joys and rejoices with the Philippians and asks them to joy and rejoice with him (2:17,18). He sends Epaphroditus that they may rejoice and receive him with all joy (2:28,29). He exhorts them to be rejoicing in the Lord (3:1). He calls them his joy (4:1). Again he exhorts them to be rejoicing in the Lord always, and repeats it (4:4). He rejoiced that their disposition toward him found expression in their contribution (4:10). What other book can match the overflow of happiness found here in Philippians?

Let us note also that this joy is not in their salvation but in their service. Undoubtedly they enjoyed the grace which had come to them in Christ. But this is a different matter. This joy is in the Lord. They were happy in serving and suffering in the midst of weakness, poverty and distress. This is the joy which accompanies our present path of hardship and humiliation. Indeed, it is the firstfruit of our downward disposition in obedience to the will of God.

Let us, then, cultivate the disposition which was in Christ Jesus, which is the very reverse of that which inspires the world and the flesh and the Adversary. Let us not strive to rise high, but to become low, not to rule but to serve, not ourselves but others. Let us leave all exaltation in the hands of God, Who will raise us up and give us glory in His own good time, as He did with Christ Jesus. He that exalts himself shall be abased. But he whom God exalts shall share with Christ the glories which are His because He emptied and humbled Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. A. E. Knoch

PREMONITION

In choosing a word for a divine vocabulary it is a translator's earnest wish to find one, in each case, which exactly covers the original for which it stands. But, alas, this is not always to be had. The word apokaradokia, FROM-SKULL-SEEM, is one of the most baffling examples. We have rendered it premonition, but not without a presentiment that our choice would be criticized.

The word is used twice in Scripture (Rom.8:19 and Phil.1:20), where it has to do with the intellect, the formation of ideas, and extends thought into the future, and is closely related to expectation. But it is, in some way, inferior to expectation, or we would have an anticlimax in Philippians. The most important point to observe is the fact that the lower creation shares this with man. In Romans we would hardly expect to find that the creation has expectation, because that is intelligent, not instinctive. It seems much more likely that the word has to do with an intuitive, unintelligent, subconscious attitude toward the future.

The question is, What shall we call it? The central meaning of premonition is correct (that simply of intuitive anticipation). Only it has fallen into bad company. I hoped to redeem it by putting it in the best society, where no one can possibly charge it with being evil. But it is not easy to regain a lost character. We must give it time. THE HUMAN WILL

GOD is operating in us to will as well as to work for the sake of His delight (Phil.2:13). This brief allusion to the human will throws a flood of light into a very dark and dismal doctrine which has so vitiated the theology of Christendom that it has practically robbed God of His deity and believers of a God worthy of the name. It is generally taken for granted that the Bible teaches that man, being made in the image of God, is absolutely sovereign in the realm of his will. Just as God can will, without being influenced by aught about Him, so we can create a decision out of the blue, without the least reference to what we are, or to the world about us.

This nightmare, we are given to understand, is not directly taught in the Scriptures, but must be predicated as its background, or else we could not understand its message! It is pathetic to see the zeal with which men, who have suffered much for God's name, spring up to attack any teaching which threatens the doctrine of man's free will and free moral agency. They have not a line of Scripture on their side, so they inject the idea wherever it seems feasible, and so seek a semblance of support.

It will be worthwhile to consider some aspects of man's will, to see whether it is "free" or not, and to learn thus just what is meant by God operating in us to will. The wording of this passage will give us a hint, and, if we are correct, we will find ourselves in full harmony with its teaching when we are through.

What is the human will? Our text will help us to determine this vexing problem. The will of believers should be due to God's operation. It is not our action, but the result of His. So the will is a result, due to the operation of external factors. Probably we are not conscious of God's operation. We seem to be doing what we will. That is true of many functions of life. Our thinking, our breathing, the beating of our hearts, the manifold operations of digestion, all these are or should be, accomplished without our superintendence or conscious volition. And all are maintained and formed from external supplies or impulses. We eat, we breathe, we observe, and these make us what we are.

Where does the will come from? Do men create it out of nothing? That would be a feat more wonderful than any sleight of hand of which we have ever heard. If God is operating in us, is He then interfering with the creative capacity of His creatures?

The wise man knows that the human will is easily influenced from without. In fact it can be changed easily by one who understands human weaknesses. It is manufactured out of motives. It is a compound, made out of what we are within and where we are without. Heredity and environment fuse together to form it. Our wills are determined for us to a large extent by our ancestors, especially one named Adam. The mixture is finished by our associates and associations. If we had brains enough we could figure out any given will-problem like a sum in arithmetic. A given man will react to a given situation as surely as half a dozen plus six make twelve.

IS THE HUMAN A MACHINE?

Oh, someone will exclaim, then man is a mere machine, an automaton, and is subject to a blind fate from which he cannot escape! How often have these words frightened us when we dared to think through to reality! No. Man is not a mere machine, but we must all admit that he has many of the characteristics of one. The fact that he has a soul, and can sense outward things, does not prove that he can sense all of his own operations. If he were not automatic in most of his vital processes, he would be dead in a few minutes. Some of his functions are not within the sphere of his consciousness. The will is one of these.

Man is an automaton in many ways. What would become of him if he had to supervise all of his bodily functions, or if he were even conscious of them all? How could a man who had never even heard of physiology keep the blood pump going and the air bellows working and the stomach churning all at the same time? He would not dare to stop to take a bite to eat. He could not get a wink of sleep. He would, however, have the melancholy pleasure of knowing that he is no mere automaton. Thank God that He, in His wisdom, Himself attends to our vital functions, so that we may look away from them to Him.

In these matters man is not subject to a "blind fate," but to a beneficent Creator. He provides parents and food and drink and air, not blindly, but blessedly. All this is a parable of those non-physical functions of our being, the mental, the emotional, and the voluntary. As Creator, God supplies us with the tendencies of our ancestors and with our surroundings and associates. These are incorporated in our mental tissue and enter our brains through our organs of sense. There are times when these two sources (heredity and environment) contribute materials which will not mix, and we cannot "make up our minds." But, in most cases, we subconsciously act upon the impulse provided by the union of these two streams without considering our course.

It is a stupendous blessing that this process is, as a rule, subconscious. If we had to stop and think and combine our hereditary tendencies with the fleeting impressions constantly brought in by our eyes and ears and nose and nerves before we act, many would be run over by automobiles before they could walk. Our wills themselves sometimes prompt us to action before we have time to be definitely conscious of what we are doing. I well remember once resting quietly under a bush, when I heard a buzzing noise, and lazily turned my head to see if the wind was blowing the vegetation. But it flashed upon me in the midst of my sluggish motion, that it might be a rattlesnake. I jumped up so quickly that I still seemed to be thinking of the wind after I saw the snake strike at the spot where my head had been an instant before.

Man is like an automobile, a splendid vehicle to convey the knowledge of God to the creatures of His heart. Let us suppose that an automobile had a free will of its own. Who would care to ride if the steering gear demanded its independence, and turned off the avenue to climb a tree, or insisted on diving into a pit, instead of running on the road prepared for it? If automobiles had free wills the American people would soon be extinct. And if men could break away from the natural laws which guide them, they would utterly destroy one another in a fortnight. The measure in which they are lawless because of death and sin, is well within the reach of God's protecting arm. The steering gear has gone wrong, the wheels wobble, and the automobile seems to be blessed with free moral agency. If you wish to sell the machine it may be well not to boast of its superior spiritual endowments. One who has God's Spirit has a steady steering gear and a Driver Who will get him there on the well paved path.

Our consciousness seems to be a sluggish bubble which rises from the operations of the mind and is hardly recognized until it breaks. There is a possibility of uniting sensations from without with the mental fiber within and of sending the resultant order to the muscles and even of acting before we are well aware of what we are about. This is the way the will usually works. It would be intolerable if we had to make up our minds regarding every act of life. It would take more nerve force than most of us possess. Most of our voluntary acts are replaced by habits—things we do "without thinking."

Too often the sinner is directed to manipulate his will, as though he could do anything with it. An evangelist is not supposed to twist and turn the human will by eloquent exhortations, but to provide divine material for the formation of God's will in men. Of what avail would it be to feed the famished with lectures on the digestive apparatus? It is just as useless to tell a man to will to come to Christ. Give the starving food and the digestive apparatus, complicated as it is, will do its part. Give the sinner Christ and his will will work of its own accord. Preach the Word. This is the most effective motive power for moving the mind of man. By its means God's Spirit will bring the sinner into line with God's will.

Men imagine they are sovereign in the realm of the will and that no one can break their resolution—no, not even God. This is childish. They have no greater control over it than the captain of a sailing vessel has over the set of his sails. If he is not demented he will spread them to suit his course, and that is determined for him by the breeze. There are spiritual winds to which men bend their wills. They may whistle ever so long, but these spirit forces are beyond their perception and above their control. Hence men do the will of the flesh and obey the behests of evil spirit powers of which they seldom are aware. These now operate in the sons of stubbornness (Eph.2:2). The great movements in the world, the great leaders, can find success only when they fall in line with unseen spirit forces.

The unbeliever is the sport of the spirits of evil. It is the chief of the aerial jurisdiction who operates in them. Their wills are a compound of the soulish sensibilities of the flesh and the spirit of the world. The believer is not called upon to be passive, to "surrender," to "yield" as is so often taught, but that is what the unbeliever unwittingly does. That is what evil spirits crave. Intelligent subordination to God's revealed will is quite the opposite of a passive reception of passing impressions. The Spirit of God does not produce such indefinite "guidance," such loose "leadings." God's Spirit works only through His Word.

Our course is often dark, and we need light, not vague "guidance." With a light we can intelligently pick our path, and choose our steps. We are not called upon to obey an inner voice or an outward impression, or to blindfold our eyes and follow an unknown guide, but to use the light of revelation.

Within us is the flesh and without us is the spirit of the world and the world of spirits. These are always forcing themselves upon us and producing "impressions." It is true that, if we know the Scriptures, the divine directions will, to a large extent, displace these sinister influences, but this comes through the activity of faith, not the passivity which blindly obeys impulses. God seeks open-eyed, active obedience. The forces of evil desire blind passivity.

Saints who sincerely desire to do the will of God will find that it is not enough to "make up their minds" to do it. However strong their determination, it may not last. The wise way is to provide the will with motives which will keep them in God's will. Above all we must know Him through His Word. We must enter into His present plans and future purpose. Then, without straining ourselves to create an artificial will of our own, this knowledge will become the formative factor in our wills, so that actually it will be "God Who is operating in us to will (as well as to work), for the sake of His delight."

Let me warn all against the fearful practice of making a medium out of God's holy Word. There are those who will insert a needle into the Bible, or open it at random in order to get God's "leading." God's Book is not a planchette, though I have no doubt that the evil spirits prefer it to every other way of deceiving their dupes. God controls our wills only when we intelligently absorb His thoughts, and weigh His ways, and luxuriate in His love. It is detestable idolatry to turn His revelation into a ouija board, and allow evil spirits to speak through its sacred sentences.

At Pentecost God's Spirit came on the disciples for power, and uninstructed saints have longed for a repetition of this marvel ever since, not knowing that the Spirit is at home in us, to impart not power but life (Rom.8:9). There is great danger in tarrying for the Spirit, for deceiving spirits are eager to use such opportunities. In fact the history of all movements of this kind is sufficient evidence that they are merely a brand of spiritism, doubly deceptive because they seem to be based on the Bible, and succeed in arousing spirit manifestations which are mistaken for the power of God's holy Spirit.

It is quite true that God revealed Himself directly through the prophets and those who had the gift of prophecy in the Pentecostal era. No one has it now. The only real prophets today are false prophets. If we expect God to speak to us directly through His Spirit, apart from His Word, we are assuming the gift of prophecy. Today such a gift is not needed, for the truth has been fully revealed in the Scriptures. Moreover, the fact that those who depend on such revelations are led contrary to the Scriptures and to one another shows that they are not guided by the one Spirit of God, but by the many spirits against which we are warned.

Much of the "waiting on God" or "going into the silence" may be simply a form of spiritism. If we seek to shut out the distractions of the world about us in order to be able to give all our thoughts to God's revelation, that is good, very good. But if we imagine that making our minds a blank, or putting ourselves into a state of passivity will enable us to receive definite instructions from the holy Spirit direct, we are under a strong delusion, and lay ourselves open to the deceiving spirits which characterize these last days. The holy Spirit of God will indeed guide us into the truth, but only through the word of truth. There is no safety apart from God's written revelation. The spirit that speaks to us apart from it is evil, however much it may imitate the divine.

All who have had an intelligent experience of divine life will readily admit that even the saint cannot please God apart from His operation, and they are glad to have it so. Let them believe the passage before us, and seek to realize its force, and they will be gratified still more in the consciousness that even the spring of their good deeds flows from God.

They become, as it were, a miniature universe, in which all is out of and through and for Him. The fact that they cannot independently will or work so as to please God will not disturb them in the least. Quite the opposite. They will find their all in Him, and this is only the normal complement of the great goal God has set before Him—to be all in them.

SCRIPTURE OCCURRENCES OF "WILL"

If our readers will consult all of the occurrences of thelêma, WILL, they will obtain both pleasure and profit. Out of about sixty occurrences at least fifty speak of the will of God. Man's will is not very important, according to the divine reckoning. The list begins with "Thy will be done" (Matt.6:10) and ends with "for Thy pleasure [will] they are" (Rev.4:11). In Romans 2:18 God's will is recognized as the will which needs no further specification. The Jew knew the will because he had the divine oracles. The coming kingdom is briefly characterized as the time when men will not do their own will, but the Father's.

A. E. Knoch

GROWTH IN REALIZATION OF GOD

We are acquainted with the entreaty, "Be rejoicing in the Lord always! Again I will declare, be rejoicing! Let your lenience be known to all men: the Lord is near. Do not worry about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God, and the peace of God, that is superior to every frame of mind, shall be garrisoning your hearts and your apprehensions in Christ Jesus" (Phil.4:7).

In the presence of such high entreaties, it is vital to our realization of truth to recognize that the apostle Paul does not come to us as a "second Moses." That is, Paul does not "command" us to do what is right on the grounds that if we fail to do so we will suffer the curses of the law, or, if we should continue to disobey, that we will "lose our salvation" and find ourselves among the vessels of wrath.

Paul comes to us, instead, as a wise counselor, as the Lord's apostle, encouraging us and building us up in faith. He entreats us concerning that which is imperative to our service if God would be pleased and we would be benefited. The fear and trembling that is to attend our walk as we carry our salvation into effect (cf Phil.2:13), is not a fear of divine wrath or a trembling born out of a contemplation of eternal punishment. Instead, it is a fear to offend our God and Father Whom we love; it is a trembling produced by an awareness of the fact that the spirit of the One Who rouses Jesus from among the dead condescends to make its home in us.

Insofar as the curses of the law are concerned, "Christ reclaims us from the curse of the law, becoming a curse for our sakes" (Gal.3:13). We "were put to death to the law through the body of Christ" (Rom.7:4); hence "we were exempted from the law" (Rom.7:6). Consequently, we "are not under law" (Rom.6:14). These things are related to us by Paul with reference to the fact that Grace reigns for life eonian (Rom.5:21); eonian life is a gracious gift (Rom.6:23).

DIVINE INDIGNATION

As to the question of divine wrath in the future "day of indignation," how thankful we are to affirm that, "being now justified in [Christ's] blood, we shall be saved from indignation through Him" (Rom.5:9). We are also mindful that, according to God's purpose, there are many who will be "vessels of indignation" (Rom.9:22), yet only unto the end that, in due time, they themselves should also be obtaining mercy (cp Rom.9:16; 11:32).

Those, however, who are "God's chosen ones" (Rom. 8:33; cp 2 Tim.2:10), having been graciously granted to be believing (Phil.1:29), have had the blessing of justification conferred upon them even now (Rom.3:22; 5:1). In His kindness and grace to us, God did not appoint us to indignation, but to the procuring of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ Who died for our sakes, that, whether we may be watching or drowsing, we should be living at the same time together with Him (1 Thess.5:9,10).

If some will not, as it literally is, "tenant the reign of God" (i.e., have an allotment or "place" in His reign; Gal. 5:21; cp 2 Tim.2:12), it is not to say that they will not live under its jurisdiction. All who are members of the body of Christ will live under the jurisdiction of God's reign, whether or not they have a place in its governance.

Vivification and eonian life are a display of God's grace; they are not a display of a divine reward in response to man's faithfulness (Eph.2:5,7). They are not a matter of qualification, but of favor. The fact that, relatively speaking, the reverse is true concerning the selection of those who will have a governing position within the kingdom is beside the point. The believer's eonian life depends solely upon the grace of God.

Concerning the oncoming eons: whether or not we take part in the reign of that day, we will, in any case, in that day, be roused, vivified and seated together among the celestials (Eph.2:5,6). Our "seat" among the celestials, speaks of a settled place of useful service. Every one of us will be pleasing to God and faithful in His service. "Whenever Christ, our Life, should be manifested, then you also shall be manifested together with Him in glory" (Col.3:4).

JUSTIFIED FROM SIN

In the grace of God, Christ tasted death for the sake of everyone (Heb.2:9). "Christ Jesus . . . is giving Himself a correspondent Ransom for the sake of all . . ." (1 Tim.2:6).

"For the love of Christ is constraining us, judging this, that, if One died for the sake of all, consequently all died" (2 Cor.5:14). And, "one who dies has been justified from Sin" (Rom.6:7; i.e., "freed from Sin," cp Rom.6:18).

This justification from Sin which is now the portion of all, is wholly the achievement of the cross. "What was impossible to the law, in which it was infirm through the flesh, did God, sending His own Son in the likeness of sin's flesh and concerning sin, He condemns sin in the flesh" (Rom.8:3). Thus in Christ we behold "the Lamb of God Which is taking away the sin of the world!" (John 1:29).

Sin in the flesh does not await condemnation; it has already found condemnation. Sin in the flesh is not to be condemned in a future judgment (such as in the second death); it has been condemned in a past judgment, the judgment of the cross. The sin of the world has been taken away through the sacrificial offering of the Lamb of God, Christ Jesus our Lord. God made Christ ("the One not knowing sin") to be a sin offering (2 Cor.5:21). Indeed, in literal terms, "He makes Him [to be] sin"—that thus sin might be condemned and taken away.

Consequently, God has not only conciliated us to Himself through Christ, but has, in Christ, conciliated the world to Himself as well. Accordingly, He is not only dealing graciously with all our offenses (Col.2:13), but, concerning the world as well, He is "not reckoning their offenses to them" (2 Cor.5:18,19).

Sin speaks of failure; it speaks of that which "misses the mark," the mark or target of that which is inherently good, well pleasing and perfect (cp Rom.12:2). Sin in the flesh, "the sin of the world," has met its judgment through the One Who is the Sin Offering. Now, through the work of Christ, man is justified from the evil slaveowner, Sin (2 Cor. 5:14; Rom.6:7b). Man is declared to be in the only right relationship to Sin, which is to be freed from its jurisdiction. Sin personified (literally, man's sinful deeds), no longer has the prerogative concerning man's judgment. Instead, God through Christ has gained the prerogative!

Therefore, God—not Sin—will now determine each man's judgment and final destiny. And, He will do so according to His own purpose, not according to individual merit. Indeed many who will be subjected to God's indignation are far less deserving of it than others who will be saved from it. The vessels of mercy enjoy mercy solely because of God's gracious purpose, not because of any deservedness of their own (1 Tim.1:12-16; Rom.9:15,16).

WHAT THE HUMAN DESERVES

Insofar as "just deserts" are concerned, all are deserving of death (Rom.1:32). Considered in themselves, in their own sinfulness, apart from the divine purpose, humanity is well suited and worthy only of death. If this were the only consideration, it would be altogether fitting not only to put man to death, but to leave him there on a permanent basis.

This is true of the entirety of humanity, not merely of some. Remember, all sin; and all are wanting of the glory of God (Rom.3:23). The glory of God represents the only ideal standard of righteousness. It is not merely that man comes short of the glory of God that is significant. It is that he is found wanting of the glory of God. Not only do all mankind sin, but all mankind—including those who are least offensive—are members of the old humanity which is corrupted in accord with its seductive desires (Eph.4:22).

WHAT GOD WILLS

Howbeit, in the end, God, Who loves all (John 3:16), and wills to save all (1 Tim.2:4), will become All in all (1 Cor. 15:28). In that day, God will fully manifest Himself as the One Who indeed is the Saviour of all mankind (1 Tim. 4:10). Until then, with respect to all interim judging, it is only a question of whether one best serves the divine purpose as a vessel of mercy or as a vessel of indignation.

OFFENSES NO LONGER RECKONED

The fact that God has conciliated the world to Himself and is not reckoning offenses to the all who sin, affirms the fact that man's sinfulness continues to be offensive to God. It is not that man's sinful ways are no longer offensive to the Deity. That is far from the case. It is that now that the Sin Offering has been made, God is no longer reckoning man's offenses to him.

It must be emphasized that the conciliation does not exempt man from his close and often painful connection with the generally attenuated yet sometimes full-toned indignation of God which, even now, is being revealed from heaven upon the irreverence and injustice of men (Rom.1:18). We become acquainted firsthand with God's appraisal of sin whenever we ourselves experience the practical retribution which attends our own failures (cf Rom. 1:18-32; cp 1 Tim.6:9).

It does not follow from the fact that, as a timeless truth, sin has been taken away, nor from the companion fact that, personally speaking, offense is not being reckoned, that God will therefore do nothing at all insofar as personal adjudication is concerned with respect to the dreadful deeds of His beloved creatures. God will still bring every act into judgment (Ecc.12:14), both in the case of the believer (at the dais of Christ; 2 Cor.5:10) and of the unbeliever (before the great white throne; Rev.20:11,12).

GOD'S WORK OF JUDGMENT

Divine judgment, however, simply speaks of divine decision. For the sake of the accomplishment of the divine purpose, it remains expedient that the various judgments in which God would engage in response to man's wickedness still be carried out. Through these means, God will further make known the awfulness and injuriousness of sin.

Yet it must be recognized that the indignation in the day of the indignation and revelation of the just judgment of God (Rom.2:5), will itself proceed "according to" (or, "in accord with") that glorious body of divine revelation which Paul terms "my evangel" (Rom.2:16)! Paul's evangel is the evangel which reveals the eventual "life's justifying" and reconciliation of all mankind through the saving work of Christ (Rom.5:18,19; Col.1:20). How we rejoice to know that the events of the day of judging will proceed on the basis of and in the light of the glorious consummation when God becomes All in all.

In all future, adversative judgments, then, God will be mindful that the "sin in the flesh" of those undergoing judging has already been condemned and taken away through the sacrifice of Christ. He will be mindful as well that, through Christ's sacrifice, every sinner—even the most wicked—is already joined to Himself. That is, this is so in fact, all human unbelief notwithstanding.

It is true that, in the current era, God acts in conciliation toward mankind. It is true as well that, in coming times of indignation, it will appear that God surely is reckoning the offenses of humanity against them. Yet in fact, in the depth of His heart, this will not be so. This is because, at the cross, God was in Christ, conciliating the world to Himself. The recognition that, practically, this is a truth applied in a special way in the present, must not be misused so as to obscure the realization that, factually, it is a timeless and abiding truth.

In His work of judgment, through Christ, what is seen on the surface covers what is in the depths of God, made known in the One revealed in Paul's evangel (cf 1 Cor.2: 6-10). Let no one imagine that Christ, the Righteous One, departs from virtue in assuming the role of Divine Indignation. He does so for the sake of the glory of God and the benefit of all concerned, being motivated by love, wisdom and perfect righteousness. His motives are of the highest order, and His purpose for the greatest good.

FOR GOD AND HIS GLORY

It is vital to realize that the divine indignation of the day of indignation will be the manifestation of an assumed character, not the reflection of what, deeply and ultimately speaking, is actually so.

Furthermore, the indignation of that day will be just the right amount, neither too much nor too little. It will soon be past, and, even as all else, will prove to be for the glory of God and the benefit of man. How glorious it is to know that God does not afflict "from His heart" (Lam. 3:33). How we rejoice in the realization that, ". . . though

He afflicts, yet He has compassion according to the abundance of His benignities" (Lam.3:32).

The Son of God, then, to Whom all judging has been given (John 5:22), will yet, as the Emblem of God's assumption (Heb.1:3), assume the role of One Who is indignant. For the sake of the fulfillment of the divine purpose, even as for the benefit of the creature, it is wise and expedient that Christ should be manifested thus. This theophany will occur principally in the conclusion of the current eon, and then in the day of judging following the thousand years. This assumed, indignant Character, while true to form, is not at all reflective of the heart of the One Who is love (1 John 4:8)—love, which is not incensed, neither is it taking account of evil (1 Cor.13:5), evil being the outworking of the divine intention (cf Rom.9:19).

God has a purpose in all that occurs (cf Rom.11:36). Man's unrighteousness commends God's righteousness (Rom.3:5). "The truth of God," by virtue of its being afforded an entity of contrast through the vehicle of "my lie" (i.e., through the innumerable lies in which men so frequently engage), indeed, "superabounds." That is, God's truthfulness, in the face of man's untruthfulness, thus becomes much more apparent and precious "for His glory" (Rom.3:7).

God wants to display His indignation and make His powerful doings known (Rom.9:22). Accordingly, He has made the world and all that is in it (Acts 17:24), doing so in such a way that the world will surely contain both creatures and creaturely deeds well-suited to the visitation not only of His indignation but as well of all His concomitant, powerful deeds. "Yahweh has made everything for its own pertinent end, yea even the wicked for the day of evil" (Prov.16:4; cp Eph.6:13). All is not only out of God, and through God, but all is for God as well: to Him be the glory for the eons! Amen! (Rom.11:36).

According to Paul, everything that exists and everything that occurs is "for" God. That is, everything is for His purpose; it exists unto the end that the purpose which requires its ephemeral presence might be achieved. It follows, then, that all that is "not of God," faithfully speaking, is nonetheless out of Him, ultimately speaking.

WE RELY ON THE LIVING GOD

All will yet redound to God's glory. Thus we say, "to Him be the glory," in anticipation of and with a view toward the good that God will surely bring into existence out of the evil upon which the corresponding good is dependent.

God cannot be glorified as the Saviour He intends to become, unless His creatures are the kind of sinners they need to be unto this end. Nor can God bless each one with salvation from sin in the way and to the degree that He intends, unless each one's particular kind and degree of sin is fixed. Therefore, that all might accord with God's purpose, all accords with what must be (cf Rom.8:26). All, indeed, accords with what must be, since all is out of, through, and for God (Rom.11:36), Who is operating all in accord with the counsel of His will (Eph.1:11).

Nonetheless, human behavior still occurs voluntarily, according to one's own choice. It is not true that since all is out of God (and, therefore, that human choice is out of God), that it makes no difference what we do, or that future events will come about in spite of what we do. To the contrary, future events will come about because of what we do. Accordingly, since we cannot know what we will do before we actually do it, the matter of decision making, even as self-discipline and self-control, remains vital.

We are awaiting the realized achievement of the full Saviourhood of God. Unto this end, we rely on the living God (1 Tim.4:10). Accordingly, we give thanks to Him in everything (1 Thess.5:18) and for everything (Eph.5:20). We do so, in word and deed, in the form of our unfeigned assurance and trust in His goodness and wisdom in the face of all the evil extant in the world, replete with such an abundance of horror and misery. God is our Saviour, and He is the Saviour of all mankind.

The existence of sin and evil is a harsh and unchanging reality. Whatever we may do, whatever our own course may consist of, in any case, the current eon itself will continue to be a wicked eon (Gal.1:4). We are all being afflicted. The entire creation—involuntarily—has been subjected to vanity, the slavery of corruption (Rom.8:20,21). It is on account of God that "we are being put to death the whole day," that "we are being reckoned as sheep for slaughter" (Rom.8:36). We are all dying; we are all sorrowing and groaning in our bodies of humiliation.

In his present state of corruption, man has become characterized by pride, bitterness and wrath. Yet a proud heart can only be changed by the transforming power of a thankful spirit. A spirit of thankfulness affirms that any virtue we may enjoy is ultimately God's gift to us, including the virtue that makes good use of the gifts which He grants.

A bitter and wrathful spirit can only be subdued by a spirit of kindness and love. God alone can grant us such a spirit. Yet the means of grace unto the possession of such an endowment may well be acceptance of and growth in recognition of God as God.

How helpful, then, it is truly to realize that the same awful deeds that man devises against us for evil, God designs for us for good (cf Gen.50:20; cp Rom.15:4). How beneficial it is to know that all is out of, through and for God.

It is in an awareness of this glorious truth that we say, "Now may our Lord Jesus Christ Himself, and God, our Father, Who loves us, and is giving us an eonian consolation and a good expectation in grace, be consoling your hearts and establish you in every good work and word" (2 Thess.2:16,17). Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

UNSEARCHABLE RICHES, THIRD QUARTER 2019
BEING THE THIRD NUMBER OF VOLUME ONE HUNDRED TEN

EDITORIAL

In the three articles from his "Studies in Philippians" series, reprinted in this issue of Unsearchable Riches, A. E. Knoch directs our attention to the way in which Timothy, Epaphroditus and Paul serve as ideal examples of believers letting the disposition (i.e., the mental inclination, or mindset) of Christ make its home in them. As they "obeyed" (UNDER-HEARd), listening subjectively to the evangel of Christ Jesus's emptying of Himself of His glories above, and His humbling of Himself to the death of the cross, God was working in them to will as well as work for the sake of His delight (cf Phil.2:5-13). Even as Christ Jesus took on the form of a slave in His obedience to God's will, so "in Timothy we see the model slave" in his service (cf p.99). So also Epaphroditus, in setting his mind on what he had "in Christ," even consolation, and comfort of love, communion of spirit, compassion and pity" (cf Phil.2:1), so his charm "is revealed in the exquisite sensitiveness of his character" (cf p.110).

As for Paul, who else so truly exhibits the mindset of Christ in his conduct and service? He forfeited all that he had gained in flesh because of the superiority of the knowledge of Christ which was founded on God's evangel of grace. "All his cherished merit, his blameless walk, his proud pedigree, on which is the chief reliance of the religionist to this very day, were seen to be so many incumbrances to keep him from the complete appropriation of Christ. Away with it! May his example help us all to refuse the refuse which religion offers us in order to keep us from the full appreciation of Him Who is our All!" (p.121).

We provide below the portions of Philippians (revised) which concern Timothy and Ephaphroditus. That concerning Paul is given at the end of the magazine.

THE SERVICE OF TIMOTHY

Philippians 2:19-24

As Paul is bound, and cannot visit the Philippians himself, he sends Epaphroditus and contemplates sending Timothy. In these two characters we have two "living expressions" of the evangel for this administration. They set forth the highest ideal in service and suffering. In Timothy we see the model slave. His very name is eloquent, for it means Honor-God. He is one of the few of whom it could be said that he did not seek his own, but others' good. In many ways he seems to be a typical character for the present, combining, in his own person, both Circumcision and Uncircumcision, and the weakness of the flesh with the power of the spirit.

The facts of Timothy's life, as recorded in the Scriptures for our instruction, are doubtless intended to give us a living picture of the inception of this administration. After Paul's separation from Barnabas, the Levite, he came to Lystra, the place where he had been stoned and left for dead (Acts 14:19). It is more than possible that it was at this time that Paul received the transcendent revelations which he later makes known in his perfection epistles (2 Cor.12:2). So that Timothy, in spirit, commences with this administration, yet in flesh is connected with the previous kingdom heralding. He commences at Lystra and goes all the way to Rome, not only in flesh, but in spirit.

With striking attention to detail, we are told that he was the son of a believing Jewish woman (Acts 16:1). This Jewess belonged to the dispersion, evidently, as she is found outside the land, and wedded to a Greek. As such she may well represent that believing remnant of Israel among the nations, to whom Paul was especially sent. But he also turned to the Greeks, and the company of people who received his message was a mixture of believing Israelites and Greeks. Such a combination, also, was Timothy. God will use this body of people in His highest service. So He used Timothy.

From the very beginning, Timothy earned the approbation of the brethren in Lystra and Iconium, where he lived (Acts 16:2). Probably he believed through Paul's ministry when he was there before, for, while he was, physically, the son of a Jewess and a Greek, spiritually he was Paul's child in faith (1 Tim.1:2,18; 2 Tim.1:2). This may illustrate an important point in service in the present administration which needs to be pressed. While the body of Christ is composed of those who are a mixture, physically, being from both Circumcision and Uncircumcision, this should not extend to their spiritual parentage. They should all be children of Paul. Those who receive life and are nurtured by means of his ministry are equipped for service today. Those who are mixed in their spiritual descent, being children of Peter as well as of Paul, are not fit to serve acceptably in this administration of God's grace.

It would seem that Timothy was with Paul much of the time thereafter. At Berea he remained behind when the Jews of Thessalonica came there, and Paul was sent away by the brethren but he soon received word to rejoin Paul at Athens (Acts 17:15). When he found Paul in Corinth, Paul was pressed to certify to the Jews that Jesus is the Christ. When they opposed, Timothy probably listened to the memorable words, "Your blood be on your head! Clear am I! From now on I shall go to the nations" (Acts 18:6). Thus Timothy was present at the commencement of the Corinthian ecclesia, and actually experienced the great crisis there when Paul left his brethren according to the flesh and turned to the Uncircumcision.

The next time that we hear of Timothy he is sent with Erastus to Macedonia, and doubtless went to Philippi (Acts 19:22). Paul himself remained in the province of Asia. It is evident from this that he no longer was a mere attendant of the apostle, but was himself an apostle, commissioned by his spiritual father to represent him in the work. As Paul himself wrote to Timothy, he had fully followed his teaching, motive, purpose, faith, patience, love, endurance, persecutions, sufferings (2 Tim.3:10). This is precisely what each slave of our Lord should do today if he wishes to render acceptable service, and to have a part in the ministry of this administration. Even the order in which these essentials are given is significant, for only those who fully follow Paul's teaching are really eligible for service and suffering.

Paul follows with the injunction, "Now you be remaining in what you learned and verified, being aware from whom you learned it . . ." (2 Tim.3:14). The tendency to forsake Paul's teaching is very strong. In his own days all in the province of Asia turned from him (2 Tim.1:15). Since then Christendom as a whole has left his teaching or so adulterated it with Circumcision doctrine that it is practically nullified. Therefore it should be our very special endeavor to guard against this propensity in ourselves. God graciously granted some light at the Reformation and through the so-called Brethren, but the reaction is very strong, and the light is dimmed. Even so with us. Already some are failing to remain in the truth, which few, indeed, have ever grasped in anything like its fullness.

Later Timothy was sent to Corinth also. In Paul's words concerning him we may receive further insight into his service. Paul writes to them, "I am entreating you, then, become imitators of me. Therefore I send to you Timothy, who is my beloved and faithful child in the Lord, who will be reminding you of my ways which are in Christ Jesus . . ." (1 Cor.4:16,17). Paul's "ways which are in Christ Jesus" is a key phrase for the present. Nowadays this is ignored. Paul is pushed aside and men are reminded of the ways of the Lord Jesus as He ministered to the Circumcision, as recorded in the four gospels. But Timothy was taught better. Being vitally connected with both sides, he knew that this is no model for the Uncircumcision. Paul's teaching calls for ways which accord with Christ Jesus in glory, not as a homeless Wanderer on earth.

Again the apostle writes: "If Timothy should be coming, look to it that he should be with you fearlessly, for he is working at the work of the Lord, as I also. No one, then, should be scorning him" (1 Cor.16:10,11). At another time Paul wrote to Timothy himself: "Let no one be despising your youth . . ." (1 Tim.4:12). And again; "God gives us, not a spirit of timidity, but of power and of love and of sanity" (2 Tim.1:7). Among the carnal Corinthians Timothy makes a pleasing yet pathetic contrast. Too young to command the respect due to an elder, he seems to have had a tendency to timidity and fear. How different from the popular conception of a great church dignitary of today! Youth is aggressive and self-reliant and needs little encouragement to assert itself. Yet the model here set before us is one whom the world (and most of the church) would despise, and who needed to be encouraged not to allow himself to be slighted.

Perhaps Timothy's tendency to timidity was due in measure to his physical condition. He had a weak stomach and was frequently infirm (1 Tim.5:23). Many of us may be able to sympathize with him in this, and can realize how it unfits one for that self-assurance which is deemed essential in those who must meet the public. But we may rest assured that it was given him by God, not to hinder but to help, for the Lord's work never needs the arm of flesh, and in this administration of the spirit, great physical endowments may be a hindrance to genuine and acceptable service. Not that we should seek to be ill. We do all in our power to counteract our infirmities, yet thank God for those which remain, for they are doubtless needed in order to keep us lowly (cf 2 Cor.12:7).

Among the last words on record which Paul writes to Timothy we see how true Timothy remained to his father in faith, and how Paul longed for one on whose fidelity he could count. Perhaps we may take the action as symbolic for this present era, for the second epistle to Timothy deals with the last days. He writes, "Endeavor to come to me quickly, for Demas, loving the current eon, forsook me and went to Thessalonica . . ." (2 Tim.4:9,10). If there ever is to be a return to Paul, it must be done speedily. Demas is probably derived from the root dem, PUBLIC. The public, the mass, even of the church, have abandoned Paul. Not a few are antagonistic to him, even among those who, like the Thessalonians, were once lovers of our Lord's advent. Let us, then, in spirit, hasten back to Paul, and to the revelation which he gives from his prison in Rome.

In a like symbolic sense we may take the reference to Timothy in Hebrews, if, indeed, it be the same Timothy there as elsewhere. Nothing is said in other places of his imprisonment. Now we are told, "Know that our brother Timothy has been released . . ." (Heb.13:23). Here we have a contrast. In Ephesians, Paul is imprisoned. In Hebrews, Timothy is at liberty. Does this hint that he is not involved in the fate of the Circumcision as set forth in this epistle? Physically, having a Jewish mother, he could easily be caught in the apostasy of Israel, and be bound by her defection. But he is not only freed from all physical relationships in Christ; he is at liberty to go out and serve even when the Circumcision are restrained by the change of administration.

Such is the career which prepared Timothy to be a model for service in this era. The quality of his preeminence in contrast to others is clearly seen in the short paragraph which Paul devotes to him in this epistle. He wishes to know how the Philippians are, so that he also may be of good cheer. He wishes to send someone, and his choice falls on Timothy, "for I have no one equally sensitive, who will be so genuinely solicitous of your concerns, for all are seeking that which is their own, not that which is of Christ Jesus" (Phil.2:20,21). Here he probes deep, into the very heart of the matter. Are we seeking our own, or that which concerns Christ Jesus? Do we serve selfish interests, or those of our Lord?

One of the delicate touches in this epistle lies in the word "equally sensitive." Though all is spirit now, in service the spirit should control and ennoble our sensations, and make us most sensitive to the welfare of those whom we seek to serve. Two things are needed, a fine perception of the feelings of others and a genuine solicitude as regards their affairs. It would be useless to send some unimpressionable or callous representative whose heart strings could not vibrate in tune with theirs. And still less would be done if he were indifferent to their concerns. In service we should approximate the vital sympathy which each member of the human body shows for the others, for this is the figure used of our relationship in Christ.

"All are seeking that which is their own." What a word to find in this epistle, when, in the flush of their first love, the saints were nearer the ideal than at any time since! If all sought their own then, what shall we say now? Some, indeed, there have been, through the years, of whom we would say that they did not consider their interests, but gave up all for Christ. But, if we should ask them, doubtless they would also confess their failure in this regard. It seems to be the universal sin in service which few of us are able to overcome. Yet it should be our aim, despite our failures, to forget our own concerns in preoccupation with the things of Christ.

As we have seen in our review of Timothy's career, he had been thoroughly tested as a companion and servant of Paul. This is most aptly summed up in the words, "as a child with a father he slaves with me for the evangel" (2:22). Two pictures are presented here, child and father, slave and lord. Between Paul and Timothy there was the loving and living relationship of father and child, and they both together attended to the affairs of Christ Jesus as though they were His loyal slaves.

I have often been criticized for using the word "slave" to describe the character of our service. But I delight in it. There is no question of its correctness. This alone should settle the point, for interpretation and feelings must be barred in translation. But here, for instance, it is in fullest harmony with the context, for a slave, who has no privileges or property of his own, makes a good figure for those who should not seek their own. I imagine that the objection may arise because we do not wish to serve without doing our own will and attending to our own welfare. But I glory in the "title" slave, and only wish my service were in accord with this lowly distinction.

Yet Paul was not willing to part with Timothy until his own matters (which were also his Lord's) had been settled. It must have been a vast comfort to him to have Timothy at hand in his imprisonment. At his first defense no one went with him, but all abandoned him (2 Tim.4:16). Perhaps this influenced him in calling for Timothy and keeping him until his fate had been finally decided. And, indeed, he would wish to send the news to his friends at Philippi as quickly as possible. What better commendation for the model slave than the fact that Paul would not part with him even though he would like to have sent him!

Such is the example set before us today: closest association with Paul in his teaching and ministry, and loyal devotion to him in his imprisonment. Is not this a picture of the path we should pursue in spirit? May the Lord send us slaves like Timothy, having His honor at heart, seeking that which is of Christ Jesus, a genuine child in faith of Paul, following his teaching and practice, sensitive and solicitous of the welfare of the saints!

RISKING HIS SOUL

Our Lord taught His disciples that he who prefers the indulgence of his physical senses to loyalty to Christ, who shrinks from the discomfort and distress which they must endure, he shall lose his soul in the time of Christ's exaltation. He who "loses his soul" for Christ's sake, he will gain it in that glorious future kingdom. In the phraseology of today's theology, to "lose your soul" is the very worst calamity which can occur. It is equivalent to "eternal damnation." Yet our Lord used these very words and urged His disciples to "lose their souls." "For whosoever should be wanting to save his soul shall lose [or "destroy"] it" (Matt.16:25). He who would save his soul (which is continually put before the sinner today) was to be discouraged and restrained by the fact that such would destroy their souls. Once we allow the true scriptural force of "soul" the passage is luminous with meaning and "the salvation of soul" takes on an entirely different color. This phrase, so loudly proclaimed today, is never once used in Paul's epistles. In fact, he very seldom speaks of the soul. Indeed he highly commends Epaphroditus for "risking his soul" for the sake of his fellow Philippians (Phil.2:30). This risk was evident in his sickness and depression which accompanied it. Paul could never commend anyone risking their salvation for any cause. But in Hebrews and James' and Peter's first epistle, which are concerned with the physical blessings of the earthly Kingdom, in these letters we read of the salvation of the soul.

EPAPHRODITUS' SUFFERINGS

Philippians 2:25-30

SUFFERING is the supreme service. It comes nearest to the sacrifice which our Saviour made for us. The service of the strong is acceptable to God, yet the work of the weak is far more welcome. It is a deeper display of sacrificial love and demands much more affection to suffer than to serve. It is when both are combined that we see the highest response to God's grace. And both are found in the four examples set before us. Christ was the supreme Sufferer. Paul had his splinter in the flesh and his persecutions. Timothy had his frequent infirmities and the evils from without. Epaphroditus, the apostle of the Philippians, was especially signalized by his suffering, which took him very near to death (2:25-30).

Suffering for God is the highest privilege which can be accorded His creatures. The Philippians themselves knew this by experience, for they were graciously granted not only to believe on Christ, but to suffer for His sake (1:29). In them the two extremes meet, for in no other part of God's Word is there so much emphasis on both suffering and rejoicing. And this is true of Epaphroditus also, for twice in this brief paragraph concerning his sufferings we read of the rejoicing of the Philippians in connection with it (2:28,29).

Epaphroditus signifies charming, and such is the account of his career in this epistle. We read of no great deeds that he had done, no "souls" that he had won, but only that he was commissioned to carry the gift of the Philippians to Paul.

He transformed this somewhat prosaic task into a memorable achievement by risking his soul in its accomplishment. So is it with earth's common occupations. Weakness and suffering may make them deeds of honor and charm, worthy of highest recognition, bringing joy and delight to the heart of God and man.

Epaphroditus is given five titles which are characteristic of his service. These are: brother, worker, soldier, apostle, and minister. The number is especially appropriate, as five is usually associated with weakness, the outstanding feature of service. On one side these remind us of the family circle, of the workshop, and of the army. Epaphroditus belonged to the same spiritual family as Paul. This, of course, is basic. Service must be based on spiritual, not on physical ties in this administration. Beyond this we must be fellow workers of Paul if our service is to be acceptable to God.

FELLOW SOLDIER

There seem to be four who take the title soldier in Paul's epistles, Paul himself, by implication, Epaphroditus, Archippus (Philemon 2), and Timothy. Paul's charge to Timothy is well worth pondering in this connection, for we may easily receive a false impression from the figure of a soldier. We associate it with violence and glamour. It really conveys the thought of devotion and suffering. Like all figures, only a section of the soldier's life is used in the likeness, not the whole. So that Paul wrote: "Suffer evil with me as an ideal soldier of Christ Jesus" (2 Tim.2:3).

Many who went through the war learned that real soldiering did not consist in parading about in fine uniforms, but in enduring all sorts of discomfort and hardship in the midst of rain and mud and weariness and wounds and death. It is this side of the soldier's life which portrays our course in His service. It is not simply endeavoring to accomplish His work in pleasant surroundings, but in the midst of opposition and evils of all sorts, which test our endurance and try our physical frames to the utmost. Not that we seek suffering, or castigate ourselves. No soldier does that. He does the opposite. In every way he seeks to build up and conserve his forces for the fight. We do not invite evil, we face it. Then we thank God and suffer it, for His sake.

THE APOSTLE EPAPHRODITUS

We are far too prone to stereotype the usage of words and make a proper name out of a common noun. This is shown by the rendering of the Authorized Version in this place. Acting under the tradition that only the twelve could be named apostles, they changed the rendering here to messenger. How could the Philippians appoint an apostle? The same superstition insists that Paul took the place of Matthias. But apostle simply means commissioner. In some ways it would be far better if this term were used. That is why I have it in the sublinear. Are there apostles in the church today? Of course there are commissions and commissioners today. That is not the point. If we are asked whether God commissions men today the answer must be in the negative. The apostles are in the foundation.

Epaphroditus was the apostle of the Philippians. But that was a totally different matter from being God's apostle to the Philippians. He had no such authority over the ecclesia or its doctrine or practice such as Paul or Timothy might exercise. He was simply given the power to represent them in carrying their gift to Paul in Rome. He was not merely a "messenger." He may have conveyed a message as well, but his main business was to transport their present to the apostle. Being commissioned ("apostled") to do this he became their commissioner or apostle for the time. Such "apostles" may well find a place today. It did not occur to me at the time, but I also have done this duty, and was an "apostle" for a brief period, empowered to convey a sum of money to evangelists at some distance from the city.

EPAPHRODITUS THE MINISTER

Yet I was also a "minister," for it ministered to the needs of the workers. How far this word has lost its proper usage is seen when we say that Epaphroditus was Paul's "minister." We may be sure that Paul did not attend his church, or listen to his sermons, or "sit under his ministry." To be sure, ministration is not simply serving or dispensing. It is a public office. The priests ministered in the temple (Luke 1:23; Heb.10:11). The political authorities are God's ministers (Rom.13:6). In this sense was Epaphroditus the minister of the Philippian ecclesia, inasmuch as he was their public functionary and attended to their ministration for them. As the priests brought the people's offerings to God, so he carried the Philippians' gift to Paul.

The charm of Epaphroditus is revealed in the exquisite sensitiveness of his character. He was depressed, not because he is infirm (though that may have been the case also), but because the Philippians had heard of his infirmity. Even though drawing near to death he is concerned about them, and the sorrow he causes them, rather than his own disability. Paul shares in this charming considerateness, and hastens his return to them, so that he, in turn, may not be burdened by their sorrow. Indeed, the whole interchange of sympathetic feeling is charming to a degree seldom seen among mortals. It is the delectable fruit of God's love, which should always grace the service of His saints.

INFIRMITY AND DEATH

The case of Epaphroditus is of more than passing moment because it confirms and crowns the great truth that, in this administration, God's power is perfected in infirmity. Paul himself, after he had healed others, was given a splinter in the flesh (2 Cor.12:7). Today God's grace is our sufficiency. Paul gloried in his infirmities, that the power of Christ should tabernacle on him. This was by no means the teaching of the twelve, or even of Paul himself when he was connected with the heralding of the kingdom. That day of physical marvels was announced by displays of power. The powers (not the infirmities) of the coming eon were produced as tokens of its nearness. Even the nations were given gifts of healing, in view of the coming glory. But, as the kingdom heralding ceased, the powers that accompanied it withdrew.

FROM PHYSICAL TO SPIRITUAL

There are circles of believers today who would not have hesitated to charge Epaphroditus with lack of faith, if not with actual sin, for his failure to "appropriate the healing in the atonement." For them it is a disgrace to be ill, and, even if it is the consequence of their self-sacrifice in the Lord's work, it is a dishonor and a shame. How different was Paul's estimate! Quite to the contrary, he writes to them and to us: "have such in honor, seeing that because of the work of the Lord he draws near unto death, risking his soul that he should fill up your want of ministration toward me" (2:29,30). Infirmity of the flesh is as much in keeping with the truth today, as was the health and healing which accompanied the heralding of our Lord or of the twelve, or of Paul's own earlier ministries, which were still connected with the kingdom.

Paul was probably the greatest healer among the apostles. He more than duplicated every sign recorded of Peter in the book of Acts. The lame man at the Beautiful gate of the temple was not the beneficiary of so wonderful a miracle as was the lame man at Lystra (Acts 3:2; 14:8).

Of whom else do we read such words as these: "powerful deeds, not the casual kind, God did through the hands of Paul, so that the handkerchiefs or aprons from his cuticle are carried away to the infirm also, to clear the diseases from them. Besides, wicked spirits go out" (Acts 19:11,12)? In this matter Paul seems to have easily eclipsed all others.

Yet in this, as in all else connected with Saul, who is called Paul, there is a gradual but mighty change, which he himself describes as a going from glory to glory (2 Cor. 3:18). Superficially, one might expect that this would bring still more physical strength and healing, but the advance is confined to the spiritual sphere, while the physical wonders fade away with the failing kingdom hopes.

Personally, in immediate connection with the highest revelation of which Paul could boast (2 Cor.12:1-7), he is given a painful and irritating affliction in the flesh, in order to keep him down. He who healed others cannot heal himself. And when he prayed for its removal, his persistence did not avail. So far as we know it was never withdrawn from him, so that we must picture the great apostle himself as a pathetic figure physically, in the latter part of his career, as at once the revelator and exponent of the great truth for the present, that God's power is perfected in human infirmity. It was in his latest days, in prison and unable to cure himself or his friends, that Paul was most powerful.

GRACE INCREASES

We see this change coming over the scene even more clearly in Paul's connection with his companions. Surely the great healer would wish to cure his own intimate friends and associates in the Lord's work. But, in proportion as the spiritual grace increased, the physical receded. His own child in the faith, whose service he so highly commends in this epistle, is frequently infirm (1 Tim.5:23). That Paul is concerned about it is evident from the fact that he recommends, not a remedy, but a palliative. Weak Timothy became his most powerful aid. "Trophimus, being infirm, I left at Miletus" (2 Tim.4:20). In his earlier days, before the present grace was revealed, he would have healed him. Now infirmity is not to be removed but used. Through it God's power is to be revealed. Some day we shall see that Trophimus's infirmity effected more for God than the most wonderful miracle of healing would have done.

And so today. God's power is not apparent in mighty muscles or in buoyant health, neither of which is to be despised. He displays His glory in broken vessels of clay, so that the excellence of it is not of man but of God. And it is our duty and privilege to bestow especial honor on those who risk their souls in carrying out His work. God could easily keep them in health or cure their weaknesses, but that does not accord with the transcendent grace which is granted to us in this secret administration. Soon after it was revealed to Paul, long before it was made public in his imprisonment epistles, the physical blessings of the kingdom not only retired but, in Paul's case at least, were replaced by positive physical impotence and pain.

Epaphroditus risked his soul to fulfill his commission. It is evident from this that he did not shrink back in the face of danger. He knew before that it might cost him his health, if not his life. He had no such illusion as that the wonderworking apostle would heal him. He committed himself wholly into the hands of God, Who had mercy on him and spared his life. Now he has an honor compared to which all earthly glories fade away. What distinction can compare with his place among the slaves of God? For he it is who was chosen to be our model, to teach us how to serve God acceptably in suffering.

THE IMITATION OF PAUL

PAUL'S service now comes before us, preceded by a threefold warning which is one of the least heeded yet most needed portions of God's Word for His slaves in this era. The third chapter of Philippians brings before us Paul's conduct in connection with the present administration, for our emulation, and points out the pitfalls which are spread for our feet, or, rather, it warns us against those who have fallen into them. And, indeed, almost the whole of Christendom, including its most illustrious leaders and its most noble saints, has failed in a measure in finding the way of true service. Even in Paul's own day many were enemies of the cross, though zealous workers and saved believers. Today the apostasy is so general that few think of objecting to it or warning God's slaves against it.

The keynote of true service is rung out once again: "Rejoice in the Lord!" Not in ourselves, in the flesh, or the terrestrial at this time, but in Him, in spirit, among the celestials. To be safe, we should keep this ever before us. Paul apologized for repeating this so often, but it is sorely needed, for it is seldom heeded. Indeed, few realize the precise force of the simple terms used. It is a very different matter to rejoice in Christ in regard to our salvation and glory, and to rejoice in the Lord in relation to our service for His sake. This chapter deals with service, not salvation. It is saved saints who are enemies of the cross (not enemies of Christ), whose consummation is destruction

(so far as their service is concerned). This is no chapter for unbelievers, but for saints in their character as slaves, who rejoice in their master, or Lord.

THE TRIPLE WARNING

The threefold warning is given to us in highly figurative language, hence it will be well to identify the figures, and put them into literal language. The warning seems to be a reversal, in which the first item corresponds with the last, so we will set it forth in this way, to help us to connect the corresponding parts.

> Beware of curs,
> beware of evil workers,
> beware of the maimcision, > for we are the circumcision who are > offering divine service in the spirit of God, > and are glorying in Christ Jesus, > and have no confidence in flesh.

From this it seems that "curs" are those of the nations who have confidence in the flesh, and the "maimcision" those who rest on their literal circumcision. The whole is in contrast to the previous eras when circumcision had its place and the nations were to be blessed through the physical seed of Abraham.

BEWARE OF CURS

The dogs of the East, when grown, were half-wild scavengers of the villages, without an owner, existing on the refuse or offal, and universally detested. Hence it became an epithet for those outside the pale of promise, in the same class almost with hogs. Our Lord said:

> You may not be giving that which is holy to the curs, nor yet should you be casting your pearls in front of hogs, lest at some time they be trampling them with their feet, and, turning, they should be tearing you. (Matthew 7:6)

Peter also speaks of both together in his parables (2 Pet. 2:22). In order to convey this feeling of contempt we have not translated the word kuōn by dog, as is usually done, but by the more accurate cur.

Curs are outsiders (Rev.22:15). In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus we find a hint of this (Luke 16:21). But there is more than that in the picture Paul puts before us. They are outsiders who devour the offal of the Circumcision. The key to the correct interpretation lies in the following context. Paul recites a list of what he has as a physical descendant of Israel and then adds that he deems it refuse (3:8), that he may gain Christ. This refuse, this offal, which he has thrown away, is eagerly devoured by the curs, that is, those of the outside nations who seek to appropriate that which belongs to Israel in the flesh. They sometimes call themselves "spiritual Israel," and other euphonious terms, but here they are called "curs." They have confidence in the flesh. Beware of them!

EVIL WORKERS

Christendom has many "workers." It seems cruel and heartless to describe them as evil. Indeed, one is tempted to call all "Christian" work good, when the motive seems to be commendable. But one consideration alone shows that, in a very real sense much of the work of Christendom is evil. Until very recent times, the church had such confidence in itself that it proposed to bring about the conversion of the world without the coming of Christ. And, indeed, that is still the aim of the great majority of "Christian" workers. Yet all such efforts must be evil, despite their commendable object, for they propose to take the glory which belongs to Christ alone, and make it their own. All work which does not glory in Christ Jesus is evil. All which boasts in the flesh is evil. All which is disposed to the terrestrial is evil. Beware!

THE MAIMCISION

This is the epithet which reveals what the Circumcision really are in this era when the flesh has lost all standing before God. Circumcision was once a token of covenant relationship with the Deity. It entailed many precious privileges. It will have a great place in the future again, when the physical seed of Abraham will be restored to divine favor. But now circumcision has lost all virtue and has degenerated into a mere mutilation of the flesh. The right to the rite is a physical one. Descent from Abraham is essential, except for proselytes. This term may be applied to all who give it a place in service today, whether they are actual sons of Israel, or take this rite upon themselves in order to share in the blessings which it is supposed to bring.

Circumcision is a cutting off of the flesh, and was intended to set forth its futility. Had the Circumcisionists fully realized what the sign signified, they would have lost all confidence in the flesh. Instead they gave the flesh the highest place, and sought to make it the basis of all blessing. As we, who place no confidence in the flesh whatever, really carry out the true significance of the sign (even if we do not possess it) we are the genuine Circumcision. We have no ritual, no priesthood, no temple in which to go through the outward forms and ceremonies of the divine service, but, in spirit, we offer to God that essential worship which the temple service only shadowed. Too often, alas, the substance was lacking. We need no physical symbol. We dare not be circumcised. It has become a badge of apostasy. Beware of the maimcision!

PAUL'S PHYSICAL PREROGATIVES

But what of Paul himself? He certainly belonged to the Circumcision. What is his attitude toward these physical prerogatives of his? In seven distinct steps he describes to us the height which he had attained in the divine religion. He could measure himself with the best of them. Narrower and narrower he draws the circle of privilege, until at last he stands almost alone, a solitary example, at the summit of human religious attainment.

CIRCUMCISION THE EIGHTH DAY

The rite of circumcision was not confined to the sons of Jacob or Israel. Abraham received it before Isaac was born, and he circumcised Ishmael and all who were in his house (Gen.17:24-27). After the example of Ishmael, his descendants perform the rite in the thirteenth year. Yet all who were circumcised reckoned themselves a special class, being associated with Abraham. Paul, in his claims, really goes back to Isaac, for he adds "the eighth day." This is a smaller circle of privilege than that of circumcision alone. The striking fact is that this class begins with him who was born of parents as good as dead, when the energy of the flesh was replaced by the power of faith.

OF THE RACE OF ISRAEL

Not all who were circumcised the eighth day belonged to the race of Israel. Esau and his descendants are not reckoned in this more highly favored class. Yahweh repeated his promises to the patriarch Jacob, not to Esau. The nation of God's choice is confined to the descendants of Israel. There was a covenant made with the Circumcision. But there was still another made with Israel when they came out of Egypt. To them belong the sonship, the glory, the covenants, the legislation, the divine service, and the promises (Rom.9:4).

THE TRIBE OF BENJAMIN

Benjamin was the best beloved of Jacob's sons after Joseph was taken from him. The tribe took a prominent part in the affairs of Israel, and had the honor of having the temple and Jerusalem within its borders. Israel's first king, Saul, came from Benjamin. it was the only tribe which remained true to the house of David, when the ten tribes broke away. It was an additional honor to belong to such a tribe.

A HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS

In Paul's day the nation was divided into two parties, very much as in these days: one could speak of orthodox Jews and liberal Jews. All the Jews had learned to speak Greek, yet some of them had gone much further, and had forsaken the traditional customs to become Hellenists, with Greek culture and customs. This was especially the case among the dispersion. Paul had been born in Cilicia, so was especially tempted to leave the "Hebrews," as they were called, for more modern ways. Yet he did not yield to these influences, but clung to the traditions. Indeed, he was a leader among such. He even expresses his position here by a Hebrew idiom. For the superlative they used this form. The holiest division of the tabernacle they called the holy of holies. So, to express the fact that he was most "orthodox," he calls himself "a Hebrew of the Hebrews." Religiously this was a more select class than the mass of the nation.

A PHARISEE

In relation to the law the Jews of our Lord's day were divided still more. Among the "Hebrews" there was a sect of special sanctity and severely strict in the law's enforcement. Notwithstanding the excesses to which they went in its interpretation, and the fact that they overloaded it with human additions, outwardly, at least, they were recognized as the champions of the law, and opposed all laxness in its observance. No doubt that most of them were hypocrites, as our Lord so clearly showed. But they were pardonably proud in their stand for the Scriptures, and against human reason and philosophy. It was a distinct gain to belong to their ranks rather than to those who gave the divine legislation no such place in their lives.

PERSECUTING THE ECCLESIA

Paul was no half-hearted, indifferent religionist. Much as we may condemn his misdirected zeal in harassing those who had accepted the Messiah, we must allow that it testified to the earnestness and depth of his convictions. He was a zealous Pharisee, quite above the average in the intensity of his desire to serve the God of his fathers. Among his contemporaries he had a right to expect special recognition for his services on behalf of the Jewish faith, as he saw it.

BECOMING BLAMELESS

A blameless reputation in the midst of the strict Pharisees was no light accomplishment. Let us not think here of sin, for the apostle himself confessed that, while blameless in the sight of men, he was the foremost of the sinners in the sight of God. It is clear that he carried out the observance of the law so fully and accurately that the most faultfinding Pharisee could not detect any lapse. A very notable achievement! It is a question whether Saul of Tarsus could do any more, religiously, to better himself or attain a higher standing in the flesh before God. And it is very much to be doubted whether any other man of his day could equal his record.

PAUL FORFEITS ALL

When Paul was on board the ship which was taking him to Italy, it entered a bay called Ideal Harbors. But, as it was not a fit place in which to winter, the navigator and the man who had chartered the ship proposed to go on to Phoenix, in Crete. Paul expostulated, saying, "Men! I behold that sailing is about to be with damage and much forfeit, not only of the lading and of the ship, but of our souls also" (Acts 27:10). The outcome was that the ship and its cargo were forfeited by their action in pursuing the voyage against the counsel of Paul.

We have brought in this incident in order to give a graphic illustration of the meaning of the word forfeit, which is one of the features of the passage before us (Phil.3:7,8). Like the ship, Paul was loaded with all sorts of valuable cargo, but he forfeited it all in the great crisis which he had just passed through. Indeed, the ship is a picture of the kingdom as heralded in the book of Acts, especially as it concerns Paul and those with him. At the end of the book it goes to pieces, and all that belonged to it was lost; only those who believed were given to Paul, and with him went to Rome.

All these physical advantages were a gain to Paul, but they hindered a much greater gain. They seemed excellent in the dimness of human ignorance, but they became intolerable in the light of the knowledge of Christ. So Paul does not part with them reluctantly, but deems them to be no better than refuse, or offal to be thrown to the curs. All his cherished merit, his blameless walk, his proud pedigree, on which he had prided himself in days gone by, the like of which is the chief reliance of the religionist to this very day, were seen to be so many incumbrances to keep him from the complete appropriation of Christ. Away with it! May his example help us all to refuse the refuse which religion offers us, in order to keep us from the full appreciation of Him Who is our All!

Is it not all too true that the religious gains in Christendom today are nothing more than what Saul had in Judaism? Good birth, membership in an accredited denomination, zeal, and an irreproachable life—what more do you wish in a "Christian"? Yet not one of these things is vital, and every one may be a hindrance to the acceptance of Christ, not merely as our Saviour, but as our All. Indeed, the religionism of today is little more than a camouflaged Judaism, in which the flesh seeks to make itself acceptable to God, apart from, or with the aid of Christ.

GAINING CHRIST

But how could Paul speak of gaining Christ after all these years of sainthood and faithful service? How can he say "that I may be found in Him" when He had been "in Christ" for many years? He is "working out" the salvation he had received (cf 2:12; 3:3). He is carrying it into effect. While all believers rely on Christ for salvation, few indeed are wholly dependent on Him for service. To let those things go which seem an advantage to us is quite a different matter from forsaking recognized sin. The Jew must forfeit his most cherished prerogatives, and the Gentile all his terrestrial advantages if he wishes to gain Christ in this sense. Christ must become their All in service as He is in salvation.

RIGHTEOUSNESS IN CHRIST

Saul was what he was in himself. His righteousness was his own, based on the law. Blameless as he appeared before his fellow men, at heart he was most unrighteous. This came to the surface in his zeal against Christ and His saints. Nothing could be more unjust than to sympathize with Stephen's murderers, or to persecute those who belonged to the just One. Away with such self-righteousness! Now Paul wishes to be found in Christ, not having his own righteousness, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is from God for faith[1] (3:9). Since Job's day men hang with death-clutch to their own righteousness (Job 27:6):

1. or: "on the basis of that faith," cf CVNT, p.143.

> I will hold fast to my righteousness, and I shall not relax.

But God, by His grace, can loosen this grip by a sight of His Christ, and by the gift of His own righteousness in His Anointed.

TO KNOW HIM

The knowledge of Christ is especially extended to His sufferings and death, and to His resurrection. There is no reference whatever to His life and ministry in the land as a Servant of the Circumcision, which is knowing Christ after the flesh, which Paul repudiated (2 Cor.5:16). Our vital connection with God's Anointed does not commence until His crucifixion, and associates us with His resurrection and ascension.

As the succeeding section of this paragraph seems to be another reversal, we will set it forth so as to help our minds to follow the course of thought (3:10-12):

> To know Him,
> and the power of His resurrection, > and the fellowship of His sufferings,
> conforming to His death,
> if somehow I should attain to the resurrection > that is out from among the dead.
> Not that I already obtained, or am already perfected.
> Yet I am pursuing, if I may be grasping . . .

CONFORMING TO HIS DEATH

Righteousness demands the death of the unrighteous. This includes the whole race. Christ alone was righteous, hence He alone could die for the sake of others. His death for us fulfills the demands of justice, yet at the same time involves our death in Him. We should have died on Golgotha rather than He. His sufferings were ours by right, not His. This knowledge puts an end to us and all our pretensions in the flesh. Paul no longer saw himself blameless before men but smitten and slain in the sight of God. He may have been a circumcised Israelite, a Hebrew and a Pharisee, but he was a dead one. The death of Christ put an end to all his physical pretensions and absolutely settled his unrighteousness. Conformity to the death of Christ is the one absolute essential to acceptable service. So long as we still cling to something of our own, we cannot fully find our place in Christ.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF HIS SUFFERINGS

None of us can actually endure the sufferings which came to Christ when He died on behalf of sinners. Nor can we add our own to His sufferings on behalf of the race, for He alone is qualified to save. Had we such sufferings to endure, they would be because of our own sins and not those of others. How then can we enter into "the fellowship of His sufferings"? By the vital recognition that these sufferings, being for us, were really ours, and show God's estimate of what we were in ourselves. This enables us to escape from ourselves and our supposed excellences in the flesh, and to transfer ourselves into Him. There we find all our supposed losses overwhelmingly recompensed.

THE POWER OF HIS RESURRECTION

If we are identified with Christ in His death, then we will be in His resurrection also. Actually, literally, we will be made alive because we are His (1 Cor.15:22). But this is not in view here, for we are concerned with life and service for Him now, not in the future when these warnings and exhortations will no longer be needed. We are not now concerned with resurrection itself, but with a knowledge of its power in our present service. This is viewed from two different angles, both of which should powerfully affect our course. One is the past resurrection of Christ. The other is our own future resurrection.

There is a tremendous reservoir of potential power in the realization that our Lord has been raised from among the dead. Its implications are limitless. If He has accomplished this, He is able for all else. We have a Lord Whose power knows no limits, and does not even retreat before death, the last of all our enemies. All human effort is circumscribed and impotent in view of death. The work in which we are engaged is not so. It will not fail, because it is in the hands of the Deathless One.

ATTAINING TO THE OUT-RESURRECTION

The word exanastasis, OUT-UP-STANDing, has excited so much interest that it is only just that we pay particular attention to it, and to the doctrines to which it has given rise. This word occurs but once, hence cannot be compared with its other occurrences. We must appeal to aids of a different kind. In this case it is very simple to find help, for words compounded of the element ek, OUT, usually retain the meaning of their parts, so that there we have to do with a resurrection, not of the dead merely, but out from among the dead. There is a strong tendency, however, to limit this phrase still further, so that it might read, "out from among the saints," or "out from among the church." Beyond this the question also arises whether there is such a resurrection in the other Scriptures, to which reference is made, or does this suggest a resurrection elsewhere unrevealed? Is there an "out-resurrection" apart from Paul's highest revelation in Ephesians?

We must not fail to notice, however, that, so far as the actual letters in the manuscripts are concerned, and so far as the sense goes, there are other passages which also speak of OUT-UP-STANDings. In the following citations the Greek is precisely the same as in this passage. A difference arises only when we divide the text into "words" as in English. Each of these is an ex anastasis, while in Philippians it is an exanastasis. The space after the x is the only difference, and this is not in the Original.

Acts	26:23	if He, the first out of a resurrection of the dead
Rom.	1: 4	[by or] out of resurrection of the dead
Heb.	11:35	women obtained their dead [by or] out of resurrection

Besides this, the same sense is conveyed when the connective ek, OUT, follows the word, as in these passages:

Luke	20:35	those deemed worthy to happen upon that eon and the resurrection out of the dead
Acts	4: 2	announcing in Jesus the resurrection out of the dead—
1 Peter	1: 3	through the resurrection of Jesus Christ out of the dead

The corresponding verb, OUT-UP-STAND, is never applied to the dead (Mark 12:19; Luke 20:28; Acts 15:5).

From this it will be seen that the term out-resurrection is a name for the thought expressed in the phrase raise out or from among (Matt.17:9; Mark 6:14; 9:9,10; 12:25; Luke 16:31; 24:46; John 20:9; Acts 10:41; 13:34; 17:3,31; Eph.5:14).

We avow, as Paul did before Felix, "that there is to be a future resurrection of the just as well as the unjust" (Acts 24:15). "All who are in the tombs will be hearing His voice, and those who do good things shall be going out into a resurrection of life, yet those who commit bad into a resurrection of judgment" (John 5:28,29). These resurrections do not occur at the same time. There is at least a thousand years between them. Therefore it is necessary that the former should be an out-resurrection, for the rest of the dead do not live until the thousand years are finished (Rev.20:5). It is also evident that, should a resurrection occur even before this, it also would be an out-resurrection. It is important to note that Scripture does not distinguish these by a special phrase. We never read of an "out-resurrection from among the saints." All are simply from among the dead.

It is evident from this that out-resurrection is for believers only and leads to eonian glory, in contrast to the latter resurrection, which leads to judgment. In the out-resurrection we will be sinless, and lead a life of perfect conformity to the will of God. This is the ideal to which our present life should conform. What would we not give to be as we will be when vivified! To serve as we will in that glorious time! What is more practical than to seek to attain it now?

Let us keep in mind the context in which this term is used if we wish to interpret its message correctly. Paul is concerned with his service (Phil.3:4-16). His previous course in unbelief led to the persecution of God's saints. Could anything be further from our occupation in resurrection? Now Paul wishes to regulate his actions so as to anticipate his behavior in the out-resurrection. He puts it, "conformed to His death, if somehow I should be attaining to the resurrection out from among the dead" (Phil.3:10,11). For this he wishes to know the power of His resurrection.

That he is not referring to his own literal resurrection is evident from what follows. "Not that I already obtained, or have already been perfected . . . ." No one could possibly suppose that he had died and had been raised. There was no need to reassure anyone on that point. But the conduct of the apostle may very well have been so like that which will be ours in resurrection, that his friends might easily suppose that God had already actually bestowed upon him the power which belongs to that day.

Christ Jesus has grasped, or taken hold of Paul in order to conform him to His own likeness. That will be openly manifest in the case of all saints when the out-resurrection actually takes place. But Paul wished to grasp that ahead of time, here and now. He wanted the power of that future life to transform his present career.

The powers of the coming eon were present in our Lord's ministry and in that of the twelve, and even in Paul's earlier course. Now that the kingdom is no longer the subject of testimony, these physical marvels have of necessity vanished. In their place we should seek to anticipate the spiritual powers of the future glory which awaits us. These are in reality far greater than those of the kingdom, though their character is very different.

A semi-literal interpretation of this passage has been proposed. It is asserted that, if we are conformed to His death, then we will also be raised from the dead after three days. But, if we are to take this literally, then we must make it all literal. We have not only died, but have been crucified. To be literally conformed to His death, we must go to Jerusalem, and have ourselves crucified on Golgotha, and be laid in the nearby tomb, and then rise and show ourselves by many infallible signs. We might manage to be crucified and entombed, but no literal resurrection would follow on the third day. Paul did not do this literally. But he sought to do it figuratively. Literal resurrection is no attainment, but conduct like that which will be ours in the resurrection is a goal toward which we all should strive.

Other grave difficulties attend this interpretation. To begin with, all believers of this administration of God's grace are planted in the likeness of His death and shall be in the likeness of His resurrection, for our old humanity has been crucified together with Him (Rom.6:5). This occurs at the time of our baptism. We were entombed together with Him through baptism into death. If this is to be taken literally in regard to the time of the entombment and in regard to the death, then it must be literal throughout, especially as nothing is said here as to the time, but the mode is insisted upon. Consistency demands, then, that each believer be literally crucified and entombed when he is baptized by the spirit, and literally roused after three days, and literally reveal himself with the same, uncorrupted body on earth before ascending above.

But when the Scriptures speak of our literal death, this is denied. In the resurrection this corruptible must put on incorruption (1 Cor.15:53). Our Lord saw no corruption (Acts 2:27). If we are to be conformed to His death in our literal death, then we should not see decay. But we trust that what has been said of the passage as a whole will be sufficient to show that it is not concerned with our future lot but our present service, not with the literal resurrection but with the knowledge of its power.

THE RACE

In order to give our service the proper direction and incentive, our career is compared to a race, yet not in regard to competition with others—that is not here, and would spoil the picture—but in regard to our attitude. The racer pays no attention to that which is behind him. It would be a great hindrance. He does not stand up straight, but stretches far forward in the direction of the goal. He not only wishes to arrive there, but to cover the course in such a way that he will receive a prize, a reward for his efforts.

It is vital that we keep the picture here presented to us well within the bounds of the context. Much misunderstanding would have been avoided if thoughts foreign to the theme had not been worked into it. It is true that, in a race, many run and only one wins the prize. According to that there is no use for us to enter it, for Paul would surely carry off the single prize and the rest of us would have nothing but disappointment for our pains. But this aspect of a race is not at all in view here. The lessons are drawn from altogether different features, and this should not be allowed to intrude.

FORGETTING, NOT REGRETTING

Few, indeed, who have learned what they are in themselves, can look back without regret. Paul might have made much more mention of his past errors in his epistles. But he never brings them up without good cause. There is no power in our past, especially not in the years of self-exaltation before we began to find our all in Christ. Many are tempted to spend much time regretting their own ignorance and selfishness, and thinking how much better it would have been if they had been enlightened at an earlier age. Such regrets weaken and unfit us for our forward striving toward the goal, conformity with Christ, and should be discouraged. Let us forget our past advantages and disadvantages and look ahead. Back of us is ourselves, ahead is Christ.

THE PRIZE

The Prize set before us is God's calling above, which might be rendered the "up calling." Like our Lord before his exaltation, our present career is a "down calling," a descent, a humiliation. He humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Wherefore God highly exalts him. Exaltation is the prize set before Him and us. The glory awaits us at the goal. God has called us, indeed, but He has not yet called us up. Now we need to be emptied of ourselves and be found in Him, in lowliness seeking *con*formation to His death, and a realization of the power of His resurrection. Then we will realize it to the full and attain the prize of prizes, *trans*formation into His glorious likeness. It is presented as a prize because it cannot be ours until we reach the goal at the end of the race, not that we alone win it in competition with others.

MATURE SAINTS

Among the saints there are many, if not most, who cannot follow what is here set forth. They have many things in the flesh, race, position, attainments, and reputation, which they cannot forfeit for Christ. They would not think of refusing them as refuse in order to gain Christ. Of conformity to His death they have known little or nothing, nor of the power of His resurrection. In a word, they are immature. In the language of the race course, they lag behind and cannot see the goal. Those who are mature, whose hearts have been opened to the final revelations through Paul, who are no longer puzzled by the enigmas of previous revelation but see face to face (1 Cor.13:12), should be disposed like Paul (3:15). Eventually all will come to this knowledge (3:15).

There is a tendency to create a gap between the mature and the immature, those who have gone ahead in the race and those who lag behind. We would be inclined to urge the laggards to mend their pace, and to catch up with those ahead of them. But the immature have no clear realization of their backwardness. They sometimes consider minority quite the normal state, and maturity an undue assumption. It seems a settled opinion that, in religion, there must be clouds and mystery. Clearness is only conceit. This comes largely because they are constantly occupied with the Scriptures intended for the immature, and have never followed Paul into perfection. But there is no exhortation to them to hurry, but to the mature to accommodate themselves to them. "In what we outstrip, there is to be a mutual disposition to observe the same fundamental rule" (3:16).

THE IMITATION OF PAUL

Paul occupies a unique place in God's revelation. What other man could calmly put himself before us for imitation? Peter would not do so. He would have his readers follow in the footprints of Christ (1 Peter 2:21). Yet in the section concerning our Lord in this epistle, we are not exhorted to go in His steps, but rather to imitate the disposition which sent Him from heaven to the death of the cross. All intermediate "steps" between His incarnation and the cross are avoided by including His life's history in one word, "He humbles Himself." In His earthly career He was the great Example for those who will enter the kingdom which He heralded. But His conduct was not in accord with present truth, for this would have clashed with His whole ministry which was to the Circumcision, and confined to the earth.

Few who have considered the matter have not wondered at first how Paul could take so much upon himself. Not only could he make himself a model (1 Cor.4:16), but, quite unlike any other apostle, he could speak of my evangel (Rom.2:16; 16:25; 2 Tim.2:8), or our evangel (2 Cor.4:3; 1 Thess.1:5; 2 Thess.2:14), without the least attempt to excuse himself. Some have thought it most irreverent for him to couple himself with the evangel after this fashion. And it cannot be condoned on any other ground than the real one, that to him was committed an evangel distinct from all the rest, which can best be described by this fact, rather than by any special side of it, such as grace, or conciliation, or Uncircumcision, all of which have their place, but fail to convey its every aspect.

If Paul lived today perhaps Jeremiah would no longer be called the weeping prophet. Paul's lamentations over the saints might far exceed his over Israel. It seems almost incredible that even in Paul's day many were walking so as to cause him so much concern. What are these days compared to those? As lead to gold, as dusk to midday. If there were so many in those days who were enemies of the cross (3:18) how must it be today? Should we not expect to find nearly all in this category? Nothing else can be expected. There is an almost universal insensibility to the teaching of the cross, and its effect on the physical and terrestrial. The saints are like Job; they hold fast to their own, and will not let go. They do not care to be found in Christ.

ENEMIES OF THE CROSS

Paradox though it seems to be, most of those who are friends of Christ are enemies of His cross (3:18). They are willing to part with their sins and evil and take Him as their Saviour, but they do not wish to part with their goodness or personal advantages and superiorities and be found alone in Him. They do not realize that the manner of Christ's death puts an end to all that man is in himself. They wish to be somebody on their own account. And this makes them antagonistic to the cross. Their attitude is cloaked under various euphemistic terms, which reveal a latent pride in their origin or their character or their attainments in the flesh. All of this clashes with the cross.

WHOSE CONSUMMATION IS DESTRUCTION

This phrase kept me from grasping the tragic meaning of this passage for a long time. It seemed, indeed, that Paul was speaking of believers, for why should he mention any others when speaking of imitating his walk? No others but saints could come into view in this passage. But that the phrase "whose consummation is destruction" (3:19), should refer to them seems quite incredible, until the proper background is furnished by a consideration of the whole epistle, and especially this section of it. This letter deals with service, not with salvation. The disobedient among the saints have already been referred to as "curs," as "evil workers," as the "maimcision," terms whose harshness is excusable only on the ground of truth and necessity. They are intended to be helpful in rescuing the saints from delusive dangers against which they need an alarming admonition.

Here we have such a dire warning. It is a fact that all service done under the influence of the flesh will be destroyed. All self-righteousness must perish. That is its consummation. If it is not forfeited now, it will be burned up at the dais of Christ. At the final consummation God is not only going to be in all, but All in all. What we have here is only the process to this end. The unbeliever will be prepared for it by judgment. The believer should anticipate it now in his service, by gaining Christ in the measure in which he forfeits that which is his own. But if he does not do so, he can look forward to nothing but the destruction of his deeds in that day, when he stands in front of the dais of Christ, to be requited for that which he puts into practice through the body, for it will be reckoned bad (2 Cor. 5:10). If anyone's work shall burn up, he will forfeit it, yet he shall be saved (1 Cor.3:15).

WHOSE GOD IS THEIR BOWELS

This strong and striking figure seems to set before us a form of idolatry which puts the satisfaction of the flesh in the place of the Deity, so far as service is concerned. It is abundantly in evidence in most so-called Christian worship. Much more is done to satisfy the soul than to edify the spirit. Beautiful sights and melodious sounds and pleasant scents are used to attract, in place of the love of God and the glories of His Son.

WHOSE GLORY IS IN THEIR SHAME

Blind to the shame in which the cross of Christ has sunk all fleshly religion, it has become the boast of Christendom. An apt expression of this is the form which has been given to the cross itself. In place of the severe and shameful stake, the badge of human depravity, it has been converted into an ornament to adorn church buildings and their ritual and the dress of devotees. Much of the boast of Christendom is in things which are contrary to the cross of Christ, and which, if seen in its light, would cause deep humiliation and shame.

WHO ARE DISPOSED TO THE TERRESTRIAL

A disposition to the terrestrial is the normal attitude of man. Almost all of the Scriptures are concerned with the earth and that which takes place upon its surface. For Peter and the Circumcision to be thus disposed is quite in keeping with the character of their calling. But today it is a sign of immaturity and opposition to the cross, for the terrestrial is still outside of Christ, and, like the flesh, is not subject to Him, neither is it able. If Christ were today engaged in blessing the earth as He will bless it in the future, then, in Him, we also would be concerned with its betterment. But, without Christ, the cross has condemned the world and its works, and we should not seek to do anything outside of Him.

Not that we are to be recluses and hermits, or do nothing to earn a livelihood. We have our duties. We must provide for our own and pay taxes. We must be subject to the authorities. But, in spirit, we are not of it, especially with any of its plans for self-improvement before the presence of Christ. Such efforts are contrary to the cross, and are anti-christian in character, for they seek to displace Him, and make His presence unnecessary. We know that as a whole all such movements will end in failure, for the earth will need Him more and more, as time goes by, in spite of all that anyone can do. He alone can heal its mortal wound.

CELESTIAL CITIZENSHIP

In glorious contrast to our present place of humiliation on the earth is our potential place of exaltation in the heavens. We have no valid rights on earth. It, with its fullness, belongs to Yahweh, and He has not delegated any of its privileges to us. But why should we wish to meddle here, seeing that God has given us a far more glorious sphere? We are citizens of the heavens (3:20). We will not go there as fugitives of earth or as guests dependent on the hospitality of others. We will need no pass, no visa, as though we were foreigners, limited in our rights and restricted in our movements, alien expatriates, despised emigrants of a despicable and death-doomed race. This we would be in ourselves, but in Christ we are entitled to all the rights and privileges which He Himself can claim.

AWAITING A SAVIOUR

Salvation has its tenses, past, present, and future. We were saved, we are being saved, and we shall be saved. It is not finished until our Lord descends from heaven and we ascend to our allotment. We await Him in various characters. He will come as a Saviour with regard to our bodies, for these have not yet felt His touch. Our salvation is still incomplete, and will remain so in the physical sphere as long as we are here.

THE BODY OF OUR HUMILIATION

No one is so keenly sensitive to the degrading corruption and impotence of our bodies as the saint who has caught a glimpse of His glory. But the phrase means more than that. It is not merely a humiliating body, but the body which accompanies and accords with our humiliation (3:21). So long as we are in it we are to humble ourselves, as well as suffer the humiliation it involves. This is not the time for us to be glorified. The Corinthians were sated and rich and reigning, while the apostles were a gazingstock to the world, but that was due to the Corinthians' carnality (1 Cor.4:8-10). A mortal body is the proper place to display our present humiliation. Undesirable as it is in itself, we should be thankful for it, as it prepares us to appreciate the body that shall be ours in the future.

THE BODY OF HIS GLORY

Paul never met our Lord in His post-resurrection body, as He presented Himself to His disciples. When he saw Him He was enveloped in a glory which the eyes of the disciples never could have borne. To the disciples on the way to Emmaus our Lord presented no outward evidence of His glorified position. This was dimmed, and invisible in His intercourse with the kingdom saints. This was not the body which pertained to His glory. This is not the prototype of our future frame. Even the transformation on the holy mount, though His face shone as the sun, seems to have been bearable to their sight (Matt.17:2). But when Paul saw Him on the Damascus road, the light irradiating Him was above the brightness of the sun (Acts 26:13). Its beams were too bright for Paul's poor eyes, and blinded them, scorching the sclerotic coat into scales (Acts 9:18). Such is the body of His glory.

Contrary to our conceptions, glory and subjection go together. Now our flesh is not subject and is inglorious. Then it will be endued with power and effulgent in its splendor. This is because it is once more connected with the source of life and power and fully under the sway of Christ. Independence and insubjection drag down to degradation and death. Dependence and subjection lead to life and glory. The transfiguration of our bodies will inaugurate a similar operation to include the whole universe, for He is able to subject all to Him. In each case it will involve glorification, so that, at the consummation, when all will be subject, He will hand over to God a universe glorified as well as subject.

STAND FIRM

Having delivered his warnings, designed to shield us from the special evils which beset our course, Paul proceeds to add positive exhortations equally needed to aid us on our way. We are all liable to waver, to differ in our dispositions, to be depressed, to worry, to be engrossed by the evil rather than by the good (4:1-9). How wonderfully he introduces his words! His readers were beloved and longed for, his joy and wreath (4:1). It seems to me that, in milder measure, this is true of all to whom God's truth comes through Paul. I, for one, feel almost as if I were a Philippian, for I am certainly in his wreath and would like to be his joy, and love him and long to see him, as he would me, were we acquainted. Paul puts the personal touch here, and speaks as to particular friends.

Stand firm thus in the Lord, my beloved (4:1). Here is the tone which lifts the favorites of grace. There is no threat of doom in case of disobedience, only the constraint of love. Since that day the slaves of the Lord have been inconstant, unsettled, unsteady, changeable, fluctuating, vacillating, wavering, restless, uneasy, erratic, fickle—anything but firm in the Lord in regard to His service in this era. We do not speak of Christendom, which has been far more constant in the service of the flesh and the terrestrial than the saints have been of Christ and the celestial. Yet God's patience has not been exhausted. The exhortation still calls to us, stand firm in the Lord—thus. As imitators of Paul, as forfeiting everything of the flesh and finding our all in Christ, there is a vast opportunity for service, such as seldom comes to the sons of Adam.

THE SCROLL OF LIFE

To imitate Paul should be very much easier for the saints among the nations than for one from among the chosen race. I have found, in my own personal intercourse with the sons of Israel, that a sense of superiority, on account of their physical pedigree, is seldom counted as refuse. They are fond of quoting, "To the Jew first." And this is often encouraged, rather than discouraged, by non-Jews who have not gone on to maturity. But there is one point in which those of the favored nation still differ from the rest. They have their names in the book of life. They are not removed when they accept Christ and, like Paul, are given a celestial allotment. Hence, if we wish to distinguish them from the rest we may use the formula here adopted, "whose names are in the scroll of life" (4:3).

To help converted Jews realize that their physical advantages must all be forfeited if they are to gain Christ, is a special service to which Paul first devotes himself and then asks the help of his genuine yokefellow. He entreats two who serve, Euodia and Syntyche, to a mutual disposition. Nothing is said as to the nature of their difference, unless the meaning of their names contains a hint. Euodia (WELL-WAY) probably corresponds to our "Luck," while Syntyche (TOGETHER-HAPPEN) may be rendered "Fortuity," or "Coincidence." But it is far more likely that both of them, as well as Clement, and the rest whose names are in the scroll of life were not easily disposed to forfeit all that they had in the flesh, hence were in special need of assistance in this matter.

REJOICING IN THE LORD

"Be rejoicing in the Lord always! Again will I declare, Be rejoicing!" (4:4). If we look at ourselves, we are sad. If we consider our work, we are despondent. But if we view all in the Lord, we have every cause to be glad. And this is just what we will do if we imitate Paul. In our flesh, on earth, the scene is very somber, indeed. In Him in the celestials it is full of joyful expectation. Our weaknesses and our failures should not hinder our rejoicing, for even they will contribute to the glory of His achievements. He is not weak! He makes no mistakes! He will accomplish more than our hearts can wish, and satisfy every desire which God has implanted in us. Let us ever rejoice in Him, and do so all the more when disappointed in ourselves and in our fellows.

THE LORD IS NEAR

"Let your lenience be known to all men: the Lord is near" (4:5). What a help it is to realize the nearness of the Lord! Paul himself, at his first defense, was abandoned by all. Yet the Lord stood beside him and invigorated him (2 Tim.4:16,17). True humility will lead to lenience. But moderation and mildness, are almost sure to be misunderstood and will invite their opposites. When foes and friends take advantage of us there may be a strong temptation to teach them a salutary lesson by using such severity as the occasion seems to demand. It is in us to wish to put things right ourselves. At such times we need to remind ourselves that we are not alone. Severity is not necessary. The Lord is near, and will not only invigorate us, but see that others are put in their places.

THE PEACE OF GOD

Those who are justified by faith may be enjoying peace toward God (Rom.5:1) with reference to themselves. Through Christ, we may be on terms of close friendship with Him. Yet there is much outside of ourselves which may disturb us and ruin our service for Him. Life may be full of perplexing and harassing situations, which produce fear and dejection, unless we enjoy the peace of God, and are able to view them from this point of vantage. God is not disturbed by anything, seeing that all is out of Him, and through Him, and for Him (Rom.11:36). He is its Source, and He controls its course. He is using it all to effect His purpose. So He cannot be uneasy or fearful about it. Neither should we. That is why Paul wishes us to combine thanksgiving with all our prayers and petitions.

Let us not pray and wait fearfully to see if God will comply with our requests, and hold it against Him if there is no immediate response, or if things go contrary to our wishes, nor let us thank Him only when He does what we demand.

The thanksgiving should always accompany the prayers and come before its fulfillment. In fact we should be thankful when God does not fulfill our petitions, for we do not know what to pray for, and the most spiritual petition is that which recognizes our inability, and pleads with inarticulate groanings (Rom.8:26). Peace based on answered prayer may be turned into worry over unfulfilled requests.

Thanksgiving is the incense which will make our petitions agreeable to God. At the same time it is the only power which will preserve our peace. It is like a military garrison that keeps all worry away from our hearts and apprehensions. And indeed, why worry, when we know that all is in the hands and hearts of God and His Christ? All about us loom danger and distress and strife, and we are forced to speak to God about it, and He would have our hearts exercised by it. But faith in Him and confidence in His Christ rejoices in the storm, knowing that He will rise and speak His, "Peace! Be still!" The calm that will surely follow has already found a place in our hearts. We need not be timid. Let us be thankful for both the storm and the calm, for these reveal to us the peace that presides in the heart of God, which may be ours by faith in Him.

THE GOD OF PEACE

Essentially, God is a God of peace. The strife and enmity which now seem to deny this fact, are only means to make it manifest. Moreover, in the midst of all the turmoil there is much which is in accord with the Deity. This we should not forget. Let us not confine our contemplations to the false, the fanatical, the unjust, the impure, the disagreeable, and the disreputable, for there is much that is virtuous and commendable. Especially should we consider the deeds of faith, the fruit of God's own Spirit. And first among these is Paul himself. "What you learned also, and accepted, and hear and perceived in me, these be putting into practice, and the God of peace will be with you" (4:9).

A LIVING EPISTLE

Everything that we can learn about Paul at this period of his life is of particular importance to us, for he is a living epistle, a practical exposition of his own precepts. Apparently, all his affairs are going wrong. Actually they are all going right. His work seems to be hindered in every way. In fact it is being forwarded. He has much reason to be downcast. But he rejoices as never before. He not only has peace with God, and enjoys the peace of God, but is in fellowship with the God of peace.

May our meditations on this epistle enable us to serve Him more acceptably, with some flavor of the disposition which led our Lord down to the death of the cross, with a taste of the service of Timothy and the sufferings of Epaphroditus, and in tune with Paul, that we also may forfeit all to gain Christ! PHILIPPIANS 3:9

The last words of this verse in Greek are: on the-faith, which the CV has rendered "for faith," indicating that Paul refers to his own faith. But it is probable that he means "on [the basis of] the faith" just mentioned, thus seeing Christ's faith as both the channel and the basis of God's gift of righteousness.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

EDITORIAL

We conclude another year of publication of Unsearchable Riches, this time with four issues centered on Paul's letter to the Philippians. For the most part the articles have been reprints, with A. E. Knoch's "Studies in Philippians" leading the way, along with two of James Coram's more recent studies on this epistle. In this issue we now join the early article on "The Kenosis of Christ" by Brother Knoch. With this, along with Brother Coram's article entitled, "The Disposition of Christ" we focus our attention on the heart of the epistle (chapter 2, verses 5-11) which brings the evangel to us in powerful terms. It is the message of Christ's emptying of Himself of the form of God and descending to the form of a slave in fashion as a human, and then humbling Himself even lower, in obedience to His God and Father, to the death of the cross. Then when all humbling is completed in death, God rouses Him and highly exalts Him beyond any former position of honor with the ultimate bowing of every knee and the acclaiming of every tongue. Yet this acclamation is, in accord with Christ's disposition (or mindset), in its highest focus, not for His own glory, but for the glory of God the Father.

In this we see why God sent His own Son so low. It was that all of us might be brought out of sin and corruption and darkness to the righteousness and life and light of Christ's exalted reign. But again, we perceive that this is not the highest goal of it all, for all reaches to the glory of God the Father Who shall become All in all.

Yet for us now the evangel is first bringing us to both the emptying (kenōsis) and the humbling (tapeinōsis) of Christ before it takes us to His exaltation and sets before us our grand and gracious subjection to Him and not ours alone, but that of all. As an especially striking testimony I would urge the reader to linger long on Brother Knoch's own meditation on the humiliation and pain of our Lord Jesus Christ, as it culminated in God Himself forsaking His Obedient One in the darkest of all hours of the eons:

Thus our brother writes: "Here we are able to glimpse the bottomless abyss of His humiliation. Here He Who knew no sin was made sin. Here He Who alone had kept the law endured the law's anathema, 'Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree!' Instead of communion He endured God's curse! Instead of fire coming down from above upon His murderers, it enters His bones. Hitherto sinless, He becomes sin, and like the sin offering, He is shut out of God's holy presence . . . . This is the folly that is wiser than man, the weakness that is stronger than all, the display of love which will overwhelm every heart" (pp.178,179).

But there is much more which hopefully will send the reader anew to this epistle, not only concerning our Lord's obedience and its future results to the glory of God, but also, the effect of this evangel on the believers' present lives. After all, Philippians is an epistle of service and walk. However, the evangel is the engine which energizes us in our behavior. In this respect I point to Brother Coram's article on "The Disposition of Christ," in which he seeks to bring a practical understanding to the English reader of Paul's own guidance expressed in Greek nearly two thousand years ago. Thus concerning Paul's words, "Let this disposition be in you which is in Christ Jesus also" (Phil.2:5): he reminds us: "We must look to God in His saving grace to transform us by the renewing of our mind (Rom.12:2), if we would in any measure at all fulfill this lofty counsel" (p.182).

D.H.H.

THE KENOSIS OF CHRIST

THE supreme example of self-abasement set before us in the Scriptures is the descent of Christ from the form of God to the death of the cross, from the zenith of celestial glory to the deepest depth of earthly degradation. We are exhorted to cultivate His humble disposition, so contrary to all our own ambitions and counter to the spirit of the world about us, that we may emulate Him in devotion to the welfare of others, though it involves our own humiliation. In the course of this exhortation we are reminded of the kenōsis of the Christ, that which changed Him from the form of God to the form of a slave. The Authorized Version does not really translate, but substitutes the oratorical paraphrase, He "made Himself of no reputation." The Revisers courageously give the bold but literal root rendering, He "emptied Himself" (Phil.2:5-11).

This simple statement would never have caused the untold confusion which still seems to surround it, if the commendable zeal of the early fathers and the Nicean council against the Arian faction had not led them to invent a creed, calculated to clear up its meaning. The supposition that men could express clearly and concisely what the Scriptures had failed to clarify is repugnant to anyone who has imbibed but a modicum of the self-effacing disposition which is in Christ Jesus. The early fathers of the church not only fought for their own superiority in the church but their councils actually considered their creeds superior to the inspired utterances of the Scriptures.

These earnest men would probably have excused themselves on the ground that the creed was in accord with the Scriptures, hence not in conflict with the sacred writings. They desired a condensed summary of its teachings. They flagrantly ignored the exhortation to retain the pattern of sound words (2 Tim.1:13) and finally settled on expressions which they themselves were reluctant to allow. One such was the Greek word homōusion, literally, LIKE-BEING, or like-estate, as descriptive of Christ in the form of God. This by no means settled the point, for it was far more susceptible of devious interpretations than the text it was supposed to explain. As the dogmas of the Nicean creed still dominate the theology of the day, especially the kenōsis of the Christ, we will give it as it was first issued by the council.

THE NICEAN CREED

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things, both visible and invisible; and in one Lord, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only begotten, that is to say of the substance of the Father, God of God and Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten, not made, being of one estate [homōusion] with the Father, by whom all things were made on earth; who, for us men and our salvation, came down and was made flesh, made man, suffered and rose again the third day, went up into the heavens, and is to come again to judge the living and the dead, and in the holy Spirit . . . .

This was much modified by succeeding councils, for it did not prove to be as satisfactory as they hoped. Indeed, when we come to examine it, what is there in it? Most of it is a jumble of scriptural phrases, to which we can offer no vital objection except the absence of their contexts. The non-scriptural phrases (which we have italicized to make them prominent) are also unscriptural and irrational. They have been "explained" for more than a millennium, yet no one knows what they mean. They are still repeated as though of far greater sanctity than the words of God Himself. What is the "substance" of the Father?

How can God be "of God?" What is Light "of Light?" What is "very" God "of very" God? What is the "one estate" (or substance) of the Father?

We do not bring up these questions to answer them, but to press the point that they cannot be answered. All acknowledge this. Some seem to think that this alone proves that they are true, as though God is more intent on mystifying His creatures than on revealing Himself. We desire to make the definite charge that these false, futile additions darken counsel by words without knowledge, and must be repudiated rather than acknowledged, if we are ever to have any satisfactory insight into the past or future glories of the Son of God. To confine our investigations to the sacred text should ordinarily be sufficient. Yet earnest and honest truth seekers have become so saturated with the errors of the creeds, that they, unconsciously no doubt, view the oracles of God by the light of these human speculations and theories instead of allowing the human accretions to wither away in the light of divine revelation.

A collection of creeds is an interesting and instructive exhibition of human incapacity. With hardly an exception they are *un*scriptural in every place in which they are non-scriptural. Even when they present fragments of the pattern of sound words, these are isolated from their special setting and divorced from their true application. I see no harm in a series of propositions, expressed in scriptural language and kept in their proper place, to indicate the dominant ideas which a group of saints desire to declare and defend. But I would insist on two essentials: the words must be "sound" or scriptural, and the context must be indicated. In this way they are linked up with the divine oracles themselves and the deplorable confusion fostered by the creeds can never occur.

The rational reaction to the Nicean creed should be somewhat as follows: As it was made in the heat of controversy, mainly to oppose Arian teaching, it probably fails, in going to extremes in the opposite direction. The desire to emphasize the deity of Christ led to statements unwarranted by the Word. The causes which called forth the creed were by no means ideal. Its effects also have been most unsatisfactory. Instead of clearing up the matter once for all, it has been the fruitful source of innumerable and unprofitable speculations, until the verdict has finally been given that it not only has not but cannot be understood. Then the subject is conveniently relegated to the occult by calling it "the mystery of the Godhead."

This is a most mischievous "mystery." It is not only unknown to the Scriptures but altogether contrary to the whole purpose of revelation. God has written a book and has sent His Son in order that He should not be a mystery. He desires to be known by means of His various revelations in our Lord Jesus Christ. If this is a "mystery," beyond mortal minds, then His whole purpose is a failure. There are secrets in the Scriptures which men could by no means imagine until the time of their revelation. These are called "mysteries" in some of our versions. But the relation of Christ to God was never made a secret. Failure to understand it is not due to God's hiding but to human faithlessness and lack of spiritual perception.

We cannot help having a deep sympathy for the early fathers in their effort to understand what they professed to believe. Faith is not credulity, and craves the consent and coöperation of the mind. While it is intensely "rational" to believe God, even when we can not understand Him, it is the height of credulity to believe men when their statements clash with the evidence of our senses or the operation of our intellect. If the Nicean creed were inspired by God, nothing would be more reasonable than to believe it, though its statements transcend reason. Being of men, it cannot be super-rational, and must be irrational.

The Nicean creed drove the church into the darkness of the middle ages. The Reformation revived the subject of Christ's humanity and deity, and sought to reconcile them on the same lines as the early fathers, who never solved the riddle. Beginning with the same misconceptions, modern theologians have been no more successful. They cloud the issue with credal pre-suppositions which effectually keep them from actually considering the Scriptures. Some have made close, scholarly, consistent studies of Christ's kenōsis, which should have made the subject clear. But even they are forced to conclude that the solution is as far away as ever. Their eyes are holden by the "truth" with which they approach the subject. Their light is darkness. No wonder the Scriptures refuse to unlock with such a key!

A thoughtful consideration of the matter should suggest to them that their credal assumptions are the cause of all the confusion. It is these that prevent the Scriptures from shining forth. But, like apostate Israel, there is a veil on the heart of Christendom and its orthodox leaders. Evangelical Protestant expositors are more enslaved by the "infallibility" of the ancient fathers than others are by the decrees of the Roman pontiff. If they could only see that the course of the church is to be down and not up, then they could readily understand that its councils are more likely to be wrong than right. They are by no means a court of appeal from the Scriptures.

Besides the intellectual paralysis induced by credal tradition, the subject is heavily handicapped by unsound words and phrases. Much is made of the two "natures" of Christ, and we are continually referred to His "Person." Nothing concerning these can be found in the Word, but the church council at Chalcedon declared that these two "natures" are perfectly and organically united in one "Person," yet are distinct(!). We are told that we must neither "confound the natures, nor divide the person." The best way to do this is to ignore them both, yea, rather, deplore them both, and rigidly exclude them from the problem, for they are false factors which will lead us off into an inextricable maze and mental mist.

In Paul's exhortation he presents for our emulation two distinct acts of Christ, the kenōsis and the tapeinōsis, the emptying and the humbling. The first describes His descent from the form of God to the form of a slave; the second His descent from the fashion of a man to the fashion of death most detestable to men and most obnoxious to God—the death of the cross. As He was in the form of God before He took the form of a slave and a human frame, the kenōsis is the inspired term for the change which accompanied His incarnation. Hence it has been made the focal point for the discussion of His "nature and Person."

First let us define our terms. What is the literal meaning of ekenōsis? We may at once discard the common rendering "made Himself of no reputation." The words do not at all represent the Greek, and they have acquired a sinister tinge akin to disreputable, which is far from the spirit of the passage. We may be sure that Christ did not commit some sin, some offense, in order to lose His reputation. It is appalling to think that devout and sincere followers of our Lord, who would lay down their lives for His Word, are content to support and circulate such an inconsistent and suggestive translation of this passage.

All are agreed that the literal meaning of the Greek root ken is EMPTY, hence the Revisers translate "emptied," which the CONCORDANT VERSION modifies to "empties," because it is a question of fact, not of time, as indicated by the use of the indefinite. There is no strictly literal example of this meaning of the word in the Scriptures. The nearest we can get is used in the phrase "send away empty" (Mark 12:3; Luke 1:53; 20:10,11). In Mark we have a slave sent to farmers to collect the rent for his master. He expects to carry away some of the fruit of the vineyard, but they dispatch him "empty"—without any grapes. We have the same illustration in Luke 20:10,11.

In most of its other occurrences English idiom forbids the use of the word "empty." Instead, the Authorized Version uses "vain" or "make void." The latter phrase is, perhaps, as close as we can come to the idiomatic meaning of kenoō, the word we are studying. There is no better way to assimilate the true meaning of "He empties Himself" than to consider every other passage in which the word occurs. In Romans 4:14 we read: "if those of law are enjoyers of the allotment, faith has been made void [literally, emptied], and the promise has been abrogated." An "empty" faith would, in this case, be one without any effect.

In 1 Corinthians 1:17 we read: "For Christ does not commission me to be baptizing but to be preaching the evangel, not in wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made void," (or empty). The Authorized Version gives the thought here in its rendering, "lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect." If it were "emptied" the result would be the same as if there were no cross at all.

In the two remaining passages, 1 Corinthians 9:15 and 2 Corinthians 9:3, Paul is concerned that his boasting should not lack results. In the latter instance he has been boasting that "Achaia has been prepared a year past!" If, after all, they should not be ready, then his boasting would be "empty." In these passages the idea is referred to the past, hence they are not as helpful as the other occurrences in fixing the meaning of the word.

Now we are ready to make the application. If faith "emptied" had no effect whatever, and the cross "emptied" totally nullified any results flowing from it, then when Christ, in the form of God, "emptied Himself," or "made Himself void" (as in the other passages), He made the form of God of none effect, He carried nothing that was His in that form into the form of a slave.

This is the Scriptural answer to innumerable theories as to the extent and character of His kenōsis. The bare word "empty" must be enriched by its usage in the Scriptures before we fully comprehend its force in this passage. Perhaps a more colorful and accurate rendering would be, "He vacates Himself." We should not ask, "Of what did He empty Himself?" The passage fails to specify the details because it includes all. Naught that He was in the form of God was transferred into the form of a slave. He retained only Himself, or as a theologian would express it, His personality. The effect of the form of God on the form of a slave is expressed by the literal "empty" and the idiomatic "void" or "none effect."

This conclusion "empties" the kenōsis of its imaginary value in determining the two forms in which He is found in this passage. The form of a slave was not merely a veiling of the form of God. It was no mere limitation of His powers. It was not acting a part. He did not retain all His supposed "attributes" except "omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence," as some assert. The very variety of these theories should be sufficient proof that they have no substratum of truth. The difference between the two forms must be gathered from the qualifying words. One was the form of God; the other of a slave. These suggest a contrast rather than a continuation.

Our conclusion is in happy harmony with the purport of the passage. The disposition which is in Christ Jesus is one of complete humiliation. Applying it to our conduct, we are not asked to limit it to a few of our greater dignities. The specific statement is a decided negative: "not each noting his own things." The same may be seen in the lesser example, Paul, who could say "I am deeming all to be a forfeit" (Phil.3:8). He had much indeed, in the flesh, of which he was proud. He gave it all up in order to be found in Christ. He had the disposition of Christ Jesus.

THE MEANING OF "FORM"

Nowhere, in this passage, do we find the influence of the creeds more powerfully present than in the attempt of many orthodox theologians to give the word "form" a special and extraordinary significance. In fact the Nicean creed did little else than to repudiate the word "form" and substitute "substance" or homōusion "like-estate," and add other confirmatory phrases. Form refers to external appearance. They insist that it must include internal essence. We ourselves were carried along with this traditional view, notwithstanding the concordant evidence against it. The following passages constitute the scriptural evidence:

morphê, FORM

Mark	16:12	He was manifested in a different form to two of them
Phil.	2: 6	subsisting in the form of God
	7	taking the form of a slave

morphōmai, FORM

Gal.	4:19	until Christ may be formed in you

morphōsis, FORMing

Rom.	2:20	having the form of knowledge and truth in the law
2 Tim.	3: 5	having a form of devotion, yet denying its power

Leaving the Philippian text out of consideration, only one of these passages will allow the popular idea that "form" is intrinsic and essential, and is "indicative of the interior nature." In Galatians Paul is certainly speaking of an inward work of grace, not a mere outward copy. He desired to see Christ formed in them. This passage satisfied us, at one time, that the word "form" meant more than what strikes the eye. We failed to note that this sense is conveyed by the word in, not by the verb form. Its presence is against our supposition. It would not be needed if form itself meant an inward work. It proves positively that "in" is absent from its meaning.

The other occurrences are most helpful and suggestive, for in each case there is a decided contrast. In Romans (2:20) the word form is used of the opposite of reality. The Jews did not actually possess the knowledge and truth in the law. All they had was the outward form. This usage of the word should be conclusive, yet it is no more so than Paul's description of the men in the last days who have a form of devoutness, yet deny its power. If that "form" is not superficial, lacking the corresponding inward grace, it certainly would not be devoid of power. What could be more conclusive than these two contrasts? In each the form is in contrast to the reality. It does not correspond to that which is within.

We must recognize that our Lord's descent from the form of God to the form of a slave is not the only change of form which He experienced. On the holy mount He was transformed (metamorphōmai, Matt.17:2; Mark 9:2). After His resurrection He was manifested in a different form to two of them (Mark 16:12). A careful consideration of these incidents will lead to the conviction that there was no intrinsic change in Him on these occasions. His face shone and His garments became white as the light, but there was not the least indication of inward alteration when He was transferred.

After He rose from the dead, He was seen by Mary Magdalene. He was evidently the same in appearance as before His death, for she eventually recognized Him even though she was not expecting to see Him alive. But when He accompanied the two disciples to Emmaus, He assumed a different form. For the purpose in hand there was no necessity for Him to make any essential change in His "nature" or essence. All He needed was an appearance which they would not recognize. Indeed, they partially pierced His disguise, for their hearts responded to that which came from within Him, which the outward form failed to affect.

For our purpose it is sufficient to insist that our Lord is not confined to the two forms of which the apostle speaks in Philippians. After He appeared in the form of a slave He was temporarily transformed before some of His disciples in the midst of His ministry, and He assumed an unusual form after His resurrection. We might insist that His subsequent appearances in glory, such as blinded Saul of Tarsus, and caused the beloved apostle to fall at His feet as dead, are still different forms, suited to His new glories. Certainly He is no longer in the form of a slave. In His future unveiling He will be invested with a form in keeping with the might and majesty of His universal empire.

But one more occurrence remains. This is found in the passage itself. At first sight it seems to contradict all that we have learned concerning the true meaning of the word "form." Our Lord took the form of a slave. Are we to understand that He became a servant only in appearance, not in fact? All are agreed that Christ was the ideal Servant. He was not merely clothed in the habiliments of service, but He served. He Himself assures us that "the Son of Mankind came, not to be served, but to serve . . ." (Matt.20:28; Mark 10:45). Paul gives Him the title "Servant of the Circumcision" (Rom.15:8). There can be no question that Christ is the supreme Servant of God and of men. Why then merely assume the form of a servant, as it is usually translated?

The solution is simple. He did not take the form of a servant, but of a slave. The Revisers insert "bond-servant" in their margin. Nor is this a trite distinction. It is maintained throughout the Greek Scriptures. Nowhere else in the more than one hundred and twenty occurrences of the word slave (doulos) is it ever applied to our Lord. He was a slave extrinsically, not intrinsically. He appeared as a slave, but He was never in bondage. His own characterization of slavery was never true of Him. "The slave is not aware what his lord is doing" (John 15:15). His was intelligent, voluntary service.

The Greek word for slave or bond-servant (doulos) has a more definite and specific signification in the Scriptures than in the Septuagint. There it was used for the Hebrew obed, any sort of service or servant. It is certainly not confined to bond service, for it is used of Jacob's service for his wives (Gen.31:41). It is translated till and dress, in reference to Adam's farming and gardening (Gen.2:5,15). It is frequently called upon to denote the service of the tabernacle. It is the true Hebrew equivalent of our serve and servant. During the three hundred years between the Septuagint and the Greek Scriptures, the Greek word diakonia assumed the meaning of service, and forced douleia into the specific sense of involuntary servitude. It is often rendered bond (1 Cor.12:13; Gal.3:28; Eph.6:8; Col.3:11; Rev.13:16) in antithesis to free. Our Lord was never in bondage, however He may have given that impression by His aspect.

Moreover, the expression "slave" falls far short of indicating what He really was. Even "servant" deals with nothing more than His work. It does not tell us Who the Servant is. As a matter of fact, all will agree that His service was not that of a slave but that of a Son. If "form" indicates the inward reality, He should have appeared as the Son of God. If we apply the evidence of this phrase logically, we must admit that, actually, He was far, far above a slave, and, therefore, when He was in the form of God, He must have been far, far above God. But if the "form" is assumed in each case for the purpose of divine revelation, all is clear. It is not the function of Christ to display Himself but to reveal God.

To put the matter bluntly, the form of God was not an outward indication of what He was Himself, but a representation of His God. The word "form" is out of place if we simply mean that His external appearance was consistent with His internal essence. That would not even need to be stated. The mere use of the term form should be enough to prove that outwardly He seemed to be Another. His exaltation consisted, not in actually being that Other, but in having the visible appearance proper to the Deity.

Furthermore, just as the Philippian passage does not give all the forms in which He appeared after His incarnation, for He was not in the form of a slave on the holy mount, so it does not refer us to all the forms which He took prior to His kenōsis. Besides appearing in the form of God He also appeared in the form of a man and as a messenger. In Philippians we are called upon to consider His highest and His lowest manifestations, for these alone are called for by the exhortation. This discussion has been almost paralyzed by the assumption that Christ had one settled pre-incarnate form, and one fixed form on earth, and a single unalterable form in the resurrection. This is contrary to the facts.

Much light is shed on the form of our Lord before His incarnation by the statement that humanity was created in the image and likeness of God. Mankind is not the original, but a copy. This must have reference to externals, for the language is otherwise unnecessarily involved. In our Image and as our Likeness, suggests, first of all, that the invisible God has an Image and Likeness from which a copy could be made. Humanity cannot be a replica of God Himself, Who is Spirit and invisible. The race was made in accord with the form taken by Christ as the Image and Likeness of God. Therefore, if we find our Lord in a form like a man, that is not because He has imitated us, but because humanity was patterned after Him.

He it was Who communed with Adam in the garden of Eden. There is no need to debate whether He was in the form of God or that like man when He visited Adam. It was probably both, for the first man was himself clothed in a robe of light and had an aura of glory which we might mistake for divine. Undoubtedly, the Elohim of that early paradise was in the form of God, which is always presented with human characteristics. It is not that God imitates mankind, in order to reveal Himself to humanity, but that man was formed after the divine Image, and is a replica of his Maker. Our Lord, therefore, probably appeared in Eden as a Man of surpassing outward glory, subdued, perhaps, to accommodate Himself to the capacity of His creature.

It is probable that, in His subsequent patriarchal appearances, this glory was further dimmed, or mortal men could not have lived in His presence. Cain was able to endure the sound of His voice. When He came to visit Abraham as one of three men (Gen.18:2), the patriarch is evidently aware of His identity, for he calls Him the Judge of all the earth (Gen.18:25), yet he entertains Him as though He were a man. As He withdrew from familiar intercourse with mankind, His glory was augmented. At Sinai, only Moses dared climb the holy mount. A few of the people saw the God of Israel. Perhaps it is only here and in the awful theophanies of Ezekiel and Daniel that we have that manifestation which Paul characterizes as the "form of God."

Let us remember that the divine form does not preclude the likeness of humanity. Ezekiel expressly states that, upon the likeness of the sapphire throne was a likeness as the appearance of a man (adam Ezek.1:26). In the center of a sublime setting for the vision of God, the divine majesty is seen in human form with superhuman glory. Isaiah, in his sixth chapter is not so specific. Nevertheless, what other than a human shape can be imagined? He sits on a throne. He speaks a human language. All of this seems conclusive that the form of God is like that of a glorified man, because He is both the Image of God and the pattern of humanity.

In the resurrection the Lord could readily assume another form. The powers of a physical frame, such as He then possessed, are quite unknown to us, who are deadened by sin and enslaved by corruption. Before He took a body of flesh, there is no reason why His appearance to human perceptions should not be absolutely under His control. It is largely a question of glory or the diffusion of power. When He was transformed from a slave upon the holy mount His physical frame underwent no change in shape. The difference seemed to consist principally in the effulgence of light. His very clothing became glistening. The Son of God is the effulgence of the divine glory. This shone through the temporary and abnormal form of a slave on the holy mount.

After all of this investigation we came back to the simple, natural, unforced meaning of the words. The form of God was the material, visible representation of the invisible spiritual Deity. No one has ever seen God (John 1:18), for He is invisible (Col.1:15). In Colossians the Son of God supplies the needed link with creation because He is the Image of God. In Philippians we have the same thought with only a slight variation, to suit the context. Both the Form and the Image appeal to the eye. This is after the manner of Paul. John appeals to the ear, for he calls Him the Logos, or Word of God. In each case Christ is the Mediator of God and mankind. Human ears cannot hear God and human eyes cannot see Him, but they can listen to the living Word and perceive the Image and the Form.

The Form, however, was not the means of communication, but the evidence of exaltation. When Isaiah saw Yahweh, exalted and uplifted on His glorious throne, with all the accompaniments of Deity, he was overwhelmed by the awful sublimity and magnifical majesty of Him Who sits on the throne. Though he was the great prophet who rebuked the failings of his people, he is utterly humiliated by the sight, and cries out in dismay, "Mine eyes see the King, Yahweh of hosts!" The representation he saw was the Image of Yahweh. The Form that he saw was the glory of God. The marvel for us to discern is this: that this glorious One was not disposed to exploit that glory for His own ends. He had the heart of God as well as the form of Deity, and was disposed to vacate it, empty Himself of it, and take the form of a slave in order to further reveal God's inmost affections.

EQUAL WITH GOD

There is much confusion in our translations in regard to the equality with God which comes in connection with the form of God. Was this a possession or a prize which He did not seize? The Authorized rendering, "thought it not robbery to be equal with God," evidently conveys the idea that He was equal. The margin in some editions, however, change "robbery" to "a thing to be grasped at," which implies that He was not God's equal. This interpretation is followed by the Revisers, who render it, "counted it not a prize to be on a equality with God" and gives us the marginal alternation, "a thing to be grasped." The tendency of modern scholarship is against the idea that Christ was, in any sense, God's equal. This, we are told, is a height to which He did not aspire.

But modern scholars are no more infallible than ancient creeds. Indeed, since we know that the normal tendency is toward apostasy, we should always ask for the evidence. A literal concordant translation of the clause is as follows: "NOT SNATCHing deems THE TO-BE EQUAL to-God." Does snatching harpagmon refer to the act or the thing? In the original the word occurs in four forms, as follows: harpazō, SNATCH, verb; harpax, SNATCHer; harpagê, SNATCHing, noun, and harpagmos, SNATCHing, another form of the noun. The poverty of the English language makes it necessary for us to use —ing for two distinct forms of the noun. The point in our problem lies in distinguishing between them. Why did the inspired writer use the special form harpagmon in this passage instead of the usual harpagê?

The Authorized Version renders harpagê, extortion (Matt.23:25), ravening (Luke 11:39), and spoiling (Heb. 10:34). "The spoiling of your goods" evidently refers to the pillage of their goods. In both of the previous references, men are said to be full of extortion or ravening. It is evident that this word does not refer directly to the act, but to its effects. On the other hand the ending of harpagmos connects it with a group of words which convey the idea of action. If one denotes pillage, this should be pillaging, the committing or carrying out of the act. The same distinction is seen in baptismos, baptizing (Mark 7:4; Heb.6:2; 9:10) and baptisma, baptism (Matt.21:25, etc.). Hallowing and cleansing are further examples. The pillaging in this passage is an act, not a thing.

Equality with God was not a thing Christ refused to grasp. He acted as God's equal and He did not deem the act extortion or ravening or spoiling or robbery, to use the renderings of this root given in the Authorized Version. It was not pillaging. The point of the passage lies in the extremes—equality with God and the death of the cross. The apostle is going to the limit in his exaltation of Christ. To all appearances the form of God put Him into the place of equality with God. Creatures, seeing Him, saw God, and addressed Him by means of the titles which belong only to God and to His Image and Form.

The principal objection to this interpretation from the standpoint of language is the following disjunctive, "but." It would be fatal were it not for the fact that, in Greek, this disjunctive has a wider range than our English "but" and includes our "nevertheless" (Mark 14:29; Acts 9:6; Rom.6:5; 1 Cor.8:6; 9:2,12; 2 Cor.4:16). He was in the form of God, and deemed equality not pillaging—nevertheless He emptied Himself. To show the transcendent humility of His disposition He must be exalted first. It is no great thing for a subordinate or a sinner to be humble. It is the marvel of the universe that the highest perceptible Being has stooped to its lowest depth. Equality always denies identity, and must ever be relative, or it becomes identity. It is the Form which was equal with God.

Too little attention has been paid to the denial that equality with God would amount to pillaging on His part. However we translate the word, all agree that it consists in taking away the possessions of another by violent or unjust methods. This involves two distinct parties, one of whom lacks what another has. Christ lacked equality with God, yet, being in the form of God He assumed it. In doing so He did not deprive God of anything, hence did not deem it pillaging. Indeed, since He appeared to those who beheld Him as God would appear if He were visible, He could take nothing from God without, at the same time, investing Him with it. The glory Isaiah saw was the glory of God, yet he saw it in the form which was Christ.

In this statement we were careful to use the word assume, because such key words should be taken only from the divine vocabulary. Among the glorious ascriptions to the Son of God in the opening prelude of the epistle to the Hebrews are the two declarations that the Son is the Effulgence of God's glory and the Emblem of His assumption. The usual renderings of this word hupostasis, confidence, person, substance, must yield to the one idea which suits each text, as we have fully explained elsewhere. The assumptions of Deity are made known in the Son, Who likewise assumes the character in which God is presented.

We find then that Christ took all that belonged to God in such a way that there was no wrong involved. As He was the only Mediator through Whom God could come into contact with His creatures, He must assume equality with the Deity or fail to properly present Him. An idol misrepresents God. It would be deception to give it divine attributes. The true Image reveals God and should have all that may be perceived of Deity.

The word "equal" may easily provide material for endless controversy. But this is not at all necessary, for all expressions are used in a relative sense. If all the terms we use were taken in an absolute sense, without reference to the subject, the scope, or the context in which they are employed, there would be an end of all intelligent intercommunication. The subject is the visible, tangible Form of God, such as His creatures can perceive. In every particular this Image appeared to be equal to, or the same as, God Himself.

Of one thing we may be sure. He did not only empty Himself of the form of God, but He also left equality behind. When the Jews charged Him with making Himself equal to God (John 5:18) He does not defend the supposed claim. Instead, He points out the inequality between the Son and the Father. This may help us to perceive what constituted the equality. The Son can do nothing of Himself. When He was in the Form of God no such inequality could be perceived. The fact that the Form of God could lay aside equality is sufficient to show the distinction between the invisible, immutable Deity and His Image. He could not lay aside equality with Himself!

The kenōsis of our Lord consisted in vacating His place supreme, in which He manifested the heights of God's glory, apart from sin, for the place of a slave, in which He reveals the depths of His love, by suffering for sin.

Much futile reasoning has been indulged in concerning the nature of God. The Form of God has been identified and interpreted as His nature. This word is never used in the Scriptures in connection with this theme. To bring it in only betrays ignorance and creates confusion.

THE FORM OF A SLAVE

We must reiterate the fact that the kenōsis did not make Christ a slave. He became a servant in the form of a slave. Though His service is so fully set forth in the Word, there is not a single hint that He was, in bondage to either man or God. Though the term slave doulos is freely used of His disciples and the saints, He never takes it or accepts it as His own. His service was not that of a slave, for He knew His Father's will and what He was doing. But those who saw His form found no indication of His divine commission in His physical circumstances. He appeared to be like other men, sold and subject to forces outside of themselves, entirely apart from their own volition.

THE INCARNATION

Some may ask, How was the kenōsis accomplished? We know that, in the process, He came to be in the likeness of humanity. Nothing of the form of God is carried over. His "self," or personality, vacates the glorious form and takes up its abode in a physical body adapted for His mission. Like all mankind His body came from Adam through His mother, but unlike them, His spirit did not come through the first man and his posterity, but directly from God Himself.

Instead of confining their attention to the kenōsis theologians could far more profitably have concerned themselves with the katartisis, the readjustment, or adaptation, of Christ's body. Whatever body He had before incarnation, it is evident that it was not fitted for the great object for which He came. It was not mortal. It could not die. He must have a body, not mortal in the sense of dying, but mortal in the sense of capable of death. He must be the great Antitype of all of the sacrifices. Hence we read (Heb.10:5):

> Sacrifice and approach present
> You do not will,
> Yet a body do You adapt to Me.
> In ascent approaches and those concerning sin
> You do not delight.
> Then said I,
> 'Look! I am arriving—In the summary of the scroll it is written concerning Me—
> To do Your will, O God.'

The Authorized Version rendering, "prepare," fails to fully convey its significance. The body He took was in the nature of an equipment, purposely designed for sacrifice. The human body is especially adapted to this, hence He was found in the likeness of humanity. Such phrases as this and that which describes Him as being "in fashion as a man" confirm the fact that the human element in His constitution was in His body, His flesh, that which has the shape and tangible likeness of humankind.

This process confirms and emphasizes the facts of our findings. Almost all theories of the kenōsis demand some definite connection between the form of God and that of a slave, in order that there may be the transference of attributes or power or glory or "nature" or something—no one seems sure just what. But there is no ground for this whatever. The virgin Mary was an entirely new element in His new form. The spirit of God, His Father, is not identified with His previous form. There is an entire break, except in selfhood. This may be illustrated by death and resurrection, though we do not by any means imply that it was either. The body dissolves in death. Other elements will constitute the resurrected frame. Only the personality continues.

There is no dual "nature," one a remnant of His previous form and one acquired by generation from Adam. The kenōsis denies this rather than supports it. It is a vain speculation founded on error. The transference of personality does not create such a monstrosity. It is reasonable, sane, and scriptural. Christ could speak of His place with the Father before the world was without implying that His human body was involved.

Some may marvel that there seems to be no definite statement on this subject in the Scriptures. Rather let them be amazed that no attention is paid to the one there given. It is just where we would expect to find it, at the very opening of Paul's Roman epistle (Rom.1:3,4). The moment he mentions the Son, he halts the flow of the argument to give a lucid, cogent, and satisfactory explanation of the incarnation. The parenthesis reads as follows: "Who comes of the seed of David according to the flesh, Who is being designated Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead." His "personality" is divided into two elements, flesh and spirit. His flesh comes from David: His most holy spirit comes from God. His soul was the result of their union.

Only His soul is complex. He does not have a divine body and spirit, and a human body and spirit merged into one. His body was not divine. He had a spirit which was superhuman. The supposed difficulties connected with the fusing of the two diverse elements are mostly imaginary. Once we see that the union is found in His soul, which is the seat of consciousness, sensation or experience, all becomes clear. The souls of all humanity are the product of these two elements, flesh and spirit. Our own soul, our own sensation, is the effect of body and breath, just as that of Adam, when he was created (Gen.2:7). The difference between other men and the Son of God is not in the number or name of their components, but in the spirit He received at His generation. The divine spirit operates as readily with flesh as the human spirit which we have.

The differences between Him and us are all connected with the spirit. Let us note how briefly the apostle deals with His human side. He is of the seed of David according to the flesh. No further explanation is necessary or desired. But when His spirit is in view, we are given intimations of the great distinguishing qualities which emerge. He is designated Son of God with power, or, as we are accustomed to put it, He is powerfully designated Son of God. The human spirit is weak and is being destroyed by sin and death. Every human born into the world (except our Lord) is so lacking in vitality and enslaved to sin, that his life is but a lingering death. In contrast with this, the spirit He was given made Him powerful and holy. The latter quality is emphasized by using the Hebrew idiom—the spirit of holiness—His holy spirit.

Man's spirit fails in death. Christ's spirit restores life. There can be no greater proof that He is the Son of God, that His is a powerful and holy spirit, than in counteracting the effects of infirmity and sin, by the resurrection of the dead. A preacher once decided that he would study the funeral sermons of our Lord in order to improve his own. But he could not find any! Until His own decease, we do not find our Lord in the presence of death except as its conqueror. He shared the intense vitality imparted to Him by God, in recalling the dead to life. The little girl, the widow's son, and Lazarus, all acknowledged the power of His holy spirit, which marked Him off from all mankind. He was the Son of God as to His spirit. On this all else is based. It is vital. It is essential.

The more vague, yet graphic language of the Hebrew seer suggests an illustration of this vital union (Isa.11:1):

> Then a Twig will come forth from the set slip of Jesse,
> And a Scion, it shall be fruitful from his roots.

The Twig is the natural growth from the stock of David's father, just as the flesh of Christ came from him by natural generation. The scion, or graft, however, is abnormal. It is not taken from Jesse, but from his root. It does not grow from him but is grafted into him. Yet the scion combines perfectly with its stem. It shares the life of the stock, yet the form and flavor of the fruit flows from the scion, not the stock. Thus does the flesh and spirit unite in Christ, only the spirit dominates the flesh and determines the rich quality of His words and works.

The humanity of Christ is best learned by a comparison with Adam, from whom all humanity flows. This is done by Paul in his first Corinthian letter (15:45). "The first man Adam became a living soul; the last Adam is a vivifying Spirit." The language is emphatically figurative. Adam was not devoid of a body and a spirit, but these are dominated by his soul. Men today are soulish, ruled by their sensations. In contrast with this the last Adam was a Spirit. We know that He also had flesh and a soul. He spoke of both. But these were subordinate to His spirit. Hence He is called a Spirit, though He vehemently denied being such in resurrection, when He appeared more like a spirit than before His death. Other men receive no spirit until they breathe at birth. He was generated by the holy spirit of God.

Similarly, the first man was out of the earth, soilish; the second Man is the Lord out of heaven. Adam was not entirely soil. God gave him the breath of the living. So with his descendants. They are soilish, though they breathe the air of heaven. So with the second Man. His body was of soil, as other men. But his personality is not to be traced to the soil as ours is. He was in the heavens and came down. He is a celestial.

All of this, though occurring in a passage on resurrection, has to do with His incarnation, His humanity before He was roused. Then He was the Lord out of heaven and a life-giving Spirit. He was far superior to Adam. They were not on the same plane. Adam imparted death to himself and to his posterity. The last, Adam restored life to the dead who met Him during His earthly ministry, and will impart it to all who die in the first Adam.

To conclude: The generation of Christ by the holy spirit of God is the cause of His deity and the key to His humanity. In mankind spirit and flesh naturally operate to give life and sensation, or soul. So His divine spirit naturally operated with His human body to make Him what He is. To insist on meaningless, unscriptural phrases, such as "a real Man," and "very God" is only a mask of ignorance. He is not the same as other men. He is not the same as God. He is their Mediator. He has a divine spirit and a human body. His flesh came through Mary and David and Abraham and Adam. His spirit came from God.

HIS HUMILIATION

The humiliation of Christ is the second step in His descent from divine equality to unexampled shame. It must not be confused with His kenōsis, or self-voiding. That was effected before His humiliation, and led to His coming into a human likeness. It was only after He was found in fashion as a man that He humbled Himself. The same disposition governs both. He refused to exalt Himself and seeks the weal of others. But the mere fact of becoming a man is not necessarily humiliating. Apart from sin, mankind made in the image of God is a noble race. It is no disgrace to be human.

The theologians of the Reformation, as well as more modern writers, are very insistent on the "true" humanity of Christ. Again and again we are warned that He was a "real" Man. It reminds us of the opposite extreme of those who insist that He is "very" God. Then when they try to combine the "real" Man and the "very" God, by means of the two "natures" they find themselves outside the Bible altogether, for no such monstrosity is found within its covers. No one is very sure what "very" and "real" mean in this connection. Only, as it seems to be the height of heresy to believe otherwise, most of us keep the peace and save trouble by nodding a dubious affirmation.

If the term "real" implies that He is exactly the same as other men, we deny it absolutely. His spirit came from God, and differed radically from others. That He was in all things like His brethren (Heb.2:17) has reference to His capacity for suffering and consequent sympathy for those in trial. Such expressions must be subject to their contexts and the facts. He is often called a "Man." It would be intolerable pedantry if the Scriptures always reiterated distinctions which have no bearing on the matter in hand. But when the actual subject of His relationship to the race is discussed—as in this passage—the language is most exact. Then we learn that He came to be in the likeness of humanity, and was found in fashion as a man (Phil.2:7).

Christ is the Mediator Who links humanity with its Creator, so that He is neither man nor God in an absolute sense, yet He is either in a relative one. The combination is not that of two alien "natures" which can never be harmonized, but that of body and spirit, the same elements which unite perfectly to form the souls of all other men. His humanity consists in a body derived from Adam through the virgin Mary, His human mother. His deity consists in a vivifying spirit directly from God. These two fuse freely to make a Man unique and a God unparalleled—the peerless Man and the only begotten God (John 1:18).

That His generation by holy spirit did not affect His physical form in such a way as to publicly differentiate it from other men is evident. Even when the Jews knew that He claimed to be God's Son, many could see nothing to substantiate it, or, at best, held Him for a prophet. His deity was not evident, for His form was that of a slave. He was so like other men that they took Him for a mere man. How is it that the spirit to which He owed His life did not alter His physical appearance and make Him a superman whom the world could recognize?

We must remember that, in the beginning of the race, Adam was formed from the soil of the ground before the breath of the living was added to vitalize his frame. When the spirit was added, it did not affect his size or shape. It simply made him live. That is the function of spirit. It imparts life. The entrance of sin introduced death. Humanity became a dying race. The spirit remains with its members only a brief span of years. Sin was perpetuated by the transmission of death. Such would have been the case with Christ if He had been a "real" man, and had had a human father. Instead, the spirit gave Him life, abundant life.

Here is the basic distinction between Christ and other men. Their vitality is limited. Their life is a process of dying. This is what makes them sinners. Sin is not some subtle, unknown principle which mysteriously passes on from parent to child. It is the by-product of the death process. This is what we inherit. This is what makes sinners of us all. If our Lord had received His spirit by human generation, His life also would have been a process of dying and might have ended in a natural death, and He would have been forced to sin. But, thank God, the spirit He received gave Him life—abundant life—so that death was not operating in Him, and sin found no soil in Him. Sin can thrive only in men who are dying.

Let us adoringly acknowledge then that Christ was made in the likeness of humanity. He was not simply spotless and unsullied in His acts. It was not that He succeeded in overcoming the universal tendency to sin which afflicts humanity, but that He had no such tendency to overcome. This was not due to some special miraculous intervention which counteracted the sin He should have inherited from His mother Mary, but simply and solely to the divine paternity which endued Him with a fresh, a sin-repelling vitality, which would have kept Him alive forever if He had not deliberately laid down His life for us, in order that He might take it up again in resurrection.

There is a designed contrast between the words form and fashion (schêma) in this passage. It is usually explained that fashion is the outward and accidental, while form is the inward and essential. We have seen the fallacy of this. Form is the external, and by no means necessarily indicates the inward essence. Christ was not the form of Himself, but of Another. Such a distinction has no place whatever in this passage. A "fashion" is rather a temporary and special kind of form. This is evident from the single other occurrence: "The fashion of the world is passing by" (1 Cor.7:31). The present form of the world is abnormal and fleeting. So with mankind. Its present "fashion" is degrading, but, like all such fashions, is due to change.

We are now approaching the heart of our subject—the humiliation. Because He was found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself. Being a human being is not in itself a cause for humiliation. The day is coming when it will be the cause for highest exultation. But to be found in the shape in which humanity finds itself now, its present "fashion"—sunk in sin and degradation, at enmity with God—this is the proper reason for the deepest humiliation and self-abhorrence.

Human depravity was the prevailing "fashion" of the race when Christ found Himself a member of it. This is by no means its natural state, either internally or externally. We have so corrupted the meaning of the word nature that we have lost much light on the problem of sin. Human nature (phusis) is not at fault. It has not been debased by sin. The real meaning of the word in the Scriptures is instinct. The sins which afflict mankind are against nature (Rom. 1:26). The nations do by nature (or instinct) the things contained in the law (Rom.2:14). Nature teaches us correctly

(1 Cor.11:14) if we only heed it. Nature, or instinct, may, like conscience, be stultified and suppressed by sin, but it is not, in itself, sinful.

The "fashion" of humanity which leads to humiliation is not the result of a sinful "nature." Nor does the remedy consist in the impartation of a new "nature." There is no passage of Scripture to prove that the "nature" of Christ was different from other men. The intrusion of this term is a hindrance to the apprehension of the truth. It is true that, by nature, or in the course of natural generation, the Jews became sons of indignation just as did the nations (Eph.2:3), but nature here is merely the channel, not the cause of sin. Human nature, or instinct, and human conscience remain in spite of sin and as a protest against sin. Why, then, make them sin?

The humiliation of the divine Man may be graphically figured by exaggerating the lack of life, which is the real support of sin. It was as though He alone were endowed with life and all about Him were putrefying corpses. An intolerable stench and gruesome sights certify to the degradation of mankind. Indeed, the world to which He came was a vast cemetery and a slow funeral procession in which all were marching to a ghastly tomb. We do our best to hide this shame. We deny death and deck it with flowers. We refuse to bow our heads or humble our hearts, even when death ends in actual disintegration and corruption.

But death, the process of dying, the only form of life we know since Adam's transgression, was quite as offensive to His sensitive soul as the dissolution of the body is to us. All about Him death reigned, and was evident to His perceptions by its effluvium, sin. "I am come that you might have life," He tells them, but their senses are so far gone that they do not even know that they are dying and reeking with the offensive evidence of mortal disintegration. Once we see that His spirit, fresh from God, gave Him life abundant, so that He was mortal only in the sense that He could die, not in the sense that He was undergoing the process—as all other men—we hold the key to His unique humanity and need no creeds to supplement the simplicity of the divine oracles.

He was not as other men in this regard, and, if He had shared the disposition of His fellows, it would undoubtedly have been the basis of great pride and boasting. Let us put ourselves in His place. All that we do is right. Almost all that others do is wrong. Could we endure such a test? Instead of humbling us it would make us haughty. All we would care to do would be to condemn. Here is where His disposition shines. Here is a glory, a moral excellence, which could not be revealed by Him when in the form of God. That glorious theophany was not a full-orbed revelation. It needed to be complemented by His course when found in fashion as a man. God, in His lofty excellence, cannot reach our hearts. We must see Him in the midst of misery and woe. Here it is that He wins our affections through the humiliation of His Anointed.

THE DEATH OF THE CROSS

Death itself is a humiliation, whatever may be its form. It cannot be dissociated from sin in some shape. Much greater was its shame to Him Who not only had life in Himself, but Who had recalled the dead to life. It is evident that His death was entirely voluntary. Neither the Jews nor the Romans could take His life from Him. Whatever disgrace His death may bring to Him, He brings it on Himself. He needed no one to humble Him. He humbled Himself. His death was due to obedience, not to man, but to God.

But the shame of His death is not to be compared to the degradation of the cross. It is the manner of His death that plunged Him into the deepest abyss of abject ignominy and utter despair. Some forms of death have a halo about them, and call forth the applause of men. But the cross was reserved for the vilest and meanest of criminals. From the human aspect the Roman law had no more degrading death than crucifixion. Like hanging at the present day, it was the symbol of the most shameful end which could be devised to put a stop to a detestable career. The pain, the publicity, the appalling ignominy far exceeded the very worst of modern methods of execution.

CHRIST WAS HUNG ON A STAKE

How far all this is from the mind of Christendom is evident by the present prevalence of this dreadful symbol. To be sure, there is not the slightest ground for supposing that our Lord was hung upon a cross of any kind. It was a mere stake or pole, without any cross-piece. There was nothing ornamental about it. But the figure of the cross has seized the imagination of the masses. If they had any sense at all of its shuddering horror, it would be avoided and banned as accursed, instead of lending its shape to jeweled pendants and ecclesiastic art. All this is a travesty, an insult, to the awful humiliation of which it is supposed to be the sign.

The human side of the crucifixion is a tragedy not altogether beyond the reach of our apprehensions. We have some standards of comparison by which to acquaint ourselves with some aspects of it. If He were a man like other men we could possibly plumb its dreadful depths. But He was not as others. Shame is relative. A callous brute does not feel an insult which would torture a sensitive soul. No mere man could suffer from the taunts, the mockery, the ignominy of the cross, as One Who came from the heights of glory, where the very cherubim veiled their faces in His presence. He alone can realize the stupendous contrast, or feel the fearful horror of being despised by the dregs of Adam's degraded race.

But the manward side of the cross cannot be compared with the Godward aspect of the accursed tree. Men had long been hostile to Him. The cross was but the culmination of a long course of events in which He suffered the ridicule and abuse of His fellows. Not so the curse which fell from heaven when the sun withdrew and the darkness hid the scene from mortal gaze. Through all of His humiliations heretofore He had been upheld by the hand of God. At the very crisis of His ministry, when it became apparent that He was rejected, He could find consolation in fellowship with the Father. "I am acclaiming Thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, seeing that Thou dost conceal these things from the wise and intelligent . . ."

GOD'S PLAN PREVAILS

It must have been in the nature of a grave disgrace for Him to realize that His efforts had not succeeded in their apparent object. It is extremely trying even in these days for His servants to find such a feeble response to God's truth, notwithstanding the knowledge that the apostasy is part of God's plan. Yet He always had recourse to God and never failed to find solace in His presence. Until He hung upon the tree God's smile was His constant comfort. He never forsook Him. The more men withdrew, the closer God came. In the natural course of events, we would expect all others to flee, but that God would stand by Him in the supreme crisis of the cross.

From this standpoint, we view from afar the starkest tragedy of all creation. Here we are able to glimpse the bottomless abyss of His humiliation. Here He Who knew no sin was made sin. Here He Who alone had kept the law endured the law's anathema, "Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree!" Instead of communion He endured God's curse! Instead of fire coming down from above upon His murderers, it enters His bones. Hitherto sinless, He becomes sin, and, like the sin offering, He is shut out of God's holy presence. In solemn sympathy with the awful darkness that enveloped His soul, the sun, a symbol of God's light and life and love, hides its beams until the work is finished and His God once more has ears to hear His cry.

"Eloi! Eloi! lema sabachthani?" that is "My God! My God! why didst Thou abandon Me? " gives us the character and suggests the cause of Christ's deepest humiliation. His persecution by men and desertion by His disciples is a disgrace hardly worthy of mention in comparison with His abandonment by the Deity. It pleased God to bruise Him. Why? That He may bless all others. That He may be just and the Justifier of those who believe. That God may reconcile all His creatures to Himself. The abandonment of Christ by God is the source of all salvation, the root of all reconciliation. This is the folly that is wiser than man, the weakness that is stronger than all, the display of love which will overwhelm every heart.

We must not miss the vivid contrast presented by the exalted station of Christ as the equal of God and His abandonment on the cross. He begins as close to God as possible. No creature could approach the Deity except through Him. To all intents and purposes, He was God, so far as creation is concerned, and He had the form which is suitable to the Supreme. In the dark hours of the crucifixion He is at the opposite extreme. In the midst of physical degradation and moral ignominy He hears the taunts of those who claimed the closest communion with His God, and the contempt of the lowest of the vicious and the vile. He is as far as possible from the place He once had occupied.

It were well if all theological theories regarding God and His Christ were examined in the darkness of the cross. Absolute Deity does not address another Deity as "My God." God the Father is Supreme. He has no God. If He had He would not be God. Absolute Deity cannot be abandoned by Another, is not dependent on Another, and certainly would not suffer humiliation if anyone deserted Him. Neither can He die, and commit His spirit to God Who gave it. On the other hand a man like other men might do all these things and affect little except his own soul. Nothing would be accomplished for others. No One but a Mediator, divine in spirit, human in body, with a soul the fusion of both, will satisfy our reason or fulfill God's revelation.

We have no hesitancy in averring that death is not possible to proper deity. We cannot even force our imagination to conceive of the death of God, for with Him all life would vanish from creation. It is even difficult for us to realize that the Son of God could sink to such a state. He Who gave life to others, even after they had died, could have kept Himself alive under all conditions. This is both reasonable and scriptural. But it is no less rational and revealed that He had the right to die, if it was God's will. And this is precisely what He claimed. He became obedient unto death—even the death of the cross!

HIS EXALTATION

"Wherefore, also, God highly exalts Him, and graces Him with the name which is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should be bowing, celestial and terrestrial and subterranean, and every tongue should be acclaiming that Jesus Christ is Lord, for the glory of God, the Father" (Phil.2:9-11). It is essential that we see the close connection of this exaltation with His humiliation, as well as its contrast to the glories which were His before He emptied Himself. Both can be summed up in a single word—salvation. It is concentrated in His name. He was Yahweh. Now He is Jesus—Yahweh the Saviour.

Before His kenōsis, when He was in the form of God, He was such because God had given Him that honor. He did not seize it for Himself. So also is His present and future exaltation. It is God's response to His sufferings, a reward for His humiliation. To the name that once stood for the highest of God's theophanies, Yahweh, has been added the greatest of God's activities—salvation. As Yahweh, Christ could have coerced the knees of all creation and required the acclaim of every creature, for He had the right to universal homage. But He did not choose to enforce His rights, but rather relinquished all in order to win their hearts by the more potent process of suffering and shame.

If all that He gains in His future exaltation is the forced acknowledgment of His omnipotence by unwilling knees and reluctant tongues, then all His humiliation has been in vain. As Yahweh He could have accomplished this, before He descended to the accursed tree. It is as Saviour that He will receive, without constraint, the acclamation of all creation, the worship of every living intelligence. The glory and the grandeur of His exaltation is embodied in the lowly name which shall become supreme. His salvation shall assure Him universal worship, His deliverance will be the theme of world-wide acclamation.

The goal of all is the glory of God. The kenōsis of Christ is the first step in bringing about the Fatherhood of the Deity. It is the only way that He could display the riches of His affection, the resources of His love. God has revealed Himself as a mighty Creator in His works. This does not satisfy His heart or the hearts of His creatures. He desires to be their Father. He must draw them by the cords of love. He must win their affection. This is the vast task which began with Christ's kenōsis. This is the glorious consummation to which it leads. In eras yet to come God will be the Father of all His adoring creatures. This achievement will make the name of Jesus esteemed above all others in the eons of the eons and beyond.

THE DISPOSITION OF CHRIST
(Philippians 2:1-30)

If, then, there is any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any communion of spirit, if any compassion and pity, fill my joy full, that you may be mutually disposed, having mutual love, joined in soul, being disposed to one thing—nothing according with faction, nor yet according with vainglory—but with humility, deeming one another superior to one's self, not each noting that which is his own, but each that of others also. (2:1-4)

Here, we find the usage of "if" termed "the if of argument"; it is the equivalent of "since" (cp Rom.8:31).

There is such an abundance of "comfort of love," "communion of spirit," besides "compassion and pity" afforded us in Christ. Since, then, this is so, in the empowerment we find through the comfort of love, communion of spirit, even as compassion and pity which is in Christ, Paul would have us "fill [his] joy full" by being "mutually disposed" toward one another, "having mutual love, joined in soul."

Our apostle would have us be "disposed to one thing": "Nothing according with faction, nor yet according with vainglory."

"Faction" (eritheia, STRIFE-) is "a group or clique within a larger group . . . ; party strife and intrigue; dissension."[1]

"Vainglory" is "excessive elation or pride over one's own achievements, abilities, etc.; boastful vanity"[2] (cf Galatians 5:26: "We may not become vainglorious, challenging one another, envying one another").

1. Dictionary.com Unabridged (v 1.1); based on the RANDOM HOUSE UNABRIDGED DICTIONARY, Random House, Inc. 2006.
2. ibid.

Accordingly, then, the apostle Paul would have us "with humility, [be] deeming one another superior to one's self, not each noting that which is his own, but each that of others also."

Eritheia ("faction, CV) is a derivative of eris (STRIFE), which itself is the equivalent of the English "strife," which speaks of "enmity or zeal in action, evil competition"[3] (cf Rom.13:13, "strife and jealousy"; cp 2 Cor.12:20).

If "with humility," we are "deeming one another superior to one's self, not each noting that which is his own, but each that of others also," we will simply have no room for faction, strife, vainglory, jealousy, competition, envy, or challenging of one another. May the virtues and the benefits we find in Christ as we center upon them, keep us from engaging in these sundry yet closely related evils.

For let this disposition be in you, which is in Christ Jesus also, Who, being inherently in the form of God, deems it not pillaging to be equal with God, nevertheless empties Himself, taking the form of a slave, coming to be in the likeness of humanity, and, being found in fashion as a human, He humbles Himself, becoming obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. (2:5-8)

We are to "see to it" ("let this disposition be in you") that the disposition of Christ be in us, living and operative in our lives. This is our duty, or "role responsibility"; the fact that we have no resources of our own with which to fulfill this obligation does not exempt us therefrom, apart from which we cannot be well pleasing to God. Therefore, we must look to God in His saving grace to transform us by the renewing of our mind (Rom.12:2), if we would in any measure at all fulfill this lofty counsel.

3. KEYWORD CONCORDANCE, entry "strife," p.290.

"The supreme example of self-abasement set before us in the Scriptures is the descent of Christ from the form of God to the death of the cross, from the zenith of celestial glory to the deepest depth of earthly degradation. We are exhorted to cultivate His humble disposition, so contrary to all our own ambitions and counter to the spirit of the world about us, that we may emulate Him in devotion to the welfare of others, though it involves our own humiliation.

"In the course of this exhortation we are reminded of the kenōsis [i.e., 'emptying'] of the Christ, that which changed Him from the form of God to the form of a slave . . . .'

"In Paul's exhortation he presents for our emulation two distinct acts of Christ, the kenōsis and the tapeinōsis, the emptying and the humbling. The first describes His descent from the form of God to the form of a slave; the second His descent from the fashion of a man to the fashion of death most detestable to men and most obnoxious to God, the death of the cross. As He was in the form of God before He took the form of a slave and a human frame, the kenōsis is the inspired term for the change which accompanied His incarnation."[4]

THE FORM OF GOD[5]

The entire complement of the "Deity" [or, "*d*eity," theotês, PLACERship, the "GOD*ness*" or PLACERship of God] is dwelling bodily in Christ (Col.2:9). In a bodily way, the entire array of that which pertains to God is dwelling in Christ. Since the entirety of that which pertains to God yet cannot be communicated by God in Himself, Who is spirit, is dwelling bodily in Christ, it follows that Christ Himself is not the Deity.

Similarly, since, in His "pre-existence," Christ alone was 5. James Coram, Unsearchable Riches, vol.86, pp.69,70.

"inherently [lit., "inhering," i.e., existing by right] in the form of God," He, accordingly, "deem[ed] it not pillaging to be equal with God" (Phil.2:6,7).

Since Christ is the Son of God, He is a Being distinct from God. Christ therefore was not equal to God in an identification-of-person sense; instead, the appearance of Christ was in a form which is to be identified as that which is proper to Deity. To all appearances, Christ was the same as, or "equal to," God.

We are not told that Christ is a Form of God (and, therefore, that Christ is a mere Form, instead of a tangible, actual Being). Instead, we are told that God's Anointed, Christ, before He emptied Himself, was "inherently in the form of God" (Phil.2:6). Form refers not to inward essence but merely to external appearance (e.g., 2 Tim.3:5). The form of God was not a manifestation of what Christ was in Himself, but a representation of His God. His glory consisted not in actually being the Deity, but in possessing the visible appearance through which God had chosen to manifest Himself.

"The form of God," does not refer us to that of which God Himself is composed, nor is it an expression corollarial to the notion that God Himself is a corporeal being. Instead, it refers to the personal appearance of Christ, in which He inhered and thus deemed it not pillaging to be equal with God (lit., "ANOINTED JESUS WHO IN FORM OF-GOD belongING . . ."). Christ was inherently in the "of-God" form; thus He appeared to be the Deity. He Who is the Image of the invisible God, existed in the form which is proper to Deity, the form in which God would have Himself made manifest.

IN THE NAME OF "JESUS"!

Wherefore, also, God highly exalts Him, and graces Him with the name that is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should be bowing, celestial and terrestrial and subterranean, and every tongue should be acclaiming that Jesus Christ is Lord, for the glory of God, the Father. (2:9-11)

It is in response to the fact that Christ voluntarily emptied Himself, descending from the highest to the lowest place, that God now highly exalts Him. Even so, in bestowing the name Jesus (Iêsous; "Yahweh-SAVIOUR) upon Him, God does not reward Him with this name, but instead graces Him with this name, the name that is above every name.

Our Lord declared, "Now the Father, remaining in Me, He is doing His works" (John 14:10). All is out of God (Rom. 11:36), including the obedience of Christ unto death (cf Acts 4:27,28). Christ's obedience, too, then, even as our own, is ultimately the work of God. All is for God (Rom. 11:36), to Whom alone all ultimate glory is due.

It is in the name of "Jesus," that is, "Yahweh-Saviour," that every knee should be bowing, whether celestial, terrestrial, or subterranean, and every tongue should be acclaiming that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God, the Father. Thus it is evident that it is the Saviourhood and Lordship of Jesus Christ even as the glory of God as Father, that is in view here, when every knee bows and every tongue declares.

By usage, it is necessarily an "acclamation" (as opposed to a negative "confession"); that is, a proclamation made with enthusiastic approval, for all is declared unto the glory of God—the glory of God, the Father.

In the coming eons, those who are God's people, will enjoy either "the allotment of the land" (Matt.5:5), or an allotment among the celestials (cf Eph.1:3; 2:6), in the case of those whose "realm is inherent in the heavens" (Phil.3:20).

However, during this extended period, by far the greater portion of mankind's only allotment will be a "subterranean" one, in the sleep of death.

"Subterranean" (kata chthonion, DOWN-TERRANEAN), by its elements, signifies "down" (or "in accord with") "[the] terrain." Nevertheless, even those who in oncoming eons know no other allotment than a "down-terranean" one (save for the day of their judging), will, at the consummation (1 Cor.15:22,23,28), be vivified themselves, and join in the universal chorus, bowing their knee and acclaiming that Jesus Christ is Lord, for the glory of God, the Father.

So that, my beloved, according as you always obey, not as in my presence only, but now much rather in my absence, with fear and trembling, be carrying your own salvation into effect, for it is God Who is operating in you to will as well as to work for the sake of His delight. (2:12,13)

"So that . . . ." That is, since it is the case that the glorious goal which he has just rehearsed, in due time, will be achieved, in light of this, Paul goes on to entreat, saying: "according as you always obey, not as in my presence only, but now much rather in my absence, with fear and trembling, be carrying your own salvation into effect . . . ."

"According as you always obey . . . ." It is true that because of "the spirit's law of life in Christ Jesus," all genuine believers have a new disposition and a new walk, according to the measure of grace granted them (cf Rom.8:1-4). However, because of the limited and imperfect obedience of even the most noble of believers, it is evident that Paul's words here are not intended categorically but relatively, and are more exhortative in their intent than strictly accurate in their historicity. To speak thus, however, in such a case, is reflective of wisdom, as in the adage, penned many centuries after the lifetime of Paul: "Treat people as if they were what they ought to be and you will help them become what they are capable of becoming."[6] vation into effect, for it is God Who is operating in you . . . ." We do not fear and tremble in light of the impending era of indignation, for "being now justified in [Christ's] blood, we shall be saved from indignation through Him" (Rom.5:9). Accordingly, we enjoy "the expectation of salvation, for God did not appoint us to indignation, but to the procuring of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess. 5:8,9; cp 1 Thess.1:10).

Still, since it is God Himself Who is operating in us as we carry our salvation into effect, it is only fitting that we do so "with fear and trembling." Any literal "fear" here, however, is simply that of a healthy fear to displease, born out of a longing to be well pleasing. Our "fear" of God—which is the beginning both of wisdom and of knowledge (Psa.111:10; Prov.1:7)—is essentially a matter of deep reverence and extreme awe. It is a reverential fear, motivated by love and gratitude, not by a spirit of terror. Similarly, we would tremble solely out of awe and wonder, in consideration of the wondrous fact that God Himself deigns to operate in us.

First of all, here, we should note that any "salvation" that we carry into effect, is necessarily a practical salvation, not our positional salvation in Christ. Our positional salvation in Christ is "not in accord with our acts, but in accord with [God's] own purpose and the grace given to us in Christ Jesus before times eonian" (2 Tim.1:9; cp Eph.1:4).

Conversely, our practical salvation, by which, as the case may be, we are either delivered from sin and danger, or kept from sin and danger, is something in which we are very much involved, for it is we ourselves who must carry it "into effect."

Even so, our need for God is just as vital as concerns our practical salvation as in the matter of our positional salvation in Christ, through the blood of His cross. Ultimately speaking, we are no more capable in ourselves of either delivering or keeping ourselves from sin and danger, than we are of achieving a justified standing before God through our own works. It follows, then, whenever we do either get ourselves out of trouble or keep ourselves out of trouble, that we do so as God's achievement (cf Eph.2:10), not as some sort of demigods that are ultimately, somehow "on their own"—ones who accordingly enjoy their own independent glory, quite apart from the Almighty.

How glorious it is to learn, then, that when we ourselves, as the proximate cause thereof, "effect" or "produce" our "own [practical] salvation," we do so as those in whom God Himself, as the ultimate cause thereof is "operating," doing so "for the sake of His delight." Literally, it is God Who is operating in us, "THE TO-BE-WILLING AND THE TO-BE-IN-ACTING" (Phil.2:13) in which we engage, in all such cases.

All be doing without murmurings and reasonings, that you may become blameless and artless, children of God, flawless, in the midst of a generation crooked and perverse among whom you are appearing as luminaries in the world, having on the word of life, for my glorying in the day of Christ, that I did not run for naught, neither that I toil for naught. (2:14-16)

Where the Scriptures speak against "reasonings," they have in view not the ratiocinative (i.e., "reasoning") process itself, per se, which indeed is essential to rational thought, but the "wicked reasonings" (Matt.15:19) and "evil reasonings" (Mark 7:21) which arise out of man's own sinful heart. These result in evil and wicked acts (hence they are wicked and evil reasonings), whether one's syllogisms employed unto such ends, as such, should be valid or invalid.

We would not "murmur," nor wickedly "reason"; and, we would avoid all such evils that we may be becoming blameless and artless, children of God, flawless, in the midst of a generation crooked and perverse indeed.

But even if I am a libation on the sacrifice and ministration of your faith, I am rejoicing myself and rejoicing together with you all. Now, to be mutual, you also be rejoicing, and be rejoicing together with me. (2:17,18)

Under the law, the priest poured a "libation" (i.e., liquid offering) onto the sacrifice (Num.15:5). Paul had simply "poured himself out" into the lives of the Philippians, as they presented themselves before God in the actions related to their faith, which is to say, in the "sacrifice and ministration" thereof. Even so, in this, he was rejoicing, and entreats the Philippians to join him in rejoicing as well.

Now I am expecting, in the Lord Jesus, to send Timothy to you quickly, that I also may be of good cheer when I know of your concerns. For I have no one equally sensitive, who will be so genuinely solicitous of your concerns, for all are seeking that which is their own, not that which is Christ Jesus'. (2:19-21)

Of all those whom Paul might send to assist the Philippians, Timothy alone was suited for faithful service. Alas, all the rest were seeking that which was their own, not that which is Christ Jesus'.

Now you know his testedness, that, as a child with a father, he slaves with me for the evangel. This one, indeed, then, I am expecting to send—as ever I may be perceiving my course from the things about me—forthwith. Yet I have confidence in the Lord that I myself shall also be coming quickly. (2:22-24)

As we make our plans concerning any proposed future activities, rather than seeking the guidance of signs or miraculous revelations, let us instead imitate Paul here as well and be perceiving our course "from the things about [us]," as a more faithful indicator of what may lie ahead.

Now I deem it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother and fellow worker and fellow soldier, yet your apostle and minister for my need . . . . (2:25)

Epaphroditus' "apostleship" or commission consisted simply in acting as courier in order to bring the Philippians' contribution to Paul. This example illustrates the elementary, essential meaning of the term.

. . . since, in fact, he was longing for you all and depressed, because you hear that he is infirm. For he is infirm, also, very nigh death, but God is merciful to him, yet not to him only, but to me also, lest I should be having sorrow on sorrow. The more diligently, then, I send him, that seeing him again, you may be rejoicing and I may be more sorrow-free. Receive him, then in the Lord with all joy, and have such in honor, seeing that because of the work of the Lord he draws near unto death, risking his soul that he should fill up your want of ministration toward me. (2:26-30)

"Ministration" (or "ministry," leitourgia, PEOPLE-ACT-ion) speaks of active, personal service on behalf of another (cf Luke 1:28; cp 2 Cor.9:12). Even if the Philippians were willing to make some contribution to Paul's need, they were deficient in the matter of "ministration" or personal care on his behalf.

Concerning Epaphroditus: "This is a most pathetic picture of the suffering which often accompanies the service of the Lord in this economy. In the previous economy Paul could and would have healed Epaphroditus, for his very handkerchief was potent with power (Acts 19:11,12). That course was in keeping with the kingdom which he then proclaimed. But now, when all blessing is spiritual (Eph.1:3), Paul does not attempt to heal Epaphroditus and tells Timothy to use a sip of wine for his frequent infirmities (1 Tim.5:23). How full of feeling is the statement that he was depressed, not by his own condition, but because the Philippians had heard of it and would be concerned about him!"[7] J.R.C.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

CONCLUSION 4[10-18]

PAUL TO THE COLOSSIANS

1 Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus, through God's will, and ˙brother Timothy, [2] to the saints and believing brethren in Christ in Colosse:

Grace to ⁼you and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

[3] We are thanking the God and Father of our ˙Lord Jesus Christ, always praying° concerning ⁼you, [4] on ¯hearing of ⁼your ˙faith in Christ Jesus and the love which ⁼you ˡhave io˙for all the saints, [5] because of the expectation ˙being reserved° for ⁼you in the heavens, which ⁼you hear before in the word of ˙truth of the evangel, [6] ˙which, being present io˙with ⁼you, according as in the entire world also, ˡis bearing° fruit and growing°, according as it is among ⁼you also, from the day on which ⁼you hear and realize the grace of ˙God in truth, [7] according as ⁼you learn it from Epaphras, our ˙beloved fellow slave, who ˡis a faithful dispenser of ˙Christ ov˙for us, [8] ˙who makes evident also to us ⁼your ˙love in spirit.

[9] Therefore we´ also, from the day on which we hear, do not ˡcease° praying° ov˙for ⁼you and requesting° that ⁼you may be filled full with the realization of His ˙will, in e˙all wisdom and spiritual understanding, [10] ⁼you to walk worthily of the Lord io˙for e˙all pleasing, bearing fruit in every good work, and growing° in the realization of ˙God; [11] being endued° i˙with e˙all power, in accord with the might of His ˙glory, io˙for e˙all endurance and patience with joy; [12] at the same time giving thanks to the Father, ˙Who makes ⁼you competent io˙for a ˙part of the allotment of the saints, in ˙light, [13] Who rescues° us out of the jurisdiction of ˙Darkness, and transports us into the kingdom of the Son of His ˙love, 14 in Whom we are having the deliverance, the pardon of ˙sins, 15 Who ˡis the Image of the invisible ˙God, Firstborn of every creature, 16 t for in Him is ˙all created, ˙that in the heavens and ˙that on the earth, the visible and the invisible, whether thrones, or lordships, or sovereignties, or authorities, ˙all is ˚created° through Him and io for Him, 17 and He´ ˡis before all, and ˙all has its cohesion in Him.

18 And He´ ˡis the Head of the body, the ecclesia, Who ˡis ˙Sovereign, Firstborn o from among the dead ones, that in all He´ may become° ˡfirst, 19 t for in Him the entire complement delights to dwell, 20 and through Him to reconcile ˙all io to Him (¯making peace through the blood of His ˙cross), through Him, whether ˙those on the earth or ˙those in the heavens.

21 And ¯you, being once ˚estranged° and enemies in ˙comprehension, i by ˙wicked ˙acts, 22 yet now He reconciles i by His ˙body of ˙flesh, through His ˙death, to present ¯you holy and flawless and unimpeachable in His sight, 23 since surely ¯you are persisting in the faith, ˚grounded° and settled and are not being removed° from the expectation of the evangel which ¯you hear ˙which is heralded in the entire creation ˙which is under ˙heaven of which I´, Paul, become° the dispenser. 24 I am now rejoicing in my ˙sufferings ov for ¯you, and am filling up in my ˙flesh, in His stead, the deficiencies of the afflictions of ˙Christ, ov for His ˙body, which ˡis the ecclesia 25 of which I´ become° a dispenser, in accord with the administration of ˙God, ˙which is granted to me io for ¯you, to complete the word of ˙God—26 the secret ˙which ˡhas been concealed° from the eons and from the generations, yet now is made manifest to His ˙saints, 27 to whom ˙God wills to make known a what are the glorious ˙riches of this ˙secret among the nations, which ˡis: Christ among ¯you, the glorious ˙expectation—28 Whom we´ are announcing, admonishing every human and teaching every human in e all wisdom, that we should present every human mature in Christ Jesus; 29 io for which I am toiling also, struggling° in accord with His ˙operation, ˙which is operating° in me i with power.

2 For I ˡwant ¯you to ˚perceive what the struggle amounts to which I am having ov for ¯your sakes and for ˙those in Laodicea, and whoever have not seen my ˙face in flesh, 2 that their ˙hearts may be consoled, united in love, and io to e all the riches of the assurance of ˙understanding, io unto a realization of the secret of the God and Father of ˙Christ, 3 in Whom all the treasures of ˙wisdom and ˙knowledge are concealed. 4 y Now I am saying this, that no one may be beguiling° ¯you i with persuasive words. 5 For ⁺even if, in ˙flesh, I am being absent, bt nevertheless, in ˙spirit, I ˡam tg with ¯you, rejoicing and observing ¯your ˙order and the stability of ¯your ˙faith io in Christ.

6 As then ¯you accept ˙Christ Jesus, the Lord, be walking in Him, 7 having been rooted° and being built° up in Him, and being confirmed° in the faith according as ¯you are taught, superabounding in it i with thanksgiving.

8 ˡBeware that no a one shall be ˙despoiling ¯you through ˙philosophy and empty seduction, in accord with ˙human ˙tradition, in accord with the elements of the world, and not in accord with Christ, 9 t for in Him the entire complement of the Deity is dwelling bodily. 10 And ¯you ˡare ˚complete° in Him, Who ˡis the Head of every sovereignty and authority, 11 in Whom ¯you are circumcised also with a circumcision not made by hands, in the stripping off of the body of ˙flesh in the circumcision of ˙Christ. 12 Entombed together with Him in ˙baptism, in Whom ¯you are roused together also through the faithfulness of the operation of ˙God, ˙Who rouses Him o from among the dead ones, 13 ¯you also being dead to the offenses and the uncircumcision of ¯your ˙flesh, He vivifies us together tg jointly with Him,

¯dealing graciously° with all our ˙offenses, 14 ¯erasing the handwriting of the decrees against us, which ˡwas hostile to us, and has taken it away out of the midst, ¯nailing it to the cross, 15 ¯stripping° off the sovereignties and ˙authorities, i˙with boldness He makes a show of them, ¯triumphing over them in it.

16 Let no a˙one then be judging ⁼you in food or in drink or in the particulars of a festival, or of a new moon, or of sabbaths, 17 which ˡare a shadow of ˙those things which are impending—yet the body is the Christ's. 18 Let no one be arbitrating against ⁼you, who ˡwants, in humility and the ritual of the messengers, to ˡparade what he has seen, feignedly, ˡpuffed° up by his ˙fleshly ˙mind, 19 and not holding the Head, out of Whom the entire body, being supplied° and united° through the assimilation and ligaments, is growing in the growth of ˙God. 20 If then ⁼you die together with Christ from the elements of the world, a˙why, as living in the world, are ⁼you subject to ˡdecrees°: 21 "You should not touch, nor yet taste, nor yet come into contact" 22 (which things are all io˙for corruption from ˙use), in accord with the directions and teachings of ˙human beings?—23 whicha* ˡare (having indeed an expression of wisdom in a willful ritual and humility and asceticism) not i˙of any value td˙against the surfeiting of the flesh.

3 If then ⁼you are roused together with ˙Christ, be seeking ˙that which is above, where ˙Christ ˡis, sitting° i˙at the right hand of ˙God. 2 Be setting your mind on ˙that which is above, not on ˙that on the earth, 3 for ⁼you die, and ⁼your ˙life is ˚hid° together with ˙Christ in ˙God. 4 Whenever ˙Christ, our ˙Life, should be manifested, then ⁼you´ also shall be ˡmanifested together with Him in glory.

5 Deaden then ⁼your ˙members ˙that are on the earth: prostitution, uncleanness, passion, evil desire and ˙greed, whicha* ˡis idolatry, 6 because of which the indignation of ˙God is coming° on the sons of ˙stubbornness—7 among whom ⁼you´ also once ¯walked, when ⁼you were living in these things.

8 Yet now ⁼you´ also put° away ˙all these: anger, fury, malice, calumny, obscenity out of ⁼your ˙mouth. 9 Do not ˡlie° io˙to one another, ¯stripping° off the old humanity together with its ˙practices, 10 and ¯putting° on the young, ˙which is being renewed° into recognition, to accord with the Image of the One Who creates it, 11 wherein there ˡis not* Greek and Jew, Circumcision and Uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, slave, freeman, but ˙all and in all is Christ.

12 Put° on then as ˙God's chosen ones, holy and ˚beloved°, pitiful compassions, kindness, humility, meekness, patience, 13 bearing° with one another and dealing graciously° among yourselves, if anyone should be having a complaint td˙against any. According as the Lord also deals graciously° with ⁼you, thus also ⁼you. 14 y˙Now on˙over all these put on ˙love, whicha* ˡis the tie of ˙maturity. 15 And let the peace of ˙Christ be arbitrating in ⁼your ˙hearts, io˙for which ⁼you are called also in one body; and ˡbecome° ⁼thankful. 16 Let the word of ˙Christ be making its home i in ⁼you richly, in e˙all wisdom, teaching and admonishing yourselves; in psalms, in hymns, in spiritual songs, singing i˙with ˙grace in ⁼your ˙hearts to ˙God. 17 And everything, a˙whatsoever ⁼you may be doing, in word or in act, do all in the Name of the Lord Jesus Christ, giving thanks to ˙God, the Father, through Him.

EDITORIAL NOTES

WE GIVE special attention to Paul's letter to the Colossians in this issue. It begins on page 2, in place of the usual poem, with the Framework as used in the first edition of the Concordant Version. Its usefulness is especially noted on page 19 under the subheading, THE LITERARY STRUCTURE.

The revised CV of Colossians as it currently stands follows. Changes in 2:12 are of particular interest. The terms "Entombed together" and "are roused together" both reflect what we recognize now as fact verb forms, where the fact of the action is emphasized irrespective of the time. Furthermore, the phrase, "through faith in the operation of God" is changed to a more literal rendering of the Greek: "through the faithfulness of the operation of God." To be roused together in Christ is certainly a matter of faith, and indeed of our faith. But here Paul points to God's faith in His faithful operation of rousing.

In accord with Brother Knoch's desire that the CV translation be an ongoing project, he himself discusses on pages 13-19, changes made in Ephesians 1:15-17 from the first edition (called the "Complete Edition") to the later editions. In this case, he maintained that the original thought was correct, but not well expressed in English idiom and according to the Concordant principle of consistency.

Along with, and beyond such matters, may we all be rejoicing in the revelations of "the Christ of Colossians." D.H.H.

HIS GRANDEST GLORIES

CHRIST and His highest honors come before us in Colossians, even as the saints and their celestial blessings are the theme of Ephesians. There the transcendent truths of the present secret administration were set forth as they affect the believers among the nations, who become peers of an election out of Israel in spiritual, supernal dignities. Here these tremendous truths are a halo on the brow of Christ. His glories as the Messiah of Israel on the earth are magnified to universal dimensions. All is created in Him in the beginning, and all is reconciled in Him at the consummation (Col.1:16-20). On earth, at present, He is not confined to Israel in flesh, but, in spirit, is found among the nations. This is the basis of their future bliss (Col.1:27).

Colossians and Ephesians are very similar, for they teach the same truth, though from different standpoints. To fully appreciate and enjoy these epistles, which are two of the most precious portions of God's revelation for us in this secret administration, it is necessary that we clearly grasp the distinctive view presented in each. Even as Philippians can only be understood in the light of service, so Colossians can only be clear to those who see that it deals with Christ's relation to the present, even as Ephesians was especially concerned with the place of the saints, especially the Uncircumcision.

In reference to the body of Christ the two epistles are complementary. In Ephesians the emphasis is on the members of the body, while Colossians presses Christ's headship over the ecclesia. Ephesians elaborates the relation of the members to God and to one another, as well as to Christ Himself. Colossians is largely confined to our connection with Him alone.

In Ephesians, the bulk of the epistle is concerned with an orderly and positive presentation of the truth. Colossians, however, devotes the corresponding space to the correction of departures from it.

Ephesians is general, with no local allusions. Colossians is concerned with a special situation, and a particular ecclesia.

In Ephesians the previous disabilities of the nations in flesh, alienated, guests, without prospects, far off (Eph. 2:11-13) are used to form a contrast to their present spiritual privileges as fellow-citizens, members of God's family, with a part in the temple (Eph.2:19,20). In Colossians this contrast is replaced by comparing Christ's limited glories in Israel, in flesh, with His vast spiritual glories among the nations and in the entire universe. This contrast is not directly expressed, as in Ephesians, but is evident in the figures of the kingdom (Col.1:13), and the startling announcement that He is among the nations (Col.1:27) whereas He would not leave the land during His ministry to Israel, before His crucifixion.

In Ephesians the body of Christ is the complement of the universe (Eph.1:23). In Colossians we are complete in Him. There the ecclesia is the final factor in bringing all under the headship of Christ. On the earth His headship is exercised through His apostles and the holy nation. These are, figuratively speaking, His "filling" on earth, who share His spiritual might and majesty, and so are, officially, a part of Him. The ecclesia which is His body has the same function in His celestial dominions. These two, earth and heaven, constitute the universe, so that no more "filling" is needed to administer all creation. Hence we are the final "filling," the plêrōma, or complement, that which fully fills, so that no more is needed. The administration of the universe is amply provided for, both on earth and in the heavens.

In Colossians Christ is a double Complement. He is all that God needs (Col.2:9), and all that we need (Col.2:10), to be complete. God needs a visible and tangible expression suited to the capacities of His creatures, and Christ fulfills this fully by means of the body in which He came to do His will (Heb.10:5).

We, also, find our Complement in Him. All the rites and ceremonies pertaining to the flesh, such as circumcision and baptism, which were deemed essential to a standing before God, are now found in His death, His burial, and His rousing. What He has done, not what we do, fully equips us for the divine presence. In Ephesians, we are the complement of all, but in Colossians He is our Complement.

In time, our choice is carried back to before the disruption (Eph.1:4). Christ is carried back to creation, for He is the Firstborn (Col.1:15). Our blessings are among the celestials. All was created in and through and for Him (Col.1:16). We are joint-members of the body (Eph.3:6). He is Head of the body (Col.1:18). We, as His complement, complete the universe (Eph.1:23). He uses the entire complement to reconcile the universe to God (Col.1:20). In Ephesians the secret consists of the joint-enjoyment of the allotment among the celestials, the joint-membership in the body, and joint-participation in the promises by the saints among the nations. In Colossians the same truth is expressed by putting Christ among the nations, instead of in Israel, to whom He has hitherto been confined (Col.1:27).

The secret of Christ, that He is to head up the entire universe (Eph.1:10) had been partially made known to the prophets of old, though not in its fullness, "as it is now revealed" (Eph.3:5). That part of this secret which they made known, His messiahship to Israel, is used as a background in this epistle. His future kingdom in the new earth is used to figure His present spiritual dominion, "the kingdom of the Son of His love" (Col.1:14). His future presence in Israel, constituting them the ruling nation, finds its parallel in His present spiritual presence among the nations, constituting them His complement for the future administration of His celestial realms (Col.1:27; Eph.1:21-23).

"YOUR FAITH" AND "ACCORDING-TO YOU*p* FAITH"

Colossians is by no means a repetition of Ephesians. Even those paragraphs which seem to be parallel have minute variations which, when sympathetically examined, will show how exquisite the separate details harmonize with the special subject of the whole. Thus, in Colossians, we read of "your faith in Christ Jesus and the love which you have for all the saints" (Col.1:4), which is very simple and readily understood. Why then, in Ephesians, should we find "the according-to you faith, and the [faith] for all the saints" (Eph.1:15)? The Authorized Version renders both "your," but the Revisers, who were keen in such matters, changed it to "which is among you." One of the best German versions reads "in you." Another has "with you," but puts "concerning you" in the margin, as the real translation. Luther has "with you." The YOU is plural (p).

Before examining the evidence, let us remind ourselves that Ephesians is devoted to setting forth precisely what this marginal reading ("concerning you") suggests, that is, the special faith which concerns us in this administration as distinct from the truth for other times, and, besides, it seems to have no special bearing on any particular group of saints (as the Ephesians), unless this passage is so interpreted. If all the saints in Christ Jesus are before us, and the apostle refers to that body of faith which is especially theirs, then this peculiar wording, "the according-to you faith" is not only fitting but necessary to express his thought.

But, if he is simply referring to the faith exercised by the special group whom he addresses, then the simple "your faith," as in Colossians, is appropriate. One phrase fits Ephesians, the other Colossians.

But how should THE according-to YOU (tên kath humas) be translated? That it should not be rendered simply "your," as in the Authorized Version, seems beyond question, first, because this is the regular rendering of the simple genitive pronoun OF-YOU*p (humōn)*, which occurs ever so often, and concerning which there is never any difference of opinion. Consequently the accusative pronoun, with the connective DOWN (according-to with the accusative), a combination which occurs but seldom, should at least be translated otherwise in order to preserve the distinction. In order to help us to arrive at a clear conception of the nature of this special phrase in Greek we present a number of passages in which this same combination is found, grouped according to the nature of the context, which helps to determine the translation into English.

THE according-to YOU OR ME

Acts	24:22	[Felix] shall investigate your affairs
Eph.	6:21	may become acquainted with my affairs
Phil.	1:12	my affairs have rather come
Col.	4: 7	All my affairs shall be made known.

This group seems to sustain the idea that it does not refer to possessions so much as to things pertaining to the person in question. Felix would investigate the circumstances leading to Paul's arrest and the charges against him. The saints would wish to be informed of Paul's case at court. Paul's faith would hardly be included in the reports, as this is contained in the letters themselves.

THE according-to [SOMETHING]

1 Tim.	6: 3	teaching in accord with devoutness
Titus	1: 1	truth which accords with devoutness
Heb.	11: 7	righteousness which accords with faith

In these passages harmonious relation is expressed plainly by the connective which we are considering. Teaching and truth cannot possess devoutness but they should never conflict with it. Righteousness cannot have faith, but it can be in accord with it. From these passages we may see clearly that mere possession is not in view when this connective is used.

THE according-to YOU [SOMETHING]

Acts	17:28	some poets of yours have declared
	18:15	questions about . . . a law of yours,
Eph.	1:15	the faith which relates to you [this faith of yours]

Here we have the closest parallels to our text. Certain Greek poets sustained a relation to Paul's hearers, and the law was related to the Jews as this faith was related to those who received Paul's epistle. The law reference is especially helpful, for we are well acquainted with the relation of the law to the Jews. It applied particularly to them and to no others, which seems to be the special point of the passage, for Gallio would not judge according to a law not pertaining to his jurisdiction.

The question of idiomatic translation alone remains. The phrase "of yours," is a peculiar English idiom, in which two signs of the genitive (of and -s) are added to a word already genitive (your), giving it, not only emphasis, but a vague kind of relativity. This seems to serve very well in connection with the law, as most readers are more or less clear that it was exclusively for the Jews. It would also serve in Ephesians if it were as well known that the faith which it reveals relates exclusively to the saints today. Would "this faith of yours" convey the same impression as "this law of yours?" It is questionable, but it may be wise to use it to secure uniformity.

The expression "according-to" does not always comply with the demands of English idiom, as these examples abundantly show. Hence it is necessary at times to use substitutes, as "suited to" (1 Cor.12:31), "savor of," "corresponding to," "relate to," as was done in this passage (Eph. 1:15). In view of the following sentence, "and that for all the saints," however, which should make its meaning clear, we are considering the rendering "of yours," which will be uniform with the two other occurrences, and avoid the use of the word "relates" in this single passage. Then it will read, "Therefore, I also, hearing of this faith of yours and that for all the saints . . ."

In passing, let us note that the phrase "when hearing" is not intended as a mark of time. A participle is a tenseless verbal adjective. Hence we use when to make it indefinite. The very highest authorities and Greek scholars, as well as one version, give the participle a "present" force, but this is utterly untenable, although English idiom compels the addition of the present verb in many passages. Here is where a sublinear should help. The Keyword edition has all these verbs in lightface because they are not in the Greek. "On hearing" or "when hearing" show the basis of Paul's thanksgiving and prayer.

Perhaps the idiomatic "on hearing" would show this best. The point is that he could not thank or pray as he did until first he had heard. In Colossians he heard of their faith and love. In Ephesians the faith was revealed to him apart from any particular group of saints, and leads to petitions which apply to all the saints of this administration.

It remains to add a few words as to the Greek text in this passage. We do not, as a rule, countenance the many omissions in the text used by the Revisers, merely because a word is not found in Vaticanus. Here most manuscripts add the words "the love" in the following sentence thus: "your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints" (AV). But the most ancient, the three used in compiling the Concordant Version, did not have these words. They were added by a later editor in Sinaiticus. On many occasions the additions of this editor are of great value. But in Ephesians he seems to be recording the attempts of early expositors to make this epistle understandable after its message was lost. So that his addition of "the love" in this place lacks the weight which his notations usually have.

The thought that we have a special faith is so foreign to theology that this passage has caused much perplexity to translators. The Revisers have added the words ye shew, thus: "the faith which is among you, and which [ye shew] toward all the saints." But how can we show faith to the saints? If this is the individual faith of the believer rather than that which they believe, then this should be rendered into or in. But how could they have faith in the saints? The passage can hardly be understood or translated so long as the faith exercised by each one is in view. But once we see that this rare and peculiar expression is used to indicate the things to be believed by them alone, as the law was to be obeyed by Israel alone, and in each case was in accord with their peculiar place in God's purpose, all is clear.

With this beginning of Paul's prayer the following petitions, for a spirit of wisdom and revelation, possess much more point. He prays, in fact, that they may be enabled to comprehend what he writes to them in this epistle. That this is most appropriate is evidenced by the fact that, even if it was understood by its first recipients, there is very little to show that it has ever been apprehended since by any considerable number of saints. It has seldom been accorded its proper place by teachers of the Word. The apostasy from Paul started in his lifetime and has continued ever since.

When the true import of this phrase first dawned upon me it seemed to me that I had discovered a key to the epistle, and I was greatly concerned to give it a clear expression in the version. Hence the rendering "the faith which relates to you," which still seems to me better than any other I have since seen. But my zeal led me too far in the following petitions, where I made the indefinite pronoun auton (OF-it or -Him) refer to this faith. Logically and indirectly I am still convinced of this, but grammatically the word faith is feminine in Greek and would be referred to as her (autês). It would be her realization, her calling, her allotment, her power (Eph.1:17-19).

There is a problem in Greek grammar which deserves further study. The so-called neuter forms are not confined to things, so the CONCORDANT VERSION has changed the name to indefinite. For instance, the article ta, indefinite plural, is responsible for the word things ten times in the Revised Version of Colossians 1:16-20. And yet it seems clear that impersonal things are not at all in view, especially as regards reconciliation. So also, in such expressions as the stupid, the weak (foolish things, weak things, RV, 1 Cor.1:27) it is certainly evident that things are not meant, for they are not stupid. It is clear that, in these passages, the indefinite includes the other genders. At one time I considered this sufficient ground for the rendering its in place of His in Ephesians 1:17-19, but now I freely confess that it is inadequate, and so have changed the version to His in these verses.

This correction, however, does not affect the rendering of "according-to you," in the beginning of the prayer. Whether the apostle prays that the faith may be realized, or God, Who gives the faith, comes to much the same result. Whether it is the expectation of its call or His in it, is not vital. Whether it is the riches of the glory of its or His allotment, is the same, for in either case it is His. And, even if not expressly limited to the faith by the grammar, all of this which we have from God is nevertheless within the boundaries of the faith to which the apostle refers before commencing his petitions. The call is not God's call to Israel, but to us, and the expectation and allotment and power is in accord with (kata), celestial glory unknown before.

THE LITERARY STRUCTURE

A grasp of the controlling theme of an epistle greatly aids in its apprehension. The same is true of its parts. When we are sure of the subject of any section its interpretation is safer and more satisfactory. And when we can get a view of the whole epistle at a glance, showing the symmetrical relation of its parts, our dull minds are relieved, and our eyes are opened to the special subject of each section, and its relation to the whole, or, perhaps, a similar section in the corresponding member, and its contrasts as well as its likenesses. A casual reading of Colossians will hardly discover the symmetry of its structure or the exquisite relation of its parts, so we reprint the structure for those who may not have seen it before (cf p.2).

Within the salutations, and the mutual reports, one at each end, we find the body of the epistle, which deals with the secret of Christ, that great revelation concerning Him which had been hitherto withheld or only partially made known, but is now necessary, since the saints have a place among the celestials. Twice is this secret the subject, once in reference to its realization by us, and, near the end, in connection with its expression to others. Between these two come correction in doctrine and in deportment. Perhaps we might come closer to the facts if we further characterized these as warning in reference to teaching, and exhortation as to walk.

THE SECRET OF CHRIST IN EPHESIANS

It will be seen from this that the controlling theme is the secret of Christ, just as the framework of Ephesians shows that it is concerned with the secret of this administration. Before entering upon our studies in Colossians it may be well to see what Ephesians has already revealed on this theme, for it is there that we read of the secret of Christ for the first time, and there we have clear indications, not only of its contents, but also of its relation to the present administration of God's grace. It were well if we had these two secrets distinct in our minds before we enter into Colossians.

The first intimation of the secret of Christ in the Ephesian epistle is found in that marvelous opening effusion in which God's blessedness is the keynote of a symphony of blessings for us, according to the riches of His grace, which He lavishes on us, in all wisdom and prudence, making known to us the secret of His will . . . to head up all in the Christ—in the heavens as well as on the earth. Hitherto the headship of Christ had been confined to the earth. His heavenly headship had been kept secret. But now that an election out of the earth is to share His celestial glories, these must be made known. This, then, is the essence of the secret of Christ—His universal headship. Not only is He to have the throne of David, and be King of kings upon the earth, but He will reign throughout the starry spheres, including all creation.

Once more, at the end of the first chapter of Ephesians, when praying that we may perceive the transcendent greatness of the power which operates on our behalf, we are reminded of the mighty strength which roused Christ from among the dead and seated Him at God's right hand among the celestials, up over every sovereignty and authority and power and dominion and every name that is named, not only in this eon, but also in that which is future: and subjects all under His feet. This is the Ephesian aspect.

Here we have still further light. The throne of David is still vacant. The Son of Mankind has not yet taken His seat as earth's Suzerain. He was rejected on earth, but He was acclaimed in the heavens. There He already has the highest place, at the right hand of the throne of God, though all may not yet respond (1 Peter 3:22). All varieties of heavenly government are subordinate to His sway. There is no name above that of the despised Nazarene. From the accursed cross, beneath the lowest dregs of earth, He has ascended to the highest heights of heaven. Even now He has this place in heaven, and in the eons to come He will include the earth in His universal sway. That Messiah should be Head in heaven even before He took earth's sovereignty was part of the secret hitherto unknown.

Such is the side of the secret of Christ which is set forth in Ephesians. As we shall see, much more is revealed in Colossians, because Ephesians treats of it only insofar as it makes contact with the main theme, which is another secret. This is why, when the apostle comes to make a categorical statement of the three items which characterize the present administration, he prefaces it with a brief allusion to the secret of Christ (Eph.3:3,4). Referring to the passages we have just been considering, he says, "(according as I write before, in brief, by which you who are reading are able to apprehend my understanding in the secret of the Christ, which, in other generations, is not made known to the sons of humanity as it is now revealed to His holy apostles and prophets)."

That these words refer to the secret of Christ, in contrast to the secret administration which is defined in the following words, is clear from the phrase "in brief." The secret administration had been set forth at length. Almost all of the preceding chapters was devoted to its details. Hence it was by no means brief. But the two allusions to the secret of Christ (Col.1:10,20-22) were very short, and gave only that side of this secret which was in point. So, likewise, "as it is now revealed" fits the secret of Christ, for the prophets had spoken of His earthly headship. But it cannot apply to the secret administration, as that was absolutely unknown. No apostle or prophet could have had any inkling of it.

Such is the sum of our knowledge of this secret before we come to Colossians. It was concerned almost wholly with the future. It was limited largely to His relations to the ecclesia which is His body. He will be Head of all. The holy nation will rule the earth in His name. The ecclesia which is His body will be His administrator in celestial spheres. Thus the whole universe will find their Head in Him.

Colossians reveals the secret of Christ in all its fullness. It is not briefly set forth, in relation to the special faith which is ours in Christ, but fully revealed, in relation to all creation, on earth as well as among the celestials, including the nations, as well as Israel, the celestial hosts as well as the members of His body. He is not only Israel's Messiah, and the Saviour of the nations, but the Head of the entire universe and the Reconciler of all.

In Him dwells the Complement of the Deity. At the beginning all is created through Him and at the Consummation all is reconciled through the blood of His cross. And in the eons of the eons He will be the supreme and only Head of all.

O that God would enlarge the hearts of His holy ones to make room for the Christ of Colossians! Some of our hearts, alas, are so shrunk, that we welcome Him only as our own personal Saviour. Even this overflows its narrow confines. May His spirit expand it, by His grace, to give Him His place as Israel's Redeemer, as the Saviour of all mankind, as the Head of all creation, and the Reconciler of all who are stranged from God! Only such a Christ can satisfy the heart of God. Only such a Christ should satisfy our own hungry hearts.

INTRODUCTION AND CONCLUSION

Colossians 1:1-2; 4:10-18

PAUL—what a wealth of grace and overwhelming glory fills our hearts at the very mention of his name! He was the erstwhile enemy of Christ and rabid persecutor of His people, who hunted them down even in distant Damascus. In an instant the glory of Christ stops him in his mad career, and wins his heart, henceforth to worship and work for Him alone. Can grace ever gain a more splendid trophy than Saul of Tarsus, the chief of sinners, yet supreme among the saints? But how much greater was the grace that still awaited him! From glory to glory God led him on, until he reaches the highest honor ever accorded a mortal, for he is the vessel chosen to fill up God's Word and to reveal God's latest secrets, the fruit of His highest thoughts and His deepest love.

Paul presents himself in this epistle as an apostle, for he has been commissioned, and has authority to write and set forth the truths and reveal the secrets which it contains. Apostles are in the foundation (Eph.2:20). These were needed to form a solid substratum for God's operations among mankind. Paul appears alone as apostle in his salutations, especially in those in which his authority is necessary to certify to his words. Yet he sometimes associates others with him, in other capacities. In Colossians, as in second Corinthians, "brother" Timothy joins in the salutation. He is not seen as an apostle, but simply as a brother in the faith.

CHRIST JESUS and Jesus Christ—what a vast difference between these two titles, though one is merely a transposition of the other! Jesus Christ is the humble, despised, rejected, crucified Messiah. His glories wait until the future, at the time of His return to earth. At present He has no place down here. But Christ Jesus! Already He is highest in the heavens. Seated at the right hand of God, there is no dignity to equal His. All might and power, all sovereignty and authority among the celestials is centered in Him. There He is not humbled, but honored! There He is not despised, but praised! There He is not rejected, but acclaimed! There He is not crucified, but glorified! We hail Him, not only as the coming King upon the earth, but as the present Head of all celestial might and majesty! Hail! Christ Jesus!

THROUGH THE WILL OF GOD

The will of God is the positive pole of the divine intention. God is carrying out His great purpose of revealing His heart by means of two contrary currents during the eons. The mutual reaction of these upon each other accomplish His purpose. One current coincides with His will. The other goes counter to it. One movement is headed by Christ. The other is led on by Satan. Saul of Tarsus, before he met the Lord, was fulfilling the divine intention, for he was preparing the black background on which alone the highlights of God's grace could be displayed. But he was going counter to God's will. After his call, Ananias said to him, "the God of our fathers selects you to know His will" (Acts 22:14).

A true apostle must come through the will of God and conform to that will in his words and works. Thus all is traced back to the divine volition. The source of all is found in God's love and its determination to win a response through its activity on our behalf. God wants our love, hence wishes us to know His will. The apostle's first prayer opens with this petition: That you may be filled with the realization of His will (1:9). This is a root which bears much fruit. Without it our walk will lack those qualities which are dear to God's heart. Wisdom and understanding, as well as a fruitful walk, must grow out of an apprehension of God's will.

TO THE BRETHREN IN COLOSSE

The epistle is addressed, in the first place, to Colosse. Yet it was also sent to Laodicea, and, indeed, is especially meant for all who had not seen Paul's face in the flesh (4:16; 2:1). Like its companion epistles, Ephesians and Philippians, the very mode of communication is in accord with its contents. Flesh has no place. Paul is bound (4:18). He could not go to Colosse in order to tell them these transcendent truths by word of mouth, but is compelled to have his words committed to writing, so that they will be seen rather than heard, and not only can be transported vast distances, far beyond the reach of his voice, but may be imperishably preserved for the future. And so they have come to us.

The recipients of this epistle are distinguished by two tokens—holiness and faith. On God's side they were saints, hallowed by contact with Him. On the human side they had believed in Christ. The title here may be Christ Jesus, as in Alexandrinus, to accord with Ephesians. As the apostle has connected his apostleship with this title, this must be the same in shortened form. This epistle was not sent to all saints without discrimination. In those days there were still some of the Circumcision, as we shall see, to whom Paul was not sent, whose faith did not lay hold of Christ as at present, exalted, but who looked forward to His future rule upon the earth. The faith of the Colossians is expressly said to be in Christ Jesus (1:4).

Faithfulness and trust are the accompaniments of belief.

In the original there are no distinct terms for them. By the figure of association the Greek uses believing for faithful throughout. Thus, in this very epistle, Paul refers to Tychicus as "a beloved brother and believing servant" (4:7). Because belief produces fidelity it is used for it in a figure. English itself has this figure, though it is faded. What is faithful if not full of faith, or belief? Yet it has come to mean trustworthy, dependable, and the word believing is reserved for its literal sense. As we have seen, we must use faithful with service, yet when this is not clearly in view it may be better to use believing. In connection with brethren, believing is probably better, inasmuch as this epistle is not especially devoted to service.

THE INVOCATION

The invocations in Paul's three prison epistles are identical. Just as the body of the epistles commence with blessing or thanking, so the first wish of the apostle's heart for his readers is grace. Divine favor lavished upon those who deserve God's indignation will yet be the most precious gem in the crown of His glory. His creatures will be awed by His infinite might. They will be amazed by the wonders of His works. They will marvel at His wisdom. Their hearts will swell with thankfulness for His kindness. Far more precious will be the praise and worship which His mercy will call forth. Yet the highest adoration and the deepest affection will come to Him from those who realize the depths of their deserts and the corresponding heights to which His grace has exalted them.

We should make more of His grace. Not only should it warm our own hearts at all times, but it should pervade our walk and our service. Oh, how great a transformation would it work in the heralding of the evangel, if it were presented in its purity and power! Grace that Saul encountered on the Damascus road. Grace that Paul received to serve the saints. Grace that enabled him to suffer for Christ's sake. Let us not confine it to the past, to our call, when we first believed. This invocation is not for unbelievers, but for us. Our salvation is not only by but to or in grace (Eph.2:5). Not only did it begin with grace, but it continues so, and will finish with the greatest display of all, when our bodies will be transfigured and glorified.

First grace, then peace. First justification, then reconciliation. Were God not gracious, what could there be but indignation and enmity? But now that His favor hovers over us as a benediction, we may have peace with Him, peace in our spirits, peace with our fellow-saints and the world, yea we may enter into the peace of God, and enjoy some measure of the calm with which He is filled, Who knows the end from the beginning, and Whose great aim is to overcome all enmity with love, and clasp His whole creation to His heart in the bonds of perfect and perpetual peace.

These blessings can come from one source alone—from God, Who now looks upon us as His children, and through our Lord Jesus Christ, the Mediator between us, our Saviour and Lord. We are no longer merely creatures of the great Creator. We have entered the circle of His family and now are children of an affectionate Father. He will be gracious to us and give us peace, through the work of our Lord, Jesus Christ. Indeed, He is our Peace, for He not only reconciles us to God through the blood of His cross, but removes the barriers between the saints, and makes the despised Uncircumcision one with the privileged Circumcision.

THE CONCLUSION

The conclusion of Colossians (4:10-18) consists of greetings whose range corresponds to that of the epistle, as well as Paul's special greetings and directions. The greetings of the group from the Circumcision come first. Christ's head-ship over the earth is a part of the secret of Christ, and was first revealed, hence it is in keeping with this epistle to bring in three who are associated with Him in this phase of the kingdom. The transition from the heralding of His earthly kingdom to the present is an interesting yet intricate subject. Perhaps there are a few indications here which may help us to understand the place of the believing Circumcisionists when the nation becomes calloused (Rom.11:25) and the heart of the people is made stout (Acts 28:27).

At first glance there seems to be no particular reason for bringing in the characters here presented. Yet one cannot help being struck with their diversity. First we have Aristarchus, Mark, and Jesus, who are definitely said to be of the Circumcision. Then there is Epaphras, fully of the nations. Then there is Luke, who supposedly was closely associated with the Circumcision before the secret of Christ's heavenly headship was made known. May not these be representative of the classes to which they belong? What is said of them is worth the closest attention. And what is not said of them, but of the others, is equally striking.

THE CIRCUMCISIONISTS

Aristarchus, Mark, and Jesus are said to be ek peritomês OUT OF-Circumcision. Does this mean that they had come out from the Circumcision, as Paul had, or were still of the Circumcision? The English might easily suggest the former. This can best be settled by studying the same expression elsewhere. The following passages will show that it clearly denotes those who are still of the Circumcision. This is very striking in view of the injunction of the apostle in this very epistle to strip off the old humanity and to put on the young, wherein there is no circumcision (3:9-11). It seems that we must take these Circumcisionists as such.

ek peritomês, OUT OF-Circumcision

Acts	10:45	the believers of the Circumcision . . . with Peter
	11: 2	those of the Circumcision doubted [Peter]
Rom.	4:12	not to those of the Circumcision only
Gal.	2:12	fearing those of the Circumcision
Titus.	1:10	especially those of the Circumcision

The Circumcisionists connected with Peter had certainly not come out of the Circumcision, but were insistent on the rite, not only for themselves, but for the nations also. Their charge against Peter was, "You enter to men having uncircumcision, and you eat together with them!" (Acts 11:3). So that there is a strong presumption that here, in this universal epistle, we have a group of men representative of the kingdom. And, indeed, does not the apostle actually connect them with the kingdom, using the very terms with which the book of Acts describes this ministry (Acts 28:31)?

The more we consider these three Circumcisionists, who are honored with a place in this epistle, the more we are impressed with the fact that they were not taken at random, but specially chosen to represent the Circumcision as a whole, that is, the believers among them, for whom the epistle to the Hebrews was especially written. The mention of Barnabas suggests the gradual introduction and exemplification of the truth through him and Paul and Timothy and Titus and Onesimus, as has already been set forth in the study "From the Levite to the Slave." May not these men be chosen to set forth the opposite, the declension of the Circumcision, and their state, now that the nation is callous?

ARISTARCHUS

Aristarchus, if, indeed, it is the same man, was a Macedonian of Thessalonica (Acts 27:2; 20:4; 19:29). But, as this is mentioned expressly elsewhere, and not brought in here, we should leave it out of consideration. There could easily be several men of the same name. The point to press is his Greek name and its meaning. He must have belonged to the dispersion. His name signifies "best-chief," a title well suited to the Circumcision among the nations, for, in the kingdom, they will rule among them. But, alas, he is in prison! He is a captive! Politically, he has no authority whatever. Is not this a realistic picture of the kingdom at present, politically?

MARK

Mark brings before us quite a different picture. His name is not Greek, but Roman. He is especially related to Barnabas, the Levite. He does not represent the place of the Circumcision over the nations, but as serving the nations. In this they failed utterly. They opposed Peter as well as Paul in every attempt to bring salvation to the aliens. Mark, indeed, was not so bad as that. He left Jerusalem and went with Barnabas and Saul to Antioch, and started with them on their first missionary journey. Yet "John," as Mark is called, left them at Perga, Pamphylia, and returned to Jerusalem (Acts 13:13). Paul and Barnabas had been chosen by the spirit (Acts 13:2), while Mark had been chosen because he was related to Barnabas in the flesh. He is representative of the Circumcision in their failure to serve the nations.

It would appear that he was not very welcome in Colosse, and would not have been received by them without special directions from the apostle. Surely we can understand this sentiment among the ecclesias which had received the truth of the present secret administration through Paul. Mark would have much to give concerning the life of Christ in the past and His glories in the future, but evidently did not go along with Paul, either literally or figuratively, while they had gone on to maturity. There is a strong inclination, in such a case, to break off all fellowship, just as there is a tendency to cut all connection between this administration and the past on the part of those who first begin to grasp its glories. But let us remember that, in the secret of Christ, the terrestrial as well as the celestial is needed, and they have Him as their common Head.

Let us then, in spirit, receive Mark, that is accept his ministry, as, indeed, we may by using his account of our Lord's life, if, indeed, the tradition is correct that he wrote it. But let us note, at the same time, that the Circumcision, who should have been the teachers of the nations, were not welcome in the early ecclesias, and almost lost their place of service.

At the present time, it would probably be quite otherwise. Mark would be received with open arms. Was he not an inspired penman? No need to write ahead lest he be not received. Cloudy conceptions of Circumcision truth, with a dash of heaven to flavor it, is the staple diet of most of Christendom.

In Mark we see the Circumcision serving us. Although they belong to a different administration and have another destiny, we cannot get along without their help. Paul's epistles need all the other writings as a background. Do they not give us the details of God's dealings with the earth and Israel? Without these even the grace which is ours in Christ Jesus could not be fully apprehended. This aspect corresponds closely to the figure of the olive tree, in which the wild boughs are partakers of the root and fatness of the tree. As a light producer, Israel continues to function, through the oracles committed to them, although it comes through the nations who temporarily displace them in the olive tree.

JESUS, TERMED JUSTUS

The third in the group of the Circumcisionists has a purely Jewish name; indeed, it is the name above every name, the personal name of their Messiah. Probably "Jesus" was deemed too sacred to be commonly used, so he was given another, and called Justus. The name Jesus is the Greek form of the Hebrew Joshua, Yahweh the Saviour. This is the name by which Israel will be saved, for Yahweh alone can save them. But, alas! even believers in Israel did not trust wholly in Him, but in the law and their physical rights as members of the chosen nation. And what better name for this than the Latin Justus, from jus, law, right, justice? Therefore salvation was taken from the nation and is heralded to the nations (Acts 28:28). They must learn God's righteousness now, before they experience His salvation.

These only of Paul's fellow workers for the kingdom of God became a solace to Paul. Many others of Paul's fellow workers were far more than a comfort to him, so we must restrict this to the Circumcision and the kingdom. No doubt there were many of the Circumcision who had heralded the kingdom, but nearly all seemed to oppose Paul and his ministry, and were a menace to the ecclesias among the nations, with their insistence on law-keeping and religious rites. How much there may lie behind that word "solace!" The Jews had done much to distort the evangel of Christ, and caused Paul much misery. But these three seem to have been of a different spirit, so that he could cooperate with them in those things which they had in common.

I take this as a little foretaste of the time to come, when the terrestrial and celestial will be in fullest harmony under their mutual Head. For the present, however, I take it that this delightful miniature portrays to us the fortunes of the Circumcision in the present administration. Politically they are captives, not rulers. The kingdom cannot be heralded. In service their testimony is to be received. But they have lost their salvation. And is not this the exact counterpart of what we have at the close of Acts?

There seems to be a general impression that any gospel may be preached at any time. Not so! Even the present evangel of God's grace would work havoc if heralded among the nations in the thousand years. Nor can the evangel of the kingdom be heralded today. First of all it must go to the people of the covenant first, apart from whom there can be no kingdom. And the last words to this people put them into a condition where they can neither hear nor see, lest God be healing them. God has given them a spirit of stupor. For nearly two thousand years they have been this way, and they are even more callous than they were. Herald the kingdom to them, and there would be no response. No one has any commission to herald it until this ban is removed.

Of course the church talks about "the kingdom" and appropriates quite a little of its setting in order to produce the grotesque caricatures which parade as churches in the world today. But few, if any, really herald the political side of the kingdom, and seek to open the eyes of the sons of Israel, so that they may accept its message, and so that the nations also may rejoice with His people. This would be the real kingdom evangel. Repentance and baptism are preached for the remission of sins, but how many consider this a passport into the millennium? Tatters are taken from the gospel of the kingdom and patched on to a self-made story, of many kinds and differing qualities, but nearly all land their devotees in heaven, not on earth. The gospel of the kingdom is not heralded today and no one believes it, hence, no one is won for the kingdom in this era of God's grace.

But this does not cut us off from everything connected with the kingdom. Politically—and in this lies the essence of a kingdom—it is futile and false to herald the kingdom evangel. The Circumcision cannot hear, and there can be no blessing except as they are the channel of it. Now there can be blessing apart from them, yet not in their kingdom. But, in other spheres, we have much in common. The One Who will be Head in the kingdom is already the Head in the empyrean. He Who will save Israel is already our Saviour.

A genuine kingdom evangel to the nations would insist on our subjection to the holy nation. It would promise no blessing except through and with them. So few have such an evangel that we may be sure that the kingdom evangel is as little preached today as the true one for this era. And if the destiny of the saints were dependent on the gospel they hear, almost all of them would need to be divided into several parts to match the fragments of evangels they have patched together. Since even the Ephesians needed Paul's prayer that they might perceive the prospect of their calling, so it is quite possible to have a calling and yet be in ignorance concerning its riches.

The evangel of the kingdom is not the fact that Christ will take over the rule of the earth with Israel as the leading nation, but that this is near. John the Baptist did not repeat what is written in the prophets, but prefixed his heralding with the time of its appearance. As it is in the Greek this has the emphasis: "Near has come the kingdom of the heavens!" (Matt.3:2). Our Lord repeated this with the same stress on the word near (Matt.4:17). The apostles had the same message at the beginning of Acts. "Repent, then, and turn about for the erasure of your sins, so that the seasons of refreshing should be coming . . ." (Acts 3:19). This nearness recedes throughout the book, until, at the end, it is gone. Meanwhile Paul reveals a new secret, that it is not near, but must wait until the complement of the nations may enter (Rom.11:25).

EPAPHRAS

Epaphras is in striking contrast to the Circumcision. He was a Colossian, hence of the Uncircumcision, and is called a slave of Christ Jesus. Though without any physical advantages, how high is his spiritual stature! He is called a faithful dispenser of Christ (1:7). Through him it was that the Colossians had heard the evangel, and now that he cannot serve them by his presence, he agonizes in prayer during his absence. Note the subject matter of his petitions. This shows how fully he was in line with God's thoughts and desires at the time. He wished them to stand mature and fully assured in all the will of God (4:12). It is for this that the gifts are given (Eph.4:11-14). Evangelists, pastors, and teachers should lead the saints from minority to maturity. Paul himself had prayed that they be filled with a realization of God's will (1:9).

Epaphras is a model for those whose hearts have been turned to the service of the saints. He did not say his prayers. How much of our praying is mere talk! Possibly he could not even put his petitions into words. To him it was a struggle, a contending. And he was in misery concerning those on whom his heart was set. Is seems strange, at first, that he should be miserable. But those who have been in a similar position will not fail to understand and sympathize with him, especially in these days of declension and apostasy. It is heartbreaking to hear that those who once reveled in God's grace have been led aside and give place to human merit. It is bitter to hear of pride, dissension, division, where once the peace of God presided. Perhaps Epaphras had no such experiences, yet even in those days it meant much misery to bear a company of saints upon one's heart.

LUKE AND DEMAS

We are so accustomed to the idea that Luke is the writer of the account which bears his name, as well as the Acts, that we are tempted to connect these with him at all times. But it is a fact that the Scriptures themselves do not mention his name in that connection. Hence we will not bring this in here. He was the most constant of all Paul's friends, for he remained when all others had left (2 Tim.4:11). No doubt, as a physician, he was helpful to Paul and others, for he seems to have been beloved as such. This is in contrast to the Circumcision evangel, and shows that it is no longer in force. It includes miraculous healing for the body, so that there was no place for a physician.

Demas is in direct contrast to Luke, for he abandoned Paul out of love for the current eon (2 Tim.4:11). Perhaps his name means popular, as dêmos is populace. May he not represent that vast company of believers who are so concerned not to go contrary to the good opinion of this eon that they cannot remain with Paul's teaching, if, indeed, they have ever known it? All Asia seems to have turned away from him during his imprisonment. Conformity to the times will surely separate from Paul. The whole history of Christendom shows that this became chronic, and only occasionally has there been a return to some of his teaching. And when a little is recovered it is soon abandoned once again. Let us all take this to heart. The danger of abandoning Paul is always present, and is usually popular, and we should guard against it.

LAODICEA

Because of the character of the message sent to the ecclesia in Laodicea (Rev.3:14) in the day of the Lord, the name has become a synonym for apostasy. But this should not be applied to the ecclesia of Paul's day. Nothing is said to indicate a low spiritual condition at that time. It seems to be brought in here in order to show the general character of this epistle. It could be read to them as well as to the Colossians.

Of the Laodicean letter from Paul we have no hint elsewhere in the Scriptures, so that some have supposed that it was lost. But there are good grounds for the opinion that the epistle to the Ephesians is in view, for that, according to the best readings, has no definite address, and must have been put before all the saints in Christ Jesus, either by sending a copy direct, as to Laodicea, or by loaning, as in Colosse. As we have already seen, the epistles are complementary, and both are needed in order to bring the saints to maturity.

ARCHIPPUS

Paul calls Archippus a fellow soldier when writing to Philemon (2). But here he appears in the character of servant. He seems to have undertaken some special service, but was lax in carrying it out. Hence the gentle admonition of the apostle, which many of us may well take to ourselves. Has the Lord laid any special task on our heart? Sometimes it comes with irresistible force. There is an unshakable conviction that a certain work must be done and we must do it. It may be accompanied with a painful and humiliating consciousness of our own unfitness and inadequacy, and a foreboding of suffering and scorn, but it is evidently of the Lord, and such things characterize His service. But they dishearten and discourage. There is a continual temptation to leave the task undone, and escape the consequences. Nothing that we do is as well done as we would wish, so the only relief seems to be to drop it all. Perhaps it was so with Archippus. May the Lord give each one of us grace to fulfill the service which He has assigned to us!

THE SELF-WRITTEN SALUTATION

To this day much of the writing in the orient is done by professional scribes. While waiting in the post office of Smyrna, not so very far from Colosse, I saw a scribe write a letter for a woman, which she dictated. There is no doubt that Paul could write, for he makes a point of doing so at the close of some of his epistles, in order to certify to their genuineness (2 Thess.3:17,18), for it seems that some had produced forgeries. Possibly he penned the whole of Galatians (Gal.6:11). It has been suggested that an eye infirmity made it difficult for him to write small enough. Be that as it may, Colossians has Paul's sign manual to show that it is genuine.

But he does not close with his signature. His heart is too full to refrain from a few more outbursts. And so he unburdens himself by adding "Remember my bonds! Grace be with you!" Great was his desire for sympathy in his sufferings, and that these should be understood in their relation to the truth. Paul's bonds are not merely an incident in his personal career. They became the standing symbol of God's relation to the world and of the place of the flesh in God's present work of grace, in contrast to the kingdom that is to come. Spiritual blessings among the celestials are ours, coupled with no special physical blessings among the terrestrials. And, as we thankfully accept Paul's wish that grace be with us, let us remember that it was with him in a superlative degree even in his imprisonment. Grace now, but glory in the future!

GERTRUDE VENLET

My cousin Gertrude was to me much as I assume his grandmother Lois and mother Eunice were to young Timothy in acquainting him with the sacred scriptures (2 Tim.1:5; 3:15). Yet in accord with this era of the completed word (Col.1:25), the emphasis was always on the epistles of Paul. She, in turn, learned much from good teachers including her father, Howard Hough and husband, D. W. Venlet, and especially from the writings of A. E. Knoch. She passed along much spiritual grace through mailings, most significantly the small periodical entitled, Faith Fellowship. She died January 13, 2020 at age 95, in expectation of the "glorious appearing" of her Saviour "through the gloom," as she often expressed it in song. MUTUAL REPORTS

Colossians 1:3-8–4:7-9

NO PHYSICAL contact united Paul with the Colossians. They had never seen him, nor he them. Nevertheless, there was a deep mutual concern, so that each was informed of the other through intermediaries. Paul learned about the Colossians through Epaphras, who had them on his heart (1:7). The Colossians were informed of Paul's affairs through Tychicus and Onesimus (4:7-9), who were with Paul in Rome. This is in delightful harmony with the truth of this era, in which the physical has no place, yet there should be mutual concern and loving consideration.

Ephesians ascribes blessedness to God for His blessings. Philippians opens with thanksgiving for their contribution to the evangel. Colossians begins with thankfulness to God for their faith and love. In the first the blessedness lies in God alone, and depends only upon His own gracious operations, apart from their effect in the recipients, for, at the time, these wonderful revelations were unknown, so could not have borne fruit. Philippians goes back to their service under a former administration. So also in Colossians. That which they had heard before had produced faith in Christ Jesus and love toward all others who were hallowed by the same belief.

Thanksgiving and prayer go together (Phil.4:6). Especially at this juncture in the apostle's ministry we can understand how great would be his desire that these unknown believers, whose faith had been exemplified by their love to their fellow saints, should share "the expectation which is reserved" for them "in the heavens" (Col.1:5), of which they had indeed heard, yet which was just then being fully revealed. Does not the same spirit of prayer well up within us when we hear of a company of believers? Do we not wish that we could share with them these glorious gratuities of grace? Do not our hearts yearn to bring them these blessings? No words may form on our lips, but, in spirit, we pray as Paul prayed for the Colossians.

Now are remaining, faith, expectation, love (1 Cor.13:13). These three graces greet us at the very threshold of Colossians (1:4,5): faith in Christ Jesus, love for all the saints, a heavenly expectation. Though one of the supreme triad of epistles, there are no wonder-working gifts, no "tongues," no healing for the body. These are left behind in the era of minority. From the very first we are in the atmosphere of maturity. The three abiding graces form the only fit entrance into the present administration. Where they are found there are open hearts ready for the highest and best that God has to bestow.

Their faith was fixed on Christ Jesus, our ascended and glorified Lord, in His celestial exaltation. The importance of this can be realized only in the light of the subsequent revelation of their celestial destiny. The heralding of "Jesus Christ," the rejected and returning Messiah, has glories all its own, but it is not a fit basis for a celestial allotment. Moreover our faith is of a more exalted, a more blessed kind. The Circumcision have a vast amount of tangible evidence to build upon. The powers and signs wrought by Christ and His apostles produced a faith which too often did not stand the test. How do we know that our allotment is in heaven? We have no evidence at all outside the bare Word of God. To such faith alone comes God's highest revelation.

The love of the Colossians was true to its noble nature in that it included all of the saints. It was not called forth by their good qualities or worthiness, but rested solely on a mutual relationship to God. We may well be fond of those of the saints whom we know and whose virtues call forth our appreciation. But it is our privilege to imitate God in that deeper and finer affection which flows out to those also who do not deserve to be loved in themselves, who, indeed, sometimes repel rather than attract. God finds the springs of love in His own heart, so that it flows forth to all His saints, in Christ. If He lavishes His love upon them, why should not we follow His example?

Paul prays for the Colossians because of the expectation which is reserved for them in the heavens. In a similar strain he had prayed in Ephesians for a spirit of wisdom and revelation that they might perceive the expectation of His calling (Eph.1:17,18). Like Ephesians, also, the scene of blessing is not left on earth but is immediately transferred to heaven (Eph.1:3). Philippians puts us in a heavenly realm (Phil.3:20). So these three ranking epistles unite in raising us above the terrestrial to our place supreme among the celestials. They are alone in this, although hints were not lacking in Paul's previous epistles.

As a notable example of the many vital contrasts between Colossians and Ephesians, note the way in which their common expectation is put before us. In Colossians the matter is very simply presented: "the expectation . . . which you hear before" (YE-BEFORE-HEAR, proêkousate). In Ephesians, however, it is not hearing before, but expecting. Were this all, then we would have simply "you expect before" (YE-BEFORE-EXPECT). Instead it is the plural form of HAVING-BEFORE-EXPECTED, not a verb, but a participle, not a fact, but a state.

Years of investigation and experience has confirmed us in our classification of the Greek verb into three grand functions: act, fact, and state (it is writing, it writes, it has been, or is written). The lack of these distinctions in current grammars is unscientific, and leads to confusion, which obscures vital differences in the text. Much clarity is attained and many differences vanish if we note whether a verb speaks of an action under way at a given time or a fact apart from time. So, also, it is a vast advantage to distinguish between these two and a verb which brings before us the state resulting from an action, and the act or mere fact. It is written is not the same as it is writing or it writes. So important do we deem these distinctions that they will be specially indicated throughout in the Keyword edition when the form is not standard. A vertical line will indicate an |act, a horizontal a ¯fact, and a tiny circle the ˚state.

The state resulting from an action, called the complete or perfect, indicated by HAVE in the sublinear of the CONCORDANT VERSION, has been made the subject of special investigations. While the STANDARD with HAVE seems to be the best for the sublinear, idiomatic English seems best served, as a rule, by forms like it is written, rather than it has been written. That is, the verb is or are, with an adjective describing the state is the clearest and most concise idiomatic equivalent for the so-called Greek "perfect." The Authorized Version has often used it most happily in the formula "it is written," and we have adopted this throughout (Matt.2:5). It often helps us in determining the best rendering if we turn it into this idiomatic form.

THE ones-HAVING-BEFORE-EXPECTED of Ephesians (1:12) may be resolved into who are preëxpectant. The early editions of the CONCORDANT VERSION had who are in a state of prior expectancy, which amounts to the same thing. Though somewhat more explicit, it adds too many words which really belong in a grammar rather than in a version. So we are thinking of coining preëxpectant. As the Greek is not a verb, the BEFORE does not tell us when the expecting occurs. Being a verbal adjective, it tells us what kind of expecting it is. The thought in the mind of the writer of Ephesians is most uncommon, hence it has found expression in a word and form very seldom found. The time is present, a state in which those who received the epistle were when they received it. A past action is only implied and is not in point.

This is practically settled for us when we see that this state is in Christ. It refers to the future coming of Christ before He is expected by Israel as inducing a present state. We are now preëxpectant, since we wait for Christ to come before His advent to Israel.

Ephesians is concerned with all the saints who had received Paul's special ministry, and he coins this term in order to describe them, for it most accurately summarizes what he had taught the Thessalonians (1 Thess.4:15) and Corinthians (1 Cor.15). It is to these that he submits his latest revelations.

THE WORD OF TRUTH OF THE EVANGEL

The so-called "genitive" case in Greek is one of the trials of the translator and interpreter, especially when it is doubled, as in "the word of truth of the evangel." As the English possessive covers part of the ground it is often possible to use it, especially when the article is lacking. For example, we may say "the word of God" or "God's Word" without any appreciable difference in sense. In fact it usually amounts to little more than an emphatic adjective, as in the eleventh verse of this chapter, "the might of His glory," which denotes that might which is associated with His glory, so, at the same time, is His glorious might.

Some phrases do not create any serious difficulty in English, as, for instance, "the word of truth," because we have become accustomed to them. Yet it is a question whether many really grasp their significance. What is "the word of truth?" If we change to the possessive, "truth's word" it may be somewhat clearer. If we use an adjective, "the true word" the sense is much more definite, yet it insists that the word is true, while "the word of truth" refers to the word as truth.

Perhaps this can be seen better in the phrase "the truth of the evangel." This means the same as "the evangel's truth." Here we have not that part of the evangel which is true (while other parts may be false), but the evangel as truth. Hence it must be the true evangel. A special case which has received much consideration is the phrase "the administration of the secret" (Eph.3:9). Even if we substitute the possessive, and read "secret's administration" the English still persists in suggesting the action of administer*ing* the secret, while the Greek refers to the administration (not of) but pertaining to or characterized by the secret. We have sought to avoid this by rendering "secret administration," but it may be wiser to translate as usual, and leave the explanation to the interpretation.

It is when there are two genitives that the question arises, how to make them intelligible to the English reader. The connective "of" is far too vague to give any definite idea of the relationship of the words to each other. If we could say "the word dealing with the truth pertaining to the evangel," this might help, yet it would involve much interpretation on the part of the translator. "The true expression of the evangel" seems to be the nearest clear cut idiomatic rendering we can find, yet it may be wiser to follow the Greek idiom and leave the explanation to the interpreters.

In Ephesians we read that the saints of the Uncircumcision, on hearing "the word of truth, the evangel of your salvation" were sealed with the holy spirit (Eph.1:13). Colossians is corrective, so there is a special emphasis on the truth, in contrast to what is false. Not only did they hear "the word of truth of the evangel," but through it they realized the grace of God in truth (1:7). As we will see when we come to the doctrinal portion of the epistle, philosophy and tradition threatened to rob them of the truth. But they had heard the true evangel and received the true grace of God from Epaphras. They had commenced well.

As a dear old brother expressed it many years ago, most of the Lord's saints are born in a fog. They listen to a "gospel," consisting of some truth mixed with much error. The mere fact that God graciously saved them under it, gives this gospel a strong hold on them, and sanctifies its false elements along with the true. From the very beginning they are under a handicap, so that any great degree of truth is unattainable. How thankful should we be if, in our case, God has called us through an evangel which approximates the word of truth! How grateful should all those be who were brought to the knowledge of God where grace was dispensed in truth!

None of us may have listened to an Epaphras, or anyone who could compare with him as a faithful dispenser of Christ. That was a vital and a vigorous evangel! In the entire world it was growing and bearing fruit, not only in Colosse. In Christendom today it has degenerated into a religion or a philosophy, so that its vitality is largely gone, and its grace has vanished. But in those days it came to the nations with a freshness and pristine power which has seldom, if ever, been equaled since. Alas, how few of the most advanced saints have "realized the grace of God in truth!"

As Epaphras is related to Paul in service, he calls him his beloved fellow slave. In reference to the Colossians he is not their slave, but their servant, and so a dispenser of Christ to them. Perhaps his special characteristic lies in the fact that he was not satisfied to merely bring Christ to men for salvation, but he struggled in prayer that they might stand mature and fully assured in all the will of God (4:12). He it is who reports to Paul, and who makes evident to him their love in spirit. Doubtless this epistle is based on his report, and is also an answer to Epaphras' prayers for the Colossians.

TYCHICUS REPORTS TO THE COLOSSIANS

In the complementary part of the epistle (4:7-9), a report goes from Paul to the Colossians, borne by two who are with him. Not much is said of these concerns in this epistle, as they belong in the sphere of service, and so are found in Philippians. However necessary it may have been for Paul to know about the Colossians, it was far more needful that they should know and understand the significance of the events which have befallen him as the prisoner of the Lord. Can we imagine with what tension the ecclesias established by Paul or on his teaching would watch the course of events which threatened to put an end to his career and, perhaps, utterly wipe out his testimony in the earth?

To the human eye the course of the apostle seemed to indicate the end of his career. It would leave the believers among the nations in a position of great perplexity. The contrary was the result. Paul's imprisonment led to the spread of the evangel, both by himself among the guard, and by others who were emboldened by his example. The status of the believers among the nations was fully cleared up by the revelation of the two secrets—that of Christ in Colossians, and of the new administration in Ephesians. The apostle explains much of this himself to the Philippians. He leaves it to others to do this to the Colossians and those who received the Ephesian epistle (Eph.6:21,22).

Tychicus, the fortunate, seems to have been the principal agent of the apostle in this matter. If Ephesians was a circular letter, he may have gone among the ecclesias in order to assure the saints that God was using the apparent evil in order to promote the evangel, and, at the same time was using the occasion in order to divulge His latest and highest revelation, the supernal destiny of the nations, together with the lavish grace which characterizes the new administration which follows on the setting aside of Israel until the complement of the nations has come in.

In Ephesians Tychicus seems to be commissioned for the one purpose of making known Paul's concerns to others (6:21,22), but in Colossians he not only makes known all of Paul's affairs, but also that they may know what concerns them (4:8). The word you (the things which concern you) is found in Vaticanus and in Sinaiticus. Alexandrinus and Sinaiticus corrected read us, but Sinaiticus was changed back again by the latest editor. The tendency, we submit, would be to make Colossians and Ephesians the same, hence us is not as probable as you. In fact, until we take into account the contents of the two epistles the reading we have used seems out of line with the context.

In Ephesians we have a full account of "the things which concern you" (the saints), hence Tychicus had no need to make these known to those who received that epistle. But Colossians does not contain the things that concern them so much as the things that concern Christ. The Colossians, as well as all saints of this secret administration, need to know what concerns them, especially what had been made known just at this juncture. This revelation was soon lost, and is almost unknown today. Hence it seems trite, if not foolish, for Tychicus to inform the Colossians of their own affairs. Only as we realize the great change which had taken place in their status, can we see how vital it was for him to tell them of these things, as well as to explain the career of Paul.

What a consolation it must have been to the Colossians to get the report of Tychicus! From dark forebodings their hearts are filled with joy unutterable and full of glory. Behind the dismal clouds of distressing circumstance God's brightest sun is shining with beams of almost unbearable brilliance. Paul's imprisonment, though the end of earth's physical expectations for a time, is but the beginning of a celestial, spiritual administration which will far excel all that God has previously revealed. And they, they are chosen to fill the highest place in God's purpose of love.

With Tychicus goes Onesimus, a typical specimen of the grace now being disclosed to the nations. Just as he was an unprofitable, runaway slave who was returned to his master by Paul during his imprisonment, so the nations are fleeing far from God, yet are being brought back to Him through Paul's gracious evangel. We would recommend the reading of Paul's letter to Philemon in this connection. How clearly does grace shine in every line! From the lowest in the social scale on earth, Onesimus is graced with the highest honors in the heavens. He shares with Tychicus the privilege of conveying to Colosse, his own home, the report which will bring so much joy and blessing.

Would that the saints today were more concerned about Paul and his imprisonment, with all that is involved! So important does he deem it that he cannot close the epistle until he has written with his own hand, Remember my bonds! Yet let us not only recall his chains but the whole crisis through which he passed, for it was all symptomatic and expressive of the grandest truths and greatest revelations ever made to mortal man. Let us take the report as sent to ourselves, and let us seek to enter into their joy, and return thanks to our God for the grandeur of His grace.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

"THE secret of Christ," which is "the secret of [God's] will" (Eph.1:9), is "to have an administration of the complement of the eras, to head up all in the Christ—both those in the heavens and those on the earth—in Him in Whom our lot was cast also" (Eph.1:10,11a). And, "through [Christ] to reconcile all to Him (making peace through the blood of His cross), through Him, whether those on the earth or those in the heavens" (Col.1:20, cp 1:19).

In its essence, "the secret of the evangel" (Eph.6:19), the conciliation, is that "God . . . conciliates us to Himself through Christ, and is giving us the dispensation of the conciliation, how that God was in Christ, conciliating the world to Himself, not reckoning their offenses to them, and placing in us the word of the conciliation" (2 Cor.5:18,19).

In this current issue, however, we are concerned specifically not with the secret of the evangel but with the secret of Christ.

The first of the articles herein concerns the secret of Christ in "Its Realization." A. E. Knoch writes:"Creation and reconciliation are the scenes of the supremacy of God's Son. The secret of Christ comprises the creation of all in Him at the commencement, and the reconciliation of all through Him at the consummation (p.51) . . . . May God become All in us in increasing measure as we contemplate the secret of Christ, and see His hand and head and heart engaged in drawing His creatures to Himself through sin and salvation" (p.53).

As stated on page 73 of this same article, "In its realization the secret of Christ varies according to the administration in which it operates. In this economy it anticipates in spirit, what will take physical form on the earth in the last two eons. We already have the kingdom and the new creation, for which the world still waits. By a similar figure of speech, we already have the presence of Christ, which will make those future eras so glorious. But all is in spirit, and in expectation.Yet the conciliation may be received and enjoyed by all who believe."

The second article in this issue concerns the secret of Christ in "Its Manifestation." On this theme Brother Knoch writes: "As we have seen, the secret of Christ is best set forth today by the expression 'Christ among you, the expectation of glory—[that concerns you]' (1:27; cp 4:8). Christ did not leave the land of Israel when He came in flesh. He was never among the nations. His presence in Israel was the assurance of future glory for all who received Him, which will be fulfilled in the thousand years, on the earth. His figurative presence now, among the nations, is also the assurance of future glory, for all who believe, among the celestials. At the same time it involves the setting aside of the enmity which existed in the days of His presence, and this is the conciliation. It is God Who is conciliated, yet it is Christ Who acts accordingly, and Who visits the nations, in spirit, just as He had come to Israel in the days of old" (p.89).

"Through many dangers, toils, and snares we have already come." Like Paul himself so many years ago who was once "the young man called Saul" (Acts 7:58) yet who later became "Paul, the aged" (Philemon 9), those of us still participating in the Concordant ministry who once were young must acknowledge that we too are now among the aged. We are grateful to our many friends in faith with whom we have had the privilege of fellowship over the years, now decades. May God empower us all, for "all endurance and patience with joy" (Col.1:11). J.R.C.

THE SECRET OF CHRIST

ITS REALIZATION

COLOSSIANS 1:9-2:7

FIRSTBORN OF CREATION

CREATION and reconciliation are the scenes of the supremacy of God's Son. The secret of Christ comprises the creation of all in Him at the commencement, and the reconciliation of all through Him at the consummation. We will leave the latter for a later meditation. But let us approach the theme as the apostle does, through a prayer that the saints will realize what it involves for them, and that they give thanks for their part in His preëminence.

This prayer of the apostle is far more needed today than ever before. In the midst of billions of sermons, and millions of books and magazines devoted to theology, how little insight is there into the will of God as revealed in His latest revelation! How small is the appreciation of His wisdom, how feeble the understanding of His purpose! And, as a result, the conduct of believers is lacking in fruit and power and there is a want of endurance and joy and thanksgiving for the blessings which are not realized or appreciated. Therefore it is our privilege to emulate the apostle and pray for ourselves and for our fellow saints that the eyes of our hearts may be opened to see, and that it may lead to pleasing and thanking, God.

THE REALIZATION OF HIS WILL

In the first of Ephesians we read of the delight of His will, the secret of His will, and the counsel of His will (Eph.1:5,9,11). It is His delight to make us sons through Christ. Love has given us the highest and nearest place. It is the secret of His will to head up all in the heavens as well as upon earth in Christ. The counsel of His will is that we should be for the laud of His glory. Let us not degrade the apostle's petition to a mere request for individual guidance in each step of our career. If we know His will concerning Christ and ourselves, that will shine upon our path and remove the need of being led like a blind man, every step of our way.

Guidance should not be a matter dependent on external circumstances or inward impulses, but of wisdom and spiritual understanding. The lack of these has left the saints to the mercy of the forces of evil. Many who imagine that the holy spirit has given them a special and definite revelation are the dupes of evil spirits. They do that which is contrary to the will of God because they are not acquainted with it. They imagine that the Scriptures are not sufficient and need to be supplemented by direct revelations of His will as occasion arises, forgetting that, in the Scriptures the man of God is fitted out for every good act (2 Tim.3:17).

Let us pray, then, that the saints may be filled with a realization of His will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, for only thus can we walk worthily of the Lord for all pleasing, and bear fruit in every good work. Here it is not merely a matter of pleasing God or of doing good—we all may do that in some measure even in our ignorance—but of putting quality and flavor into our actions such as will delight God's heart. May our actions never appear to help Him in His infirmity! Let them rather reveal Him and His power. Too much of Christian activity seems to be lending God a hand as if He needed it, and is thus offensive to the Deity. Only a realization of His will can save us from this false attitude toward God and enable us to walk worthily, so as to please Him in all.

THE REALIZATION OF GOD

That God may be All in all is the universal goal. All of His operations during the eons are directed to this end. The latest revelations of His will are especially adapted to display the excellences of the divine wisdom and love, so that all who realize His will will appreciate Him in the measure in which they understand it. As this is unfolded to our hearts we should grow in our appreciation of God, and thus approach the final goal ahead of others of His creatures. May God become All in us in increasing measure as we contemplate the secret of Christ, and see His hand and head and heart engaged in drawing His creatures to Himself through sin and salvation.

ENDUED WITH ALL POWER

Power we associate with great physical manifestations, such as the powers of the coming eon (Heb.6:5), which will bring health, strength, and blessing to the earth and its inhabitants. But we are endued with power for a different purpose. Although it is in accord with the power of His glory, it is not evident in a lightning-like appearance, or irresistible strength. It is not manifest in the conquest and removal of evil, but in endurance and patience with joy. The weakness about us is in accord with God's purpose, so it is not to be removed but endured. Let us do it with joy. Though the time seems protracted, there is power, not only for patience, but for joyful expectation.

THE SAINTS' ALLOTMENT

Along with the joy which His power imparts in the midst of trial and distress, our hearts should overflow with thanksgiving for the lot which has fallen to us. From dupes of darkness we have become saints in light. We were deceived by the Adversary like all the rest, groping in the gloom of this world's illumination. Out of the darkness we came, in it we existed, and into it we expected to go. Death to us was a leap in the dark. But now all is light! All is out of, and through, and to God. We know whence we came, and whither we are bound. We know that every moment of our lives is in His loving care. Light has come into our lives! God does not leave His saints in the dark. Their allotment is in the light. They are sons of the light and sons of the day. They are not of the night nor of the darkness (1 Thess.5:5).

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

God is light. The powers opposed to him are darkness (Eph.6:12). We all were once under the authority of darkness, that great spiritual dominion which holds sway over the whole world. Mankind at large is groping in the dark. Men know not whence they come nor whither they go, nor why they are so busy running around in circles. But it will not be thus always. When this wicked eon ends, and the Adversary who is deceiving the nations is in the abyss, the sun will rise, and darkness, and its forces, will not again hold sway over mankind. For this world darkness is at an end when the kingdom comes. Then the knowledge of God's glory will cover the earth as the waters cover the the sea.

In our individual experience we have already passed out of this dark eon into the next. We have already been rescued out of the authority of darkness and transported into the kingdom. Not, indeed, in fact, but in figure. The earthly kingdom has not yet come. The Adversary is not yet bound. But, thanks be to our Father, we are no longer subject to his will, nor are we victims of his deception. Our allegiance has been transferred to Another Who is our spiritual Suzerain. So that, in the spirit sphere, the kingdom has already come for us, minus all its physical manifestations. We are in a spiritual kingdom whose Sovereign is the same as the Messiah Who will one day reign over the nations of the earth. But in this kingdom He bears another title, to comport with its spiritual character. He is the Son—the Son of God's love.

Every title of our Lord reflects a glory all its own. As Christ, He will be the King, the Priest, and the Prophet of the coming eon. Yet even there, as the Son of David, He will have a special glory, confined to the chosen nation. As Son of Mankind, He will rule over the whole race which sprang from Adam. In all of these capacities He will be over the political powers on the earth. Not so the present spiritual kingdom. It does not conflict with man's rule. Indeed, we are obliged to be subject to the authorities, as well as to pray for them. Therefore His title in the present kingdom is not Christ. Neither is He the Son of any man, as David or Adam, but of God. God is a Spirit, and His Son is such in spirit, not in flesh.

In anticipation of the coming kingdom of God upon the earth, when the race shall be freed from the thralldom of its spiritual despotism, the saints, and they alone, are rescued from the realm of darkness, and transported to a different allegiance, that of God's Son. To complete the picture, our sins are pardoned, and we have deliverance, as will be the case in the new earth. Let us not confuse this with other figures, such as justification, or acquittal. That belongs in the court room, and has to do with our relationship to the judgment, which will take place before the new creation. Now it is a question of entrance into a kingdom, and, as it is a figurative kingdom, we can enter it only by means of a figurative pardon.

Much has been made of the figurative terms in Paul's epistles, such as the covenants and the festivals, in order to show that he was writing only for Jews. Yet there is probably no passage so surely and conclusively "Jewish" as this reference to the kingdom and the pardon of sins, both of which, taken literally, are entirely foreign to Pauline teaching. According to this method of interpretation, this passage should prove clearly that Colossians is a Jewish epistle, not intended for the present administration of God's grace. Yet, as a matter of fact, it, and Ephesians, are utterly devoted to the exposition of the present interval of God's grace. May this example help to show how unwarranted it is to make any of Paul's writings "Jewish" because of his figurative use of "Jewish" things.

Once we realize that much of the blessing which is predicted on the page of prophecy comes to us, in spirit, long before it is fulfilled in fact, such allusions should rather prove the opposite. For example, there is now a new creation. Is it not a marvelous method of transferring to our minds great spiritual realities which otherwise would be most difficult to express? I suppose no one takes this literally, so why take the kingdom, or the covenants so? In figure, we have these things now. In no way could we be led to understand our own blessings better than by illustrating them from Israel's history, by drawing pictures from the pages of prophecy.

So little are the saints familiar with figures of speech that this passage has been the cause of embarrassment to those who saw clearly the vast difference between justification and pardon. No doubt many have been hindered from enjoying the grand grace of justification simply because, in this passage, we are said to have the pardon of sins. Again, the present is so often called "the kingdom," in a vague way confusing it with the future literal reign of Messiah, that one is tempted to avoid further confusion by saying little or nothing about it. But it is a glorious truth, and worthy of our most earnest consideration, that, in spirit, the saints already partake of some of the blessings of the future kingdoms, even though its physical wonders are by no means with us yet.

THE SON OF HIS LOVE

Yes, we are in the kingdom—the kingdom of the Son of His love. Quite a different matter from being a gentile under the iron club of Messiah's rule in the thousand years. Then righteousness will reign, and the nations will be kept at a distance from the God of Israel. They will not even be sons of the kingdom, but subjects, and subordinate. The Sovereign in our kingdom has a title of surpassing dignity and preciousness. "Christ" is official, and fits the functions which He fills during the eons, but not after they have passed away. The "Son" is personal, and describes His dignity in relation to God, even after the eons have come to an end. And the Son of God's love sets Him forth in the supremacy of His nearness and dearness to the Deity, the Peerless One, the Beloved Son. We are in the new creation.

IMAGE OF THE INVISIBLE GOD

God wishes to be known and loved. This is the motive behind creation and reconciliation. Being invisible and unapproachable, He has made an Image of Himself, and a Complement through Whom He can come into contact with His creation. These mediatorial glories belong to His Beloved Son, and make Him preëminent in all things, for they reach from the very beginning to the consummation, and make Him first in both creation and reconciliation.

To be known, God must be seen. He must be brought within the range of creature sensation. As this is impossible with essential Deity, Who is Spirit, it can only be accomplished by means of a Mediator, an Image which portrays in visible form the invisible essence of the Supreme. This was God's "Creative Original," the beginning, or origin, of all creation, for all else was included in Him. This makes Him the "firstborn" of all creation, not only first in time, but first in dignity and honor, and of itself entitles Him, not only to be the Sovereign of the saints in this administration, but to head up all things, both in the heavens and on the earth, as He will, in the complement of the eras, before the close of the eons.

Earthly rulers base their right to rule either on hereditary claims, or on their own accomplishments. Our Sovereign has a double right to reign. His is the oldest title in the universe, long antedating Adam, and He has entered the lists against the powers of evil and won the fight on Golgotha. Both diadem and wreath are His. His ancient rights entitle Him to universal sovereignty, and He will yet subject all beneath His feet. And, when all was lost, He brought it back to God, and thus has earned its heartfelt homage. In this universal reign of the Son of God we have the blessed privilege of being among the first to own His sway, and will be among the highest in His world-embracing sovereignty.

CREATION IN THE SON OF HIS LOVE

The wonders of these words are well worthy of our admiring contemplation. Creation and love! How seldom are they brought together! We often hear of God's love in connection with redemption, but creation is usually associated with His power or His wisdom, but never with His affection. Few passages of Scripture delve as deeply as this into the origin of things, yet it is in thorough harmony with those basic truths that all is out of God (Rom.11:36) and God is love (1 John 4:8). The philosopher seeks in vain for the why of all things. Why is there a creation at all? Here is the answer. God's love demands response. Creation is not an end in itself. Although it displays God's wisdom and power, its underlying purpose goes far deeper, for it was created in love.

Had this simple yet profound truth ever penetrated into the hearts of the teachers of God's people, how revolutionary would have been its effect! True, with their lips they have preached the glad message "God so loved the world," yet they have been even more zealous to confine His love to those who believe, since they could hardly reconcile eternal torment or annihilation with the operations of love. May He broaden our hearts and widen our understanding! All that God does is done in love. Creation as well as redemption and reconciliation have their roots in the divine affection. And for this very reason it is that all are lost and all will be saved, some indeed by faith, during the eons, yet others by sight, through judgment, all through the deliverance wrought by Him in Whom they were originally created.

We may well suppose that creatures of another sphere, who know little of humanity, would not find it easy to understand that all mankind was once in Adam. To us it is so commonplace that we fail to realize the marvel of it. Science has made futile endeavors to prove that man, as well as other creatures, gradually evolves into forms quite different from their progenitors, but without any practical success. They have not succeeded in robbing us of the wonder that in each single seed are almost infinite potentialities. These examples should aid us to understand, or at least to believe where we cannot apprehend, that simple yet sublime statement that all was created in the Son of God's love.

The secret of Christ is not confined to earth, and the scope of this epistle is by no means limited to the ecclesia which is His body. We alone were chosen in Christ before the disruption, yet even before that, all was created in the Son (Col.1:16), not only that on earth, but in the heavens as well. The august grandeur of this thought will overwhelm all those who have given some attention to the celestial spheres, or even gazed upon the starry host. Here are marvels, and magnitudes, and measures which make the mind faint with solemn awe. Creation on earth, with all its many marvels, sinks into insignificance, when compared with the celestial realms. Had it not been hallowed by His presence and His sacrifice, we would think it mean beside the mighty majesty of the heavenly hosts. Yet all the creatures in the heavens were created in Him.

We should not think of creation here as so much material, or dead matter. Life itself and living creatures—those which can refuse or respond to the love of God—are before us in this connection. As they are viewed here as beneath His sway, we read of their various governmental forms, thrones or dominions, sovereignties or authorities. The very fact that, in the heavens as well as on earth, in the invisible as well as the visible creation such rule exists, is proof positive of the presence of sin. Government is a restraint which will not be needed when the eons are past. It will become inoperative at the consummation. Now it speaks of insubjection and the need of reconciliation. The presence of rule in the invisible, celestial realms shows that the creatures which were created in Him will also be reconciled through Him and thus fulfill the object of their creation.

ALL THROUGH AND FOR

Since all ruling powers were once in Him, it is not at all strange that all rule should return to Him in the last eon. This is in line with the further truth that all is through Him and for Him. Creation was not an independent act, without any relation to subsequent developments. On the contrary, it was logically the result of God's purpose, which could not be fulfilled until the far future. Creation is, indeed, the prelude to reconciliation. The Son, in Whom it was effected, had far more in view, and it was only a preparation for the tragedy of the eons, and these, in turn, only the means for effecting the glorious consummation—God All in every one of His creatures.

So, not only was all in Him, but, at the same time it was also through Him and for Him. Without it He could not have accomplished His further work. Due to this relation of all parts of creation to Him it is held together by Him. Whatever differences and distances there may be between the various parts, such as between earth and the heavens, in Him they are welded into one, and, as we shall see, will be united under His headship in the last eon.

Such is the preëminence of the Image of God as the Firstborn of creation. From the beginning all rule is His and all owe Him subjection. The authority of darkness is a usurper, and deserves no subjection at our hands. In being transported into the kingdom of the Son of His love we return to the only rightful Suzerain. His realm will one day spread to every corner of the universe and bring every creature to His feet. All shall be subject to Him. We have the privilege of being among the first to yield to His beneficent sway.

FIRSTBORN FROM THE DEAD

Creation alone cannot reveal the heart of God. It must be supplemented by reconciliation. He Who is the Image of God must become His Complement. The Firstborn of creation must become the Firstborn from among the dead. As such our relation to Him is nearer and dearer. We are not only subjects in a spiritual kingdom, but we also belong to a spiritual body of which He is the Head. God's grace and love must be revealed against the dark background of human hate.

The Head of the body is this Sovereign, in Whom all rule had its origin, and into Whose kingdom we have been transported. Our relation to Him as saints is not based on His power in creation, but on His victory over death. He is the First to emerge a Conqueror from its dark shades, and thus He heads a new creation, a new race of mankind, which is not only given life, but immortality and incorruptibility, beyond the reach of death. This death-defying vitality will be granted to all in Adam in due course, but at present He alone possesses it. This gives Him the exalted dignity of Firstborn from among the dead. Some of this high honor He will share with us at His presence, for then His saints also will be vivified, while the balance of mankind must wait until the consummation.

UNIVERSAL DIGNITIES

The supremacy of God's Son depends on the universality or totality of His many dignities. How extraordinary is the emphasis laid on this vital fact in this short passage! Within the compass of five verses we read no less then eight times that the given glory is all-inclusive. He is the firstborn of every creature. All is created in Him, and all is created through and for Him. He is before all. All has its cohesion in Him. In all He is becoming first. The entire complement dwells in Him. He reconciles all through the blood of His cross (Col.1:15-20). And on two occasions this is amplified and defined as all that is in the heavens or on the earth. It is said to include both visible and invisible. What more could be said to impress us with the universal scope of the Son's activities?

THAT IN ALL HE MAY BE BECOMING FIRST

These precious words, as shown herewith, in large blue letters in a golden frame, are the chief ornament of the room in which I write. Long years ago I chose them as my motto, and decided to display them in a prominent place in my abode. When erecting a new house I evolved a plan so that they would become a permanent part of the building. Above the broad entrance into the drawing room was a board with a beautiful grain. On this I outlined these words in old English lettering and varnished them before the wood was stained, so that they stood out plainly when all was done. But, alas! When the home was sold, almost the first act of the new owner was to remove all traces of my cherished motto!

Here we have a gem of purest ray serene, fit for the diadem of universal majesty! He was first in time and He must become first in all else. How many of mankind have striven for supremacy! Some have drenched the ground with blood in order to attain the highest place for themselves among the rulers of the earth. Many more in other walks of life have sought to reach the top, above their less fortunate fellows. These all exalted themselves, finding a futile and a fleeting eminence. How marvelous the contrast! He Who never sought His own advancement but only God's glory, Who abased Himself beneath all, He will become first in all.

Let us be very jealous for His glory, and allow no one else to filch it from Him. Let us be very zealous for His supremacy, and accord it to no other name but His. And let us guard each glory as we would a treasure trove. And, since His crowning glories as Complement of the Deity and Reconciler of all are so often denied to Him, let us make these the special theme of our meditation, and, if need be, let us maintain them and defend them to the last. In Him, the Firstborn from the dead, through the blood of His cross, God is completely equipped to consummate the purpose of love, and bring every enemy back to His bosom, not only saved, but reconciled.

THE ENTIRE COMPLEMENT

It is quite possible to imagine that God would delegate the honor of creation to one mediator and that of reconciliation to another. God needs both to carry out His purpose, so that each, in his measure, would contribute to the fulfillment of His plans. Then the honor of being God's complement would be shared by them. To put it figuratively, one would receive a place at His right hand, the other at His left. Indeed, some have taught that God's complement consisted of a whole series of beings, independent of His Son, to whom He delegated creation. Not so! The entire complement, all that is needed by God in order to fulfill His will in connection with His creatures, finds its fit residence in His Son.

In Him the complement delights to dwell. It is not alone that He has the ability, the fitness, the competence to cope with all that is involved in this most marvelous function in the universe. All this He has, and far more. At His baptism, when the heavens were opened to Him, the voice declared, "This is My Son, the Beloved, in Whom I delight" (Matt.3:17; Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22). So again, when He was transformed on the high mountain, a voice came out of the cloud and testified to the delight of the Father in His Beloved (Matt.17:5; Mark 9:7). Peter reminds us of this in his epistle, and tells us that it brought Him honor and glory from God the Father (2 Peter 1:17). Long before, Isaiah records the same fact (Matt.12:18; Isa.42:1): "My Beloved, in Whom My soul delights."

Is it not striking that this recognition of the Son is one of the very few statements directly spoken by the Deity in the later Scriptures? This should give it the prominence which is its due in our hearts. What a contrast to His testimony concerning the rest of mankind! When the Lord stooped down to see how they are, He found nothing in which to delight. Not one was even just or kind (Rom.3: 10-18; LXX Psa.14:2,3). Certainly there has never been one among Adam's descendants, apart from His grace, in whom He could find pleasure. In none of them could the complement find any place whatever.

The complement (plêrōma) is here personified (Col. 1:19). It is represented as seeking a suitable dwelling place from which to carry out the purposes of God. In Him it has found a delightful abode, for He is not merely a means of bringing back creation to what it was, but of bringing it on to fulfill its purpose. All too many of us imagine that we would be satisfied with a universe brought back to its pristine perfection, a world without sin, a sorrow-free existence. No such result would satisfy the heart of God. That would never justify the travail of the eons. That would never win the admiring approval of the universe. That would be vanity, a feeding on wind, a reaping of less than was sown, a losing venture.

And such would creation be, had it not been begun in the Son of His love, and should it not be finished by the same One through the blood of His cross. Love cannot be revealed without a background. Every blessing imaginable poured into the lap of a sinless creature is merely a matter of course, which evokes no thankful feelings, and provokes no response of love. I feel certain that Adam never thought of thanking his Maker for his superb health and strength. Yet I am profoundly grateful for the very little vigor needed to pen these lines. And when we, who have suffered much from illness and weakness, once attain our body of glory, how deep and lasting will be our thankful love to Him for all His superabundant grace!

In this passage nothing is said directly of the entrance and course of evil and sin, because this is no part of the work of the Son. But the introduction of estrangement is clearly implied by His death and His cross and the necessity of the reconciliation of all. It is no glory or honor to destroy God's work. This must, indeed, be done, but woe to him who does it! His course must be down and not up. The glory of the Son lies in this, that He undoes the work of the Adversary. Great as were His glories in creation, now that all have been estranged by sin He gains far greater glory by His suffering for all, so that all will be saved and reconciled, and so attain the original object of their creation.

God pity us if we see our salvation from our own side only! The object of all is God, rather than His creatures. And the glory of God demands the exaltation of His Son. These are the chief considerations in the reconciliation of all. If a single one of those whom He created in love should fail to find the final goal which His love has set, then it is His wisdom and power which are brought into question, and His love which is open to doubt. Likewise, if one who was created in the Son of God's love should fail to be reconciled by the blood of His cross, would that not drag the Son down from the high place which God has given Him? Let us not darken the splendor of His achievement by our own dismal unbelief.

WHAT ARE "THINGS"?

The neuter gender, in English, is used only for things as a rule, not for persons. In Greek, however, the so-called "neuter" seems to be much wider in its scope, and to include, rather than to exclude, the genders, so it is called "indefinite" in the Concordant grammar. In this passage (Col.1: 16-20) it is of considerable importance to be clear on this point. The Revised Version introduces the word "things" ten times, not because it is in the Greek, but to show that the gender is neuter. They speak of all things created, things visible and things invisible, things created, before all things, all things consist, in all things . . . preëminence, reconcile all things, things on earth, things in the heavens.

I feel sure that anyone who reads the passage with this in view, and especially if the word things is emphasized, will feel that something is amiss. The more the passage is studied the more it seems evident that not things, but persons are intended. These "things" are in the heavens and on the earth, hence they cannot refer to the material creation as a whole. They are detailed as thrones or dominions or sovereignties or authorities, which, indeed, are forms of government, and so "things," but very evidently stand for those who are subject to them. And how can things be reconciled? Were the Colossians (1:21) among these things? The introduction of this word, it seems to us, though warranted by the grammars, has thrown a veil over the whole passage and made it unintelligible to some extent.

One cannot help but admire the consistency of the Revisers in this particular, when, in Galatians 3:22, they translate: "Howbeit the scripture hath shut up all things under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe." In John 6:37 they yielded to the context. Instead of following their usual rule and translating, "Every*thing* (pan) . . ." they compromise with, "All that which the Father giveth me shall come unto me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." These two passages should suffice to show that things is an unfortunate rendering of this Greek form in some cases, and that it may be used of both genders, or without reference to any gender.

PEACE THROUGH THE CROSS

Enmity has come in through the entrance of death and sin. All of mankind, without exception, are estranged from God. It is more than likely that this discord has affected the whole creation, in varying degrees. To make peace between God and His unfriendly creatures is the greatest of all achievements. In this world of strife and contention the role of peacemaker is a difficult and discouraging one. For the most trivial causes enmity arises between man and man, section and section, country and country. Not long since a large part of the world was involved in a bloody war, and no stable peace has resulted from all of the strenuous endeavors to put an end to war. We talk of peace, yet there is unrest and misunderstanding almost everywhere, and the din of arms has never fully ceased.

By pride comes contention. Notwithstanding the shameful record of mankind since the dawn of history, men are proud of what they are and what they have accomplished and what they possess. Evil has been given them to humble them, they fail often and suffer much, the world is getting worse in almost every way, except material comfort, man's inhumanity to man cries to high heaven for redress, and man's offensive attitude to the Deity is unpardonable, and yet man is haughty and stubborn and implacable. He refuses the overtures of peace which come to him in the evangel and is hastening on to the era of God's indignation, when his doings will be destroyed, his power broken, and his pride leveled with the dust.

But even after a thousand years of peace his heart remains the same. Satan, loosed out of his jail, will find the same enmity, the same readiness to rise against God and His people as before. The experience of good does not bring permanent peace. It is through evil that peace must come. Though Christ Himself, the Prince of Peace, has ruled man for a millennium, that has not tuned his heart in unison with God. He does not make peace by His power or by His glorious government. Peace comes to the nations in this way in the eons of the eons, but heart peace with God comes only through His sufferings and shameful, ignominious death.

The cross, the inglorious, the disgraceful, the infamous, the opprobrious, the outrageous stake, the most disreputable death that man can devise, where weakness and shame combine to dishonor the High and Holy Son of God—here is where peace was made for all who are estranged, where the world was conciliated to God. With this as a basis, the Son will reconcile all God's enemies with Him when the eons have run their course. In the cross we see the utter worthlessness of man as well as the supreme exhibition of the love of God. Reconciliation is effected by the revelation of God's love in the deepest display of human hate.

The cross, like a lightning flash, reveals the heart of man. He Who hung upon it was the Touchstone by which all things may be tested. When He appeared among His people humanity manifested itself as it really is. He should have been welcomed and honored and adored. By the condemnation of the only One Who deserved to live, mankind has condemned itself, and sealed its own death warrant. By the shameful crucifixion of the Lord of glory men made it manifest that they, not He, deserve the death detestable. O that we all may learn what we really are in the light of the cross! This will burn out all our pride and prepare the way for peace. And thus it is that reconciliation comes. The cross will abase all into the dust, and humble their hearts before the Deity, and prepare them for the revelation of His love.

But if the cross only revealed what is in man it could not reconcile the race but would rather destroy it. Thanks be to God that it also reveals what is in God! It is the fullest revelation of His love. In it He seemed to side with man. Instead of rescuing His Beloved from their hate, He sends fire from above into His bones. He makes Him to be sin, Who knew no sin. He forsakes Him instead of the ones who deserved His displeasure.

The divine alchemy which transformed the Victim of human hate into the Sacrifice for their sins is almost too wonderful for human apprehension.

THE BLOOD OF THE CROSS

The cross was the supreme crisis in universal history, an event unique, unparalleled in the annals of time. Nothing has ever occurred which has such a profound effect upon the world. It will transform an alienated universe into adoring worshipers. It is a permanent, an abiding power which will never lose its potency. Today the cross avails to conciliate the world, and to reconcile those who receive the conciliation. But this will by no means exhaust its power. It will be the basis of all blessing in the eons to come, and will bring immortality and peace to all at the consummation. Death cannot stop its course, for Christ arose, the Firstborn, and all for whom He died (and He died for all!) will share His life when death is finally abolished.

The blood of Christ is a most expressive figure of the permanent power of His sufferings. The soul, sensation, feeling (not the life) of the flesh is in the blood. In the days of old this was sprinkled in the holy of holies once a year on the day of propitiation, and for a twelve-month preserved the potency of the sacrifice. So it is with the suffering of Christ. Thank God it is past, but its potency is permanent. It avails today, and will never lose its power. The blood remains, as it were, within the holiest in heaven, to witness to His offering.

But the blood of His cross—this goes far deeper still. Only here do we have this notable expression. It is not a mere literary variant, but a deliberate endeavor to distinguish between the death of God's Son and the manner of it. This is done because here we have not merely the salvation or the justification of all, but the reconciliation of the universe. It is not a question of sin so much as of offense and enmity. In fact this passage is concerned with salvation only insofar as it is included in reconciliation. Peace is made by the blood of His cross. The blood is a reminder of its permanence.

This blood does not merely remind us of His death and suffering, but of the shame and enmity of man, and the darkness and distance from God endured by Him because of the crucifixion. Stoning would have brought death, but would have avoided much of the suffering and the curse of the Deity which rested upon the One Who was hanged upon a tree. The marvelous truth that all will be reconciled to God is based, not only on the suffering and death of Christ, but especially on the abject abasement involved in the manner of His death, coupled with the curse which it drew down from above.

The cry of the august Sufferer, "My God, My God, why didst Thou forsake Me?" finds its answer in the cross. With any other form of death God would not have forsaken Him. He would rather have turned against His murderers. It would have increased the distance and estrangement between God and His creatures. It would have made enmity, not peace. But because He voluntarily placed Himself beneath the curse of God for the sake of His enemies, the result was reconciliation.

But let us note that the cross is brought in here parenthetically. It is the basis of reconciliation, indeed, but by no means includes all that He will do in order to bring back the universe to God. On this basis He will carry on all of His future work of ruling and judging, of rousing and vivifying the dead. All of His coming acts will have this grand goal in view, and we will have our share in His work of reconciling God's creatures among the celestials, for we are His complement. As living exemplifications of the power of the cross, we will have our part in the final and effectual peace propaganda. For this reason we read here of the blood of the cross, for its abiding power will be the means at our disposal in bringing about perpetual peace.

One of the most helpful contrasts between Ephesians and Colossians is on the subject of peace. In Colossians, as we have seen, it is universal in its scope, including not only earth's sinners, but His enemies in the heavens as well. But in Ephesians it is limited to believers, and has to do with the enmity between the Circumcision and the Uncircumcision (Eph.2:11-18). This estrangement inhered in their flesh, and in the physical relation of Christ to the Circumcision. It found expression in the central wall in the sanctuary, which kept the Uncircumcision at a distance from God's dwelling place, and in the decrees issued by the apostles from Jerusalem. That fruit of peace was a new humanity, so that both the Circumcision and the Uncircumcision have access, in one spirit, to the Father. Though based upon the cross, there is nothing there for those outside the household of faith.

The peace of Ephesians, in accord with the secret of the epistle, will continue during this administration of grace, but will retire in the following economies, when Israel once more comes to the front on the basis of physical preëminence. But the peace in Colossians, in accord with the secret of Christ, will not only continue throughout the eons, but will embrace all at the consummation. In Ephesians it is limited in both time and scope. It applies only to the Circumcision and Uncircumcision in this present era. But in Colossians it is extended to include those in the heavens as well as those on the earth. All are embraced by it, so that no enmity remains in God's universe.

To even list all of the passages which have been brought forward to blot out the great truth of the reconciliation of all would lead us too far afield at this time. They have been fully considered and discussed in separate essays. Correct concordant renderings automatically dispose of them, and, at the same time, confirm the great truth that God will become All in all at the consummation (1 Cor.15:28).

May God graciously give us faith to believe it! May our love for His Beloved constrain us to receive it! May mistaken translations of other passages not bar our way into this holy of holies, beyond the veil of His eonian dealings with His creatures! May not the false philosophical terms "everlasting" and "eternal," or "eternity," blind our eyes to the eons, the scene of the Son's glories, their commencement in love, and their consummation in reconciliation! Here we stand on the summit of divine revelation. Here we can see all else below us, and see its place in God's purpose. May we not take some lower stand and deny this glorious consummation because it is hid from our gaze by the fogs of lower levels!

CHRIST AMONG THE NATIONS

In its realization the secret of Christ varies according to the administration in which it operates. In this economy it anticipates in spirit, what will take physical form on the earth in the last two eons. We already have the kingdom and the new creation, for which the world still waits. By a similar figure of speech, we already have the presence of Christ, which will make those future eras so glorious. But all is in spirit, and in expectation. Yet the conciliation may be received and enjoyed by all who believe.

Having given the broad outlines of the secret of Christ in its timeless, universal aspect, we now have a paragraph devoted to this secret as it especially applies to us in this present administration. The Colossians had not only been lost, and were now saved; they had not only been sinners, and were now justified; but they had been estranged and enemies, and were now reconciled. Here we can see the close relation of the secret of the evangel to that of Christ. Both go deeper than sin and deal with offense. They go beneath the outward act to the inward motive. They deal not merely with failure, but with enmity.

ENEMIES IN COMPREHENSION

Even one whose outward behavior and treatment of his fellows is beyond reproach may be a bitter enemy of God in his heart. Indeed, it is quite possible to be charitable and philanthropic with a mind that defies and decries the Deity. The attitude of the heart is far more vital than external conduct in our relationship to God, especially with reference to ultimate reconciliation. That is why the Colossians are first characterized as estranged and enemies in their comprehension. Thinking precedes and prepares for conduct, and our thoughts concerning God must be corrected before our walk can be brought into harmony with Him.

Wicked acts arise from this spiritual friction with the Deity just as sinful deeds do from the lack of vital connection with Him. Men may not be conscious that the enmity in their comprehension is against God, for they have no personal acquaintance with Him. Rather it expresses itself in their dissatisfaction with their fate, or with the providence of God. For their good they are not thankful, and for their evil they blame Him, Who, they feel, might have hindered it. Is it not striking that an "act of God" in legal parlance, is a calamity for which He alone can be made responsible? His daily goodness, His continual kindness, are matters of course. Man, out of tune with His Creator, does not only fail or fall short, his mind becomes actively opposed to Him, and his acts wicked.

I have not the impression that the Colossians were especially wicked in the usual sense of that word, as, for instance, the Corinthians, but that their state was rather that of the average one who is reconciled to God. The consummation will not only consist in all of God's creatures being at peace with each other. That is only one result of their reconciliation to God. Sin, offense, and wickedness should not be judged and measured by the relations between man and man, but between man and God. It will be found in the judging that many who entirely escaped the condemnation of a human judge because they never seriously infringed upon the laws of society will be found among the most wicked in God's sight because they were at enmity with Him.

Justification is by blood, yet reconciliation is through death (Rom.5:9,10). The first has to do with acts, and calls for suffering. The second has to do with a condition and demands the death state. We deserve both. To put it popularly (but imperfectly) mankind deserves both torment and annihilation, and Christ endured them on our behalf. Sinners will suffer affliction and distress in the judgment for what they do, and enemies enter the second death for what they are. The judging is concerned only with their acts, hence is followed by the second death, which deals with the deeper aspect. Their vivification at the consummation, being the nullification of death, deals with what they are, and so reconciles them to God.

HOLY AND FLAWLESS AND UNIMPEACHABLE

When we, like the Colossians, are reconciled to God, it reverses our relationship to Him, to man, and to our acts. We were unholy, not fit to come near God's dwelling place, shut out from His presence and blessing. Now we are holy, fit to approach into the very light of the shekinah, loaded with spiritual blessings. We were full of flaws, sinful, lacking in everything, weak, worthless and withering away. Now we are flawless in Him, without defect or imperfection, waiting for the glory. Once we dreaded the very thought of a judgment, but now we are unimpeachable, beyond the imputation of aught to which objection could be made. All of this is implied and included in our reconciliation. All of this is necessary to perfect peace.

GROUNDED AND SETTLED

But few of those who believe ever become grounded and settled in the vital verities of our faith. How seldom do we see a saint get beyond the forgiveness of sins to actual justification, as set forth in the early chapters of Romans! Yet far rarer are those who enjoy the peace of the fifth chapter, and accept the conciliation offered to God's enemies! Many of the saints still lack the peace which is theirs, and fail to fully enter into the conciliation. Such will find it difficult to go on into the great secrets of the later epistles. Paul takes it for granted that the Colossians are grounded and settled in the evangel they have heard.

THE EXPECTATION OF THE EVANGEL

The complete restoration of peace to which the evangel gives rise is not confined to the breasts of believers. It embraces all, the creatures above as well as below mankind. When man became the enemy of God he dragged down the lower creation with him. It has become subject to vanity in expectation of being freed from the slavery of corruption when the sons of God are unveiled (Rom.8: 19-22). The creation on earth will have its part in the glorious future! What a relief from the narrow outlook of a "personal" salvation, with a few favored companions, while all the rest of creation is left to its fate, is this grand and glorious reconciliation which embraces all that is now out of harmony with God!

But this is a future expectation. We are far from its realization yet. The task for the present is to make it known, to herald it abroad. It is to this that Paul applied himself. It is quite possible that he and others completed the heralding to the creation according to the closing words of Mark's account. It will be our special privilege to herald this evangel to the hosts of heaven when we are glorified.

But now our special task is to dispense it on earth, among men, especially among the saints. Our future ministry will be carried out in power and glory. Our present work is often associated with infirmity and suffering. That will be crowned with ultimate success. Now we may count on comparative failure. So it was with our Lord and so will it be with us. This is not our day. That is still to come.

THE DEFICIENCIES OF HIS AFFLICTIONS

When Christ was on earth He suffered much from the very ones who should have been His most loyal supporters in establishing the kingdom. Not only the chief priests and the scribes, the Pharisees and the Sadducees, but even His own disciples and apostles were the cause of much real distress. And this was particularly true in regard to those revelations which go beyond the confines of their narrow hearts. After He had ascended Peter also had difficulties with his Jewish colleagues, who sought to monopolize God's favor and shut out the despised gentiles. But Paul had far more to bear in this direction than Peter, for he widened the area of blessing to reach all mankind.

Now that the evangel of the reconciliation of all is being heralded, it is accompanied by the same sufferings and further afflictions. The time is coming when we will herald this blessed evangel among the celestials, but then there will be no suffering. Its dispensing among men, in Christendom, especially among zealous adherents of narrow-hearted orthodoxy, has been and always will be followed by persecution and affliction. And it is most fitting that it should be so, for this will be a vast advantage in its future heralding, as it contrasts God's heart with that of His creatures, even when they have tasted of His grace. Let us, like Paul, rejoice in any sufferings we may be privileged to enjoy in dispensing this grace.

Strange as the thought may be to some of us, there can be little doubt that, if Christ were now among us, as He was among His own in Israel, He would suffer at the hands of His own saints. These the apostle calls the deficiencies of His afflictions, which He would bear for the sake of His body, the ecclesia, were He actually in their midst. These fell to the lot of Paul, and fall upon all who occupy a similar position. Let us not think of Paul's imprisonment as his only suffering at this time. There were those who sought to rouse affliction for his bonds (Phil.1:17). He had a great struggle for the sake of the Colossians themselves (2:1). It must have pained him much to hear of the ritual and philosophy which was threatening to despoil them of the truth of their completeness in Him (2:8-10).

TO COMPLETE THE WORD OF GOD

The secret of Christ is the capstone of divine revelation. Until it was made known the Word was fragmentary. It was confined mostly to one nation or to one race upon the earth. The rest of the universe seemed to be outside the range of Christ's sacrifice and activities. It is only when He receives His place as the Head of all and the Reconciler of all, and especially as the Head of the body, through which the celestial realms will be administered and reconciled, that the plan and purpose of God is seen in its completeness. The record in the Scriptures concerning man and the earth, as administered through the holy nation, though it occupies the bulk of God's Book, deals with only a small segment of creation. But Paul embraces all within the scope of his unfoldings. Hence he rounds out or completes the Word of God.

CHRIST IN OR AMONG

The blessed truths that we are in Christ, and that Christ is in us were freely made known by the apostle Paul in his early epistles, especially in the eighth chapter of Romans, which deals with those who are in Christ Jesus (Rom.8:1) and who have Christ in them (10). In Paul's vigorous and vital expostulation against the Judaizers he emphasizes the presence of the living Christ within him. He cries, "With Christ have I been crucified, yet I am living—no longer I, but living in me is Christ" (Gal.2:20). It is the vital power of the indwelling Christ that enables us to walk worthily. But this is never presented as a secret. This cannot be the truth brought before us in Colossians.

The connective en in Greek denotes in with the singular, but may also stand for among with the plural. It has been so rendered over a hundred times in the Authorized Version. In this passage it is of the highest importance that we decide whether the secret is "Christ in you" (individually) or "Christ among you" (the nations). Seeing that "Christ in you" was well known before, and deals with the individual believer's experience rather than the secret of Christ, it is not likely that it is brought up here as a secret. Christ among the nations, however, is a new thought, a secret hitherto, and fully in line with the figure of the kingdom in the preceding context, and a vital part of the secret of Christ, which is the subject of this part of the epistle.

CHRIST AMONG THE NATIONS

Christ in flesh, when on earth, confined Himself to one nation, Israel. His presence brought with it the glorious prospect of the kingdom as promised in the prophets. Those who received Him and acknowledged Him as their Messiah were filled with high hopes. Some of them wished to secure for themselves the best places in the coming glory. The question in their hearts was, When? "Art Thou at this time restoring the kingdom to Israel?" (Acts 1:6). From His very infancy the saints, like Simeon, looked upon Him, not only as the Salvation of the nation, but as "the Glory of Thy people Israel" (Luke 2:30-32). He was, indeed, Christ among them, the expectation of glory.

In considering this secret we must keep in mind the scope of Christ's kingdom as set forth in the earlier part of this chapter. It is universal, and embraces all thrones and dominions and sovereignties and authorities, invisible as well as visible, celestial as well as terrestrial (16). This is the secret "as it was now revealed" (Eph.3:5). To administer the kingdom on earth Messiah will use the nation to which He is united by physical ties. The hundred forty-four thousand will rule among the peoples. The apostles will adjudicate the tribes. But in the heavens Christ will use His spiritual relatives, the saints who are joined to Him among the nations. They have the glorious expectation of having an even more exalted position in His celestial realms.

Before His ascension He never went among the other nations. In a very real sense, His presence in Israel demanded the degradation of Rome from her place as the leading nation on the earth. Even if He had gone among the various nations of that day, it could not have been a token of their glory in the future, but of their subjugation to the favored people. They can only be subordinate in the coming kingdom, on the earth. In flesh, Christ is of the seed of David, and the nations have no part in Him. It is only in spirit, in His celestial domains, that there is any prospect for the saints in the nations. They cannot have a seat at His right or His left in Jerusalem, but far higher honors are open to them in the empyrean.

"Christ among you, a glorious expectation" is that aspect of the secret of Christ which is the counterpart of the secret in Ephesians. It is the secret of Christ as far as it applies to the present administration and to the nations. It gives believers among the nations the same relation to the celestial kingdom as believers in Israel had to the earthly rule. It gives them an expectation comparable to the kingdom, the longed-for millennium, for which every faithful heart in Israel yearned, yet with a grace and glory as far above it as heaven is high above the earth, and with a kingdom so much greater and grander that our earthborn faculties and expressions fail to function in view of their appalling immensity and majesty.

PRESENT EVERY MAN MATURE

Is not Christ, as proclaimed among the more faithful in Christendom, far smaller than He is here revealed? With commendable zeal He is set forth as their personal Saviour, and the end of all things seems to have been reached in delivering them from the effects of their sins. We can only be thankful for this much, for even this is lacking in the formal churches of Christendom. But such selfish happiness is not permanently satisfying, especially when associated with the realization that millions, if not most of God's creatures, are suffering, or as orthodoxy insists, always will suffer. There is something repulsive about happiness which is not affected by the woes around it, which is callous to the agonies of others.

Many have wondered how the saints could be happy in glory when a glance over the parapets of heaven would reveal the tormented in hell. But this sound instinct has been stifled by an appeal to credulity. We are assured that the Scriptures so teach and God will make our hearts impervious to the pains of others. How horrible is this thought! What a spurious heaven is that which consists of self-gratification and a lack of all feeling for the fate of fellow mortals! To be delivered from such false notions of God's salvation is itself a cause for much thankfulness. Our choice by God is not an end in itself. We were selected, not to be blessed so much as to be blessers. And in making others happy is the only true and abiding happiness.

How blessed is the place of Abraham and his seed!

For in them shall all the families of the earth be blessed. And such is the secret of our future bliss. As members of Christ's body we will bring blessing to all the creatures of the empyrean. Through us He will rule the celestial hosts, and through us they will be brought into living contact with the grace and love of God. Our happiness will not be enjoyed in spite of contact with the hopeless horrors of a medieval hell, but because we will be the channel of blessing to the countless creatures who come within the scope of Christ's celestial rule. Therein is true and abiding happiness, in bringing to the creatures of God's hand the precious gifts of His heart.

So long as we are cramped and confined by a selfish longing for mere physical well-being in the future—and most of us would be unutterably thankful for that—our hearts will be closed to the sublimity of the glory which awaits us. It is not a question of restoring a single soul to happiness, or even of saving a multitude of sinners from their fate, but of reconciling a whole universe to God, of bringing bliss not only to innumerable creatures throughout the infinitudes of stellar space, but of satisfying the heart of God by means of a universal response to His love, so that He may take His true place in every heart He has created.

Christ among the nations as the pledge of our future glory, leading to the exaltation of Christ as the Head of all in the heavens as well as on the earth, and to the ultimate reconciliation of all at the consummation because the entire complement delights to dwell in Him—such is the supreme revelation brought by Paul, which leads us out of the partial and immature conceptions of His plans into a mature and complete grasp of His full purpose. In Ephesians maturity consists in finding our all in Christ, but, in Colossians it demands that we see in Christ all that God needs to carry out His eonian purpose.

Here is perhaps the highest sphere of service today—admonishing and teaching every man in all wisdom, that we should present every man mature in Christ Jesus (1:28). This Paul does in the body of the epistle as we shall see. Even in his day it was not an easy task, for he speaks of it as toiling and struggling, as though progress were not only laborious but against heavy opposition. If this was so in his day, how much more now! Maturity has been branded as a crime by Christendom, and even zealous defenders of the Bible toil and struggle against the truths for which Paul once contended.

Few, indeed, are there among the saints who do not need to be admonished because of teaching or practice which conflicts with maturity. And all of us need to be taught the great truths concerning Christ which are unfolded in this epistle. Because these are unknown or denied, maturity has practically vanished. Is it not worth severe toil and a tremendous struggle to recover these treasures of wisdom and knowledge and to set them before the saints? O that God, in these last days, would raise up men like Paul, mature themselves, and powerfully impressed with their privilege of proclaiming the secret of Christ, the complement of God!

True riches, untold wealth, lie in the assurance which comes from an understanding which leads to a realization of this secret, which His God and Father has revealed concerning Christ, in Whom all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are concealed (2:2,3). It consoles the heart as well as satisfies the head. It is the end of all philosophy, and the apex of all love. The whence, the why and the whither of all things is unfolded to us in this all-embracing "mystery."

But the saints have been beguiled and despoiled of this vast spiritual treasure by the persuasive words of men. The rites of religion and the reasonings of philosophy have effectually robbed them of this wonderful wealth. Though the words still stare at us in the Bible, faith fails to see them, because it is blinded by false flares of human tradition. There is need, not only of a positive setting forth of the truth, as has already been done, but of a negative admonition, such as follows. This was called for in Paul's day, and was more needed and less heeded as the apostasy from Paul proceeded.

The same Christ Who met us at the beginning of our new life should accompany us all the way. He is all we needed for salvation, and He is more than sufficient for our walk. We should be rooted in Him alone, and not seek sustenance or support in aught else. We should be built up in Him only, and not seek edification in any other "means of grace." And may it be the lot of every reader of these lines to find a firm foundation for his faith in the secret now at length revealed, while his heart overflows with thankfulness for all that Christ is to him, and to the saints, to the whole creation, and to God.

How restful it is to look upon a task all finished! And such a task! And so well done! How we should charge our hearts to enter and enjoy this solid satisfying portion.

Whatever joys and glories the future may have in store, even though our bodies be changed at His coming, nothing can add to our completeness in the Anointed. No ordinances upon the flesh, no prayer, no worship, no service, nothing can make us more acceptable; nothing can remove defilement or any other barrier to approach, for now we are perfectly equipped for His presence. The spirit of our God has cleansed us to His perfect satisfaction. Nothing can bring us nearer, nothing can make us dearer.

THE SECRET OF CHRIST

ITS MANIFESTATION

COLOSSIANS 4:2–6

TWO CLOSELY RELATED SECRETS filled the heart of the apostle in his imprisonment, besides the secret concerning this administration. The secret of the evangel (Eph. 6:19) and the secret of Christ (Col.4:3) were both pressing for utterance, so he especially urges the saints to pray for him that he may be able to make them known. He is not merely bound with metal chains. He is also "bound" to act by spiritual forces. As the literal Greek has it, he speaks, "as it is binding" for him to speak.

O that there were men today who knew these secrets, and not only could but would reveal them to the saints! O that all saints would unite in these prayers, no longer for the apostle Paul, but for pastors and teachers and evangelists everywhere! Is it not all too true that these secrets have been lost? Where are they made known? And do we not see the wisdom of God in this, that Paul, in urging the saints to pray for him, has left a permanent exhortation, a prayer which we all should pray, and which should awaken in our hearts a desire to enjoy these precious secrets ourselves and to make them known to others? What other truths in God's Word are so burdened with prayer for their utterance? Does this not intimate that these truths are as desirable as rare?

The bulk of Paul's epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians is largely composed of his prayers for the saints, that they may realize the grace and truth which he reveals to them. But at the close of each epistle we have these two gems, each perfect in its own setting, in which the saints are exhorted to pray for him that he may be able to make this message known. It is a delight to study these brief requests and especially to compare them with each other. Their messages are very similar. The chief difference lies in the secret to be expressed or manifested. In Ephesians it is the secret of the evangel, which is barely mentioned in the body of the epistle. In Colossians, however, it is the message of the epistle itself which is pressing for expression.

PERSEVERING IN PRAYER

It is the precious privilege of all who are His to be concerned with everything which pertains to God and His purpose in both creation and reconciliation. And this includes everything, since all is serving His grand design. Our prayers may include all, in heaven as well as on earth, but, of course, may concentrate on the world about us, and especially on the saints, and on those who are actively engaged in carrying out God's purpose in making Him known, particularly those to whom His secrets have been confided, and who, like Paul, are held and hindered from heralding what is on their heart. For now, far more than then, these secrets find little utterance or entrance among the people of God.

Most of us have heard many prayers concerning many things. We ourselves, perhaps, have prayed much and often. But, as we look back upon them, are we not reminded of the words of the apostle, that "we are not aware what we should pray for" (Rom.8:26)? Have not the most of our petitions been out of line with God's will? Do we not feel more and more that we desire to leave all details in God's hands because of our own ignorance of what should be? Yet, on the other hand, the definite instructions and exhortations which are given us, especially in the perfection epistles, as to the scope and subject of our prayers, are almost totally ignored. Should we hear them in public they would appear strange and mark the petitioner as peculiar, as, indeed, he would be.

WATCHING WITH THANKSGIVING

Perhaps most of us are inclined to wait until our prayers are answered to our satisfaction before we add our thanks. But that is because we have not yet fully found our All in God. We should learn to be especially thankful when matters do not turn out according to our wishes, for this is evidence enough that we were in the wrong, and harm would have resulted if our will had been carried out. We should thank as we watch. It is not our duty, in prayer, to instruct God what to do, or how or when to do it, but to recognize our utter incapacity to dictate these details, and to rejoice that they are in His skillful hands, so that we may thankfully acquiesce in every particular, even if it is contrary to our own will.

A practical instance is at hand. It is now many, many years since our own heart was overflowing in prayer and petition that expression might be granted to us to make known the secret of the evangel. Indeed, it seemed at the time that this should be our life work. There was much liberty in prayer, for there was no question of the Lord's will, seeing that He Himself had put the petition into our mouths. Yet it is clear from this secret itself that it has a temporary term, and that the faith is fading from the earth, so that great things could not be expected, especially as the close of this administration seemed so very near. Nevertheless there has been much watching to see if some would not accept and appreciate the marvelous message of God's special grace, and much thanksgiving, not only for those who received it, but also for those who did not, for both fulfill God's purpose.

Of course it is a special joy to hear of those who not only receive this precious truth, but strive to make it known. And God has graciously stirred some hearts, who have given written or oral testimony to the truth, at various times and in various countries. May our prayers result in a blessed awakening to this great truth! And, at the same time, may He open hearts to explore and enjoy the secret of Christ, the subject of our present meditation. These two secrets, that of the evangel, which involves the conciliation of the nations during the period of Israel's callousness, and that of Christ, which results in the reconciliation of all at the consummation, are very closely related in their present expression. Peace is the keynote of both. Even as conciliation is a precursor of reconciliation, so Christ's present attitude toward the nations may be looked upon as an anticipation of His attitude toward all in the last eon, when the secret of Christ will be fully unfolded. The secret of the evangel is, in part, but one aspect of the secret of Christ in its present expression. Therefore, in Ephesians, the apostle wishes us to pray for one, yet, in Colossians, for the other.

As we have seen, the secret of Christ is best set forth today by the expression "Christ among you, the expectation of glory" (1:27). Christ did not leave the land of Israel when He came in flesh. He was never among the nations. His presence in Israel was the assurance of future glory for all who received Him, which will be fulfilled in the thousand years, on the earth. His figurative presence now, among the nations, is also the assurance of future glory, for all who believe, among the celestials. At the same time it involves the setting aside of the enmity which existed in the days of His presence, and this is the conciliation. It is God Who is conciliated, yet it is Christ Who acts accordingly, and Who visits the nations, in spirit, just as He had come to Israel in the days of old.

MAKING IT MANIFEST

The secret of Christ must be manifested. Why not simply tell it out to eager crowds and herald it forth in overflowing halls? Why not let the daily press put it on the front page, with gigantic headlines, in colored ink? Or at least the religious press should give it the publicity it deserves. Pamphlets and books could be written and exhibited everywhere. It seems quite simple. But Paul did not urge the saints in his day to use every avenue of publicity, but to pray to God to open a door. The fact is that all doors are shut and locked against the entrance of this truth. No human effort is able to open them. We are entirely cast upon God for the manifestation of the secret of Christ.

Indeed, among the saints themselves there are few hearts that are open to these grand verities. And here we find not merely closed doors but open opposition. These transcendent truths, which complete the Word of God, which round out revelation, which draw aside the enigmatic veil which hangs before God's previous unfoldings—these are rejected as heretical and false, although their simple terms cannot be misunderstood. It is a question of giving Christ the highest place, and the opposing powers will not accord Him this. So doors are closed, and arguments are brought forth to show that these words cannot mean what they say. It may be well to consider a few of these.

"THINGS"

Strange as it may seem, one of the first reasons given for rejecting the reconciliation of all when we began to make it known was that the word "all" in this passage refers to things, not to persons; to creation, not to creatures. So it is in the popular versions, especially in the Revised, which is exceptionally particular on such points. Yet stranger still is the fact that this is according to current scholarship, which confounds the indefinite forms of the Greek with the English neuter gender. To what this leads may be seen in Galatians 3:22, where the Revisers changed the Authorized Version "the scripture hath concluded all under sin" to "the scripture hath shut up all things under sin." And this is "that the promise . . . might be given them that believe."

The mere fact that there is no estrangement between "things" and God, and therefore there can be no reconciliation, should suffice to show how groundless it is. In fact, the argument from "things" has little weight with intelligent searchers for truth, for, if we confine the preëminence of God's Son to His relation to the insensate matter of the universe, as, indeed, we must if pan is limited to things, the whole passage becomes absurd and intolerable. When it becomes evident, in the next paragraph, that the Colossians themselves were among these "things," few will care to limit the glories of the Son to the physical material of the universe, no matter how much Greek scholarship may stand back of the assertion. But the indefinite includes all genders as well as things.

Indeed, what other form than the indefinite could be used in this passage? Creation and reconciliation in Him were not confined to males or females, for, at his creation, even Adam was both, and this distinction would not apply to the creatures in the heavens. The universality of this passage cannot be confined to earthly conditions. In order to include all it must be expressed in terms that apply to all. To one who revels in this marvelous galaxy of glories, which exalts our beloved Lord as no other in God's precious Word, the continuous addition of the misleading word "things" in our popular versions seems as deplorable as it is unnecessary. It brings discord into this highest of harmonies. It seeks to dull His dignities, by making Him the Creator of lifeless substance, and not of living creatures.

You who use versions with "things" in Colossians 1:15-20, cross them out! Only by so doing may you be initiated into the secret of Christ. He is not merely the Creator of the dust beneath your feet, but He is your Creator! He is not the Reconciler of the soulless stone on which you stand, but He is your Reconciler! The simple fact that He appears here as the Son should show that He has to do with spirit and with life. He is not the Firstborn of dead substance but of living creatures.

SCOPE

Another bolt which has been used in order to keep the door from opening to allow the secret of Christ to enter is the plea that Colossians is concerned only with the church which is Christ's body, hence reconciliation can refer only to them. It is well to keep each statement in God's Word well within the scope of its context. But where, in all the sacred scrolls, is the range of the context any greater than in this passage? "Every creature" cannot be confined to the church which is Christ's body. "All in the heavens and on the earth" is as wide a scope as can well be imagined. With such a context, reconciliation cannot be limited to any body of God's creatures. It applies to all, sinners as well as saints, high and low, without any limitation whatever except previous estrangement.

UNIVERSALITY

Any attempt to subtract in the smallest degree from any one of the eight asseverations of universality in the first of Colossians I cannot help but feel is nothing less than treason! If He is the Firstborn of every creature but one, then He is not first in all! If a single creature was not created in Him, then His glory has suffered a severe eclipse! If another is before Him, then He is not first! If He is second in all, why not tell us of the one who is first? If only a part of the complement dwells in Him, then, of course, only a part will be reconciled through Him. Again I say, Treason!

The fact that almost all doors are closed to the secret of Christ today, especially among instructed saints, is a most illuminating commentary on this request for prayer. If Christendom had gone on in the truth, and the light had increased, then we might expect to find open doors. But the contrary has occurred. Apostasy from Paul is not confined to one province, as of old, but is well-nigh universal. And, as a consequence, the secret of Christ is not only unknown but shut out, debarred, yes, in some cases, detested. There is more need for prayer now than ever before that God will open doors for its manifestation.

WALKING IN WISDOM

"Be walking in wisdom toward those outside" (Col.4:5). These words follow immediately upon the reference to the secret of Christ. In Ephesians (5:15) we have a similar exhortation, but nothing is said of those outside. This is another of those delicate touches which distinguish the two epistles, for the secret of Christ brings us into much closer relation to unbelievers, by creation and reconciliation, in which they share, than the secret of Ephesians, in which they have no part. And how is it possible to walk in wisdom toward our fellow saints or toward the world without a grasp of the great secrets which affect each so vitally? These alone will revolutionize the attitude of our hearts toward them and enable us to act in accord with God's purpose for them.

It is wisdom to deal with men in accord with God's will and purpose concerning them. If we imagine that those outside are doomed to destruction or eternal torment, it is practically impossible to avoid a hardening of the heart in regard to them, which will lead us to think and act contrary to the basic truths of their creation and reconciliation in love. Thinking of them as so much waste in God's operations in turn reflects upon His wisdom and love. These false conceptions of God's creation and goal, outside the Son of His love, make a wise walk toward those outside well-nigh impossible. But when we see the place of everyone in God's plans, it will soften our hearts and steady our heads, and we will be enabled to recognize His handiwork in the most worthless and most antagonistic of His creatures.

Looked at apart from God's purpose, the present era, like those before it, is vanity, and a feeding on wind. There is much talk of evolution and there is much real revolution, but the world as a whole seems to be slipping down into an abyss instead of climbing up into a paradise. Of what use is all the work and woe with which we are surrounded? We know that God will yet make excellent use of it. Man's day will reveal man's failure and futility. This is of no value in itself, but of surpassing worth in humbling man and in bringing him to accept and appreciate God's grace. In this way this wicked era will be reclaimed in due time. Yet wisdom will anticipate, and use the background of human incapacity and hate in order to display the fullness of God's competency and love.

Not only are we to deal graciously among ourselves (Eph.4:32), but our conduct with those outside should also be governed by this precious quality. Once we know that even they were created in love and will be reconciled by the blood of Christ's cross, we will recognize in their present state only a temporary estrangement from God, in which evil and sin play a painful yet salutary part. Far from harsh condemnation, we will sympathize with them in their condition, and speak and act in faith, knowing that they will yet fulfill the object of their creation, when God becomes All in them. What if they are the vessels of God's indignation now? In due time He will use them for His glory. We, the vessels of His grace, have no more right to His favor than those without. May this thought humble us before them.

Our Lord called His disciples the salt of the earth (Matt.5:13). They alone could stay its corruption. Perhaps nowhere is the rottenness of the world more evident than in its utterances. Not only should our speech with them be gracious, but free from the decadent foulness which characterizes much of human intercourse. More than that, it should be a seasoning and a preservative, counteracting the decay all around us. And what is more effective for this than an exultant knowledge of God's grand goal, when all that is corruptible will have given place to that which is incorruptible and glorious?

A heart overflowing with expectation in the future which is in store for all of God's creatures is the best preparation for meeting and answering the questions of those outside. Apart from this knowledge the world has many queries to which even the saint cannot give a satisfactory reply. "Why does God allow such terrible things to occur?" Such questions come from the lips of those who know nothing about God. And how few are able to show that God does not "allow" them to happen, but brings them about for His glory and our blessing? As a result the deity of most real believers is only a second or third rate god, who needs to be excused for his dereliction of duty and defended for His impotence.

We should never be at a loss to answer the questions of the godless in regard to God's present operations and His prospective goal. This is seen fully only in the secret of Christ, which it is our privilege and duty to manifest. So that, unlike Ephesian truth, which is only for the saints and can only be grasped by these under circumstances which are all too rare in these days, the secret of Christ should have a powerful influence on our walk and talk with those outside the family of faith. In measure it should be manifested by our conduct in the world as well as by our witness to the saints. May each one of us pray this prayer and seek to fulfill it in our own words and work!

A. E. Knoch

THE BLOOD OF CHRIST'S CROSS

The will of God, and His love for His Son, envisioned the blood of Christ's cross (Col.1:20). Reconciliation cannot be achieved without the blood, which speaks of suffering. In Leviticus 17:11 we read (CV): "For the soul of the flesh, it is in the blood." The soul is a matter of our feelings and senses. Christ laid down His soul (John 10:17) which became sorrow-stricken to death (Matt.26:38).

These sufferings were necessary for the work of reconciliation, which in turn makes it possible for Christ to receive a kingdom of the reconciled. These sufferings were so severe and vast in their extent that they will lead to a reconciliation no less vast. The reconciliation is to be universal.

In this we can see how it was that God's love for Christ as His Son prompted Him to prepare the sufferings of the cross. We can begin to grasp the significance of Isaiah 53:10, where we read, "Yet Yahweh desires to crush Him, and He causes Him to be wounded."

As the blood speaks of pain and agony, so the cross speaks of humiliation and shame. The death on the cross was a sacrifice, but it was an extremely ignominious one. It was a curse to be hung on a tree (Deut.21:22,23). This was a nailing to a stake, as was done to the lowest of criminals and outcasts. As such it demanded estrangement between God and His Son (Matt.27:46), yet this was an estrangement which ends all estrangement.

How amazing it is that this humiliation becomes the background for the display of God's love for His Son! It prepared the way for the exaltation of Christ above every throne and lordship and sovereignty and authority, and every name which is named.

Even as the shame of the cross was necessary for the glorious reign of Christ as the beloved Son, so also was His humiliation necessary in order for us to be glorified with Him. "For the One not knowing sin, [God] makes to be sin for our sakes that we may be becoming God's righteousness in Him" (2 Cor.5:21). But even here, the glory which arises from the humiliation of Christ does not end. Through the enmity of the cross the enmity between God and His creation is removed. It was God's love for His Son which prepared the cross so that He might achieve reconciliation.

In conciliation the barriers are removed between God and humanity (2 Cor.5:18,19). In reconciliation there is a full appreciation and enjoyment of the peace and access which this removal of enmity has produced. The cross assures this establishment of peace in the hearts of all of God's creatures (Col.1:20), but it is only believers who enjoy it "now" (Col.1:22) as we persist in the faith and are grounded and settled and are not removed from the expectation of the evangel of grace (Col.1:23).

However, every point of this evangel demands that the reconciliation be universal and eventually apply to all who are estranged. The blood, the Son's sufferings, demands that all enmity be removed from the universe. The cross, the Son's humiliation, demands that full value be given for the price paid. God's love for His Son demands that He receive a kingdom of fully reconciled creatures, and that none be denied to Him.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

Colossians 2:8-23

Christ, with His secret glories, is the determining factor in doctrine and deportment for today. When we give Him His high place in our heads and hearts we cannot go far astray. Now that Paul has set forth the secret of Christ, he deals with departures from it in doctrine (2:8-23), and discusses its bearing on our conduct (3:1-4:1). Doctrinal departure may be grouped under two distinct heads, that which comes from men, and that which comes from God. Reasoning and ritual are the two dangers against which we are warned.

If we realize our completeness in Christ and His glory as the complement of the Deity, we are immensely wealthy. We possess riches beyond the power of figures to express. We cannot consider the millionaires or billionaires of these last days in our class, for their riches are loaned to them only for a few brief years, and even then they bring with them more care than contentment, more unpleasantness than joy. Ours is sure to us for all time. On one point, however, we are like them. We may lose the enjoyment of it for a season. This may be taken from us if we do not beware.

Philosophy and religion have robbed us of more vital values than any other foes. One denies Christ His place as the Complement of God. The other refuses to accept Him as the Completeness of the saints. In these days the extreme of these two movements may be seen in Modernism on the one hand and Romanism on the other. A vain philosophy is seeking to eliminate God and His Christ from the universe. An empty ritual is seeking to displace the work of Christ. We may not go to either of these extremes, yet in all of us lies the tendency to put reason and religion in the place of God's Anointed. Hence the apostle's warning.

BEWARE

In Ephesians we are warned to beware how we walk (Eph.5:15). In Philippians we have a threefold warning as to our service (Phil.3:2), but in Colossians it is applied to departure from the great doctrine of Christ as the Complement of all. The saints are almost all being robbed, yet, as it were, in a legal way, so that they are not aware of the great loss which they have sustained. Indeed, most of them cling to the substitutes, and would feel themselves robbed rather if these were taken away from them. Thus, not being even aware of their vast loss, they cannot beware lest it be taken from them. In these days the situation has been reversed. The saints have lost these precious possessions and now need rather to recover their property.

The saints as a whole have been despoiled through philosophy and empty seduction, in accord with human tradition, in accord with the elements of the world. What is needed is that we recognize this in our own case and seek to remedy it insofar as we are able. Two things are necessary in order to accomplish this. First, we must seek to absorb into our whole being the great companion truths of Christ as the Complement for God and man. Then we should examine the Scriptures so that we may recognize the enemies of these vital verities, rationalism and religion. Both pervade Christendom today to an extent that would astonish the saints if they only realized it. Christendom is poor today, beggared by these two robbers, who have taken our Christ from us.

PHILOSOPHY OR HUMAN TRADITION

Men allege themselves to be wise, yet are stupid. Their heart is darkened. They are vain in their reasonings. Yet even many of the leaders in Christendom laud man's "God-given reason," and encourage us to make use of it, especially in the search for truth. To be sure, such reason as man has left was given him by God, but, knowing God, they did not glorify or thank Him as God, hence they were made vain in their reasonings (Rom.1:21). As many, if not most, of the saints are partakers in this sin of not glorifying God as God, they also manifest the futility of reasoning, especially in the things of God.

Perhaps no better example can be given of the vanity of human ratiocination where God's glory is denied than the imbecility of the evolutionary hypothesis. I consider the mere fact that this silly theory could be entertained by the scientific world for so long a time as ample evidence of the intellectual decadence of this era. There has never yet been found a single fact on which to form a logical syllogism on which to base the theory of evolution, yet the great majority of western scientists swallowed it whole, and sneer at all who do not share their infatuation. The real basis of the theory lies in its irrational commencement without a creation, and its continuance without a Creator. It robs God of His glory, gives Him no thanks, so, morally and rationally, must be a vacuous vanity.

But even we, though saints, are not exempt from this law. Few, indeed, glorify God as God in these days, and, as a result, their mental processes are clouded and confused, and lead to error, rather than to truth. I have ceased to expect full clarity of thought from anyone who does not bow to the absolute deity of God, without reservation or restriction. The nearer there is an approach to this the more will reason be rational. Yet the nearer we come to the acknowledgment of God's deity, the more we will discard reason for faith, and philosophy for revelation, and the less will we be guilty of injecting philosophy into God's Word.

This has been a sore evil in these latter days, especially among those who seek to be Bible students. With many of them the Scriptures have been transformed into a bog of proof texts instead of a full-fledged faith to be believed. Philosophies are propounded and supported by texts from Genesis to Revelation, with little regard to their contexts or actual contents. Figurative statements have been treated as if literal and used to prove that which is not true. Philosophy is then installed in the place of Holy Writ, and demands implicit faith, such as should be given to the Word alone.

The only true philosophy must be based upon the great truth that, in Christ, the entire complement of the Deity is dwelling bodily. Even those who recognize God, such as Solomon, find unsolved problems in the world as it is. If he, with all his wisdom, as well as a measure of revelation, could not finish his philosophy, what can other men do? Many have tried it, and have only led mankind further from God and the truth. A great scientist and believer once expressed his conviction that, if we only knew all, we would conclude that this world is the very wisest and best that could be. But the accepted philosophers have taken the opposite stand, and have sown distrust and hatred and despair in the hearts of mankind. A close student of Schopenhauer has said, "He seems to have the key for a few doors of our life, but he has none for its exit."

The world, as it is, is abnormal, and presents no proper premises for reason to build upon. Things are wrong, and the wrongs are not righted. It is only as we bring in God, and His activities in Christ, in the past and in the future, that all becomes rational and understandable and glorious. In His Beloved, and through Him, He will fulfill all the beneficent designs which move His heart. And all that God needs or will use in accomplishing His purpose, is in Him. If, indeed, we also have a part in this glorious work, it is only because we are in Him. In ourselves we contribute only to the negative, the destructive, the preparatory phase of God's plan. The positive, the constructive, the conclusive work is all done by Christ, or through those who are His.

We are not philosophers, indeed, and have no philosophy in fact, but we have the reality, the substance, of which philosophy is only the shadow, the elusive phantom. The philosophers nearly all disagree. Were they good reasoners, they would deduce from this fact alone that philosophy is mostly a bad dream. And not one of these philosophies is complete or satisfactory since they deal with a transitory phase of God's dealings with man as if it were the whole. They have no light beyond the tomb and know nothing of judgment and reconciliation. We have what the philosopher is seeking, and find all included in Christ, Who is the Wisdom of God.

Christendom, and even the vast majority of the saints within it, do not know Christ thus. The title "Complement" is His because He brings all to a satisfactory Completion. But the final phase of God's purpose has been hid from Christendom, so that the creation which it commences in chaos, manages to bring millions of sentient beings into existence, not for their own happiness or the glory of God, but for their unending torment and the eternal disgrace of the Deity. Any philosophy based on the creeds of Christendom must lead to desperation and insanity. Even when death is made to end all, oblivion is no jewel in God's crown, and is no rational apology for creation. Reason and revelation demand that God be glorified, that suffering receive a satisfactory explanation, and that a completed, not a shattered universe crown the efforts of Deity and the intervention of His Anointed.

Perhaps the greatest treasure of which the saints have been despoiled is the reconciliation of all. Almost precisely the same words are used to introduce this glorious truth. Let us refer to it again (1:18-20): "that in all He may be becoming first, seeing that the entire complement delights to dwell in Him, and through Him to reconcile all to Him . . . ." It is because He is God's Complement that all will be reconciled. If He does not reconcile all, that all will not be complete and He is not God's Complement. The full force of "complement" or "fullness" is denied by nearly every saint who bears His name. Only a tiny remnant dares to acknowledge Him as God's Complement. All the rest have been robbed of a jewel of far more value than any gem in any diadem of any potentate of earth.

THE ELEMENTS OF THE WORLD

One of the worst robbers in Christendom is ritual. Nor should we confine this term to those vast communions which use it in their form of worship. Ritual is not merely a recalling of the Jewish service and sacrifices in such things as the celebration of the mass among those whose Christianity is no more than a name, but includes the rite of baptism among those who are alive, and intelligent, and active in the service of our Lord. For the spiritual believer there is more danger in ritual than in rationalism, for ritual is divine in its origin, and seems to be God's will, when the Word of truth is not correctly cut.

Ritual can only be countered by the precious truth of completeness in Christ. Religion implies incompleteness and demands that something be done to fill our lack. Circumcision, baptism, the keeping of decrees, of festivals, and all religious ritual are intended to make us more acceptable to God in ourselves, though none of them is more than a mere shadow. Christ is the Reality which they portray, and, in Him, we have the substance, hence do not need the shadow. Indeed, if we seek to make ourselves complete by means of these shadows, the reality will be lost to us. Few things are more needed in these days than a knowledge of our completeness in Christ.

REAL CIRCUMCISION

A considerable portion of mankind is distinguished by the sign of circumcision, because they are descendants of Abraham, and should shadow forth the fact that blessing comes through faith, not through flesh. It signifies that the flesh is cut off. It foreshadowed the cross of Christ, where He was cut off, and all further hope of anything through His flesh was at an end. In Him we also were cut off, and our flesh has no place before God. If then, our flesh is cut off, why act as if it were not so? The Circumcisionists of Paul's day lacked the reality. In fact they fought against it. With them the flesh was vitally important. They were not the circumcision, but the *maim*cision (Phil.3:2). The rite itself kept them from the reality. And so it will rob all who submit to it now that we are complete in Christ.

GENUINE BAPTISM

Circumcision was needed to enter into the community of God's people. Baptism speaks of a much nearer approach. It was for the priests when they came near to worship in the tabernacle and the temple. Symbolically it cleansed the flesh whenever it sought the divine presence. The reality is found in the entombment of Christ. The body that bore the sin of the world was laid away in the tomb. Thus has God dealt graciously with all of our offenses. All the water in the world could not have removed a single one of them. It can only indicate the actual cleansing. To repeat the rite, now that we have the reality, is to deny the great truth that we have all of which it speaks, in Christ our Complement.

The great proof that we have had the real baptism is that we are roused and vivified jointly with Him (Col.

2:12,13). One who is vivified cannot offend again, but is wholly without sin. Why should such a one be baptized? Should Christ once more return to the tomb because of our offenses? Or is He alive beyond the reach of sin and death? As He is, so are we, in spirit. Already, in God's sight, we are as we shall be in the future, when in the presence of our Lord, immortal, incorruptible. His burial is our baptism, and His vivification is our life.

ERASING THE DECREES

Not only did the Jews of Paul's day seek to insist on the circumcision and baptism of converts, but they sought to put them under law. Their attempt to enslave them under the law of Moses did not succeed, due to Paul's energetic remonstrance, as we see in his Galatian letter, but this did not hinder them from making rules of their own for them, which, while they seem to free them from the observance of the Mosaic ritual, nevertheless brought them under the authority of the apostles just as if they were subjects in the millennial kingdom, instead of having a celestial allotment of their own.

THE DECREES OF JAMES

So far as the relation of the nations to God is concerned they will be under the sovereignty and authority of the chosen nation in the future on the earth. Nevertheless that nation, by crucifying their Messiah, has forfeited all right to such a place, and will exercise it only when once again restored to divine favor. In the book of Acts, where Israel is continually becoming more and more apostate, and James, who was not an apostle, gets the upper hand, it seems utterly unwarranted on their part to assume to dictate to the converts among the nations, except as we view this as a foretaste of the kingdom.

Although Christendom has not given much heed to the decrees, issued by James, the same thing has been repeated thousands of times in its many organizations. Men have arisen and taken upon themselves to rule and regulate the conduct of the saints by means of "disciplines" and "manuals" and other substitutes for the law, usually incorporating a portion of the Mosaic code in their own. All such attempts to bring us into bondage to human "sovereignties and authorities" are destructive of our completeness in Christ. He has nailed them to His cross. They are not for us, but against us. They are hostile to us. They bring us into bondage, after Christ has made us free. In Him we need no regulations from the hands of men.

Israel had a divine law, which was holy and just and good. But did it make them complete for God's presence? Far from it! Rather it revealed their incompleteness. How then shall human enactments help to make men acceptable to Him? They do not! They have the opposite effect. Let us strip them off! Such human additions to God's requirements were given the greatest weight in Israel, but it did not help them to recognize their Messiah, but rather to crucify Him. His crucifixion was a public spectacle showing how weak and worthless such things were, and at the same time a repudiation of them, and a triumph over them. No human enactment, unless it be the decree that caused Christ to be crucified, furnishes us fully for the future.

For us the figure of the body takes the place of the shadows of the law. Instead of ceasing work on a Saturday we look above and see Christ seated at God's right hand, His work on our behalf completed. The difference is vast. Not our work, or even our cessation from work, makes us meet for glory, but our position in Christ has already placed us there in spirit. Knowing this, we will allow no one to judge us, should we work on the seventh day of the week, or should we eat that which has been offered to idols, or fail to keep a festival found in the law.

LET NO ONE JUDGE YOU

The decrees issued from Jerusalem were partly concerned with food. The nations were not to be allowed to eat anything which had been strangled, or blood (Acts 15:20). Now the apostle puts an end to such prohibitions. The law of Moses dealt with such matters as food and drink, the details of a festival, the new moons, and the sabbaths, not that it might make those who kept it perfect thereby, but, partly at least, in order to foreshadow the true perfection of the future in connection with Christ. He is the true Food and Drink. The festivals point to His work and the sabbath to the cessation of all work for salvation, in Him. All of these have a future fulfillment on the earth, hence have their place with the people of the earth, but not with us, whose destiny is different.

LET NO ONE ARBITRATE AGAINST YOU

Israel had a divine ritual. It would have been high-handed presumption for anyone of the people to enter the holy places. Such a one would send his representative or messenger, the priest, in his place, and not without due regard to the formalities prescribed by the Mosaic ritual. It seems like real humility today to take a far-off stand, and allow another to take our place in approach to God, by means of elaborate rites and splendid ceremonies, which appeal to the eye, but it is a sham. The mind of the flesh can actually pride itself on this humility, and turn against those who consider themselves fit for God's presence for no other reason than their confidence in Christ.

HOLDING THE HEAD

Ritual calls for the intervention of intermediate messengers, such as priests or clergy, and these take the place which belongs to Christ as the Head of the body. Ritual demands an organization rather than a living organism, in which each member is in living connection with the Head. We should hold fast the Head and reject all interfering substitutes. Ritual demands stagnation, faith brings growth. Occupation with the shadows and symbols is not to be compared with vital union with Him to Whom they point. Let us not be subject to these but to our living Head, and grow into the assurance of our completeness in Him, where no rites or ceremonies are needed to finish our perfection.

DEATH TO THE ELEMENTS OF THE WORLD

In Christ we have died to everything which is against us. In Him we died to sin (Rom.6:2). Those under the law died to it (Gal.2:19). We have been crucified to the world (Gal.6:14). The "elements" of the world had their proper place in the past, in Israel. During their minority they were enslaved to these elements (Gal.4:3). When the Galatians went back to these things they scrutinized days and months and seasons and years (Gal.4:9,10). The elements are poor and infirm, yet there is a continual tendency on the part of the saints to fall back to them. Religion is practically composed of them. But we have died to them.

Were we living in the world, as Israel was under the law, then we would have part in the "Christian religion," with rules and regulations and a ritual to be observed—just as most of the saints are! Then, indeed, all would be negative—you shall not touch this or taste that, nor make contact with the other. These regulations are made by men and seem to be wise measures for the conduct of religious worship. How much better that all churches go through the same ritual each Sunday! And what an advantage that all observe the same calendar and the same festivals each year! From the standpoint of the world this all seems excellent, but it is fit for infants, not for full-fledged saints.

Willful humility has no value in God's sight. In one of the great confessions in a foreign country, every time the Lord's supper is observed, the whole congregation must repeat together something like the following: "I, poor, miserable, sinful creature, confess herewith all my sins . . . ." Yet, after reiterating this for a lifetime, most of them never realize that they are anything of the kind. In other places they fast and castigate themselves. But all of this is powerless to effect its purpose. All of it is directed toward the improvement of the flesh, yet it only serves to make it worse. We have died to the elements of the world, and are mature in Christ, hence pay no heed to human decrees.

SOUL OR SPIRIT

Philosophy is dependent on human experience, which is abnormal at present, hence it cannot reason to any satisfactory conclusion. Religion seeks to deal with the sensations rather than the spirit, hence lacks permanent power. Both utterly fail to settle the problems with which they deal. They are essentially soulish, not spiritual. Christ and His cross and His crown are the only satisfactory solution to the riddle of the universe. He exemplifies God's Wisdom and God's Righteousness. He is all that God needs to effect the purpose of His love with creation. He is all that we need in order to fully fit us for that perfection. He is our Philosophy and our Religion. A. E. Knoch

With the preceding article and that which follows we complete the reprint of Brother A. E. Knoch's series of studies on Colossians. Originally published in 1940,41, they direct our attention to that epistle which especially centers on Christ and His relationship to God and to us. This epistle is much needed for our continuing meditation.

D.H.H.

THAT WHICH IS ABOVE

Colossians 3:1–4:1

OUR BODIES have not yet been raised to celestial spheres, but, in spirit, we have been vivified together with Christ (Eph.2:5) and roused with Him (Col.3:1). Hence come the great conflicts in our conduct, for while we are on earth in flesh, our spirit and our soul belong above, where Christ is sitting at the right hand of God. The body apart from the spirit is dead. As our life is hid together with Christ in God, we are dead to the things of this nether sphere. We have no future on the earth. Any moment may call us away to our celestial home.

This includes far more than death to sin, as set before us in the sixth of Romans. This exhortation is not based on Christ's descent for us, but on His exaltation among the celestials. It does not appeal to His past suffering for our sakes, but to His future glory and our public manifestation with Him in it. The power of that glory is already operating in our spirits and attracts our souls as a magnet to the empyrean. Our life is an invisible one, even as Christ is hid from mortal gaze. We belong to the celestials.

Correct conduct consists in conformity to truth. All our acts should fit the facts. So long as we belonged to this earth and the decadent humanity which inhabits it, we deported ourselves accordingly. Now that our vital interests have been transferred to a higher and nobler sphere we should comport ourselves as becomes its dignity and glory. We no longer belong down here. The earth with the human beings upon it is no connection to be proud of. We should be glad to be rid of our relationship to such a race, and to enter into practical possession of our new dignities by conducting ourselves as those of a higher, nobler, and yet humbler company.

PUT TO DEATH

God's indignation is coming on the sons of stubbornness because of their sins and transgressions and offenses. True, this does not meet them, as a rule, in this life, but it will surely visit them in the judgment and in the days of vengeance, when God deals with the race as a whole. Not only the baser sins will endure His indignation, but some which almost parade as virtues will call down His wrath. Greed is the worship of things, the reliance on the creature, and will be dealt with as idolatry, for it puts possessions in the place of Him Who must possess the undivided loyalty of every heart. Reliance on riches is idolatry, for One alone is reliable.

Once we lived in these things, but now we should gladly put them in the place of death, so that they have no more attraction, no further power, no longer any part in our lives. Death to the indulgences of the flesh! Death to all evil desires that drag us down!

THE OLD AND THE YOUNG HUMANITY

The race of mankind is hopelessly decrepit and depraved. In a fine figure its conduct is compared with the clothes with which it covers its nakedness. But its outward behavior is by no means ideal. Its conduct is no fit covering for us. Hence we are exhorted to strip it off and put on a different dress, more suited to our new relations. We are to leave off anger, fury, malice, calumny, obscenity, and falsehood. These are no fitting garment for the young humanity which has Christ as its Image. Such should put on the very opposite. Anger, fury, malice, should be replaced by compassion and kindness, calumny and obscenity out of your mouth by humility, meekness, patience, gracious forbearance.

The cause of much misconduct in the old humanity is its shattered condition. It is split up into conflicting factions. In it the Greek is set against the Jew, the Circumcision against the Uncircumcision, the slave against the freeman. Its unity is destroyed, its parts are antagonistic. There is mutual distrust and jealousy and hatred between its sections. All this is done away in the young humanity, in which Christ is everything to each one. It is, and always will remain, an indivisible unity, with no friction or faction. In Christ we recognize no distinctions, such as mar humanity. Race, religion, ritual and social standing all disappear. These are the hindrances to unity which must be discarded.

GRACE OUR GUIDING STAR

How has the Lord dealt with us? He has not merely been kind and forgiving, but, above all, gracious. Grace does not get, but gives. Grace does not condemn, but condones. Grace does not hinder, but helps. Grace does not find fault, but freely bestows its favors. No matter what we are or what we have done, we can always be sure of sufficient grace from our adorable Lord. O that we could count upon the same consideration from those who are His! O that we would show the same grace to all who are the recipients of His favor!

LOVE, THE TIE OF MATURITY

With whatever else the young humanity may be clothed, it should always wear, over all, the magic mantle of love. The ties that bound together the sections of the old humanity also divided these from one another. Descent from Abraham united some, yet severed them from the rest. But love makes no divisions, no separations. Hence it is the bond that binds abidingly, and abolishes all dividing barriers. It is God's love expressed in terms of grace which has united us to Him, and it is the same love which will unite us to one another.

THE ARBITRATION OF PEACE

Christ has made peace. In Him and through Him all cause for strife and dissension has been done away. He has made peace between us and God when we were enemies. He has made peace between the Circumcision, who were near, and the Uncircumcision, who were far from Him. In the days to come He will be the Prince of Peace. During His reign upon the earth there will be no wars upon the earth, no armies, no soldiers on land or sea or in the air. So even now, in Him, all cause for contention is unknown. Dissension among the saints should always be settled by an appeal to this peace. Love should weld all who are Christ's into one, and peace should preserve the unity of love.

BE THANKFUL

One of the most elementary demands upon the creature is thankfulness. It is because men were not thankful that God has given them over, that their heart is darkened (Rom.1:1). Not, indeed, as a punishment for their ingratitude, but rather to introduce a process by means of which mankind will learn by their lack to appreciate the gifts of God. It is difficult to see how anyone who has even a dim apprehension of his place in Christ should not overflow in gratitude. Yet it is well for us to continually remind our hearts to bring their adoring response and lay it at the feet of Him Who hungers for the homage of all the hearts He has created.

TEACHING, ADMONISHING, SINGING

All conduct depends upon a knowledge of God and His Christ, as found in His Word. Therefore the one who desires to walk acceptably should make his heart a home for the word of Christ in such a redundant measure that philosophy will be replaced by real wisdom, and ritual by genuine, heartfelt homage and worship. The secret of Christ is the sum of all philosophy, and the goal of all wisdom. It should be the basis of our teaching and admonition, along with all the rich grace which accompanies it, and then it will overflow in affectionate response to God in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs.

DO ALL IN THE NAME

The secret of Christ unfolds to us the great truth that God will fulfill all His will through His Anointed. He was the medium of creation and will be the means of reconciliation. All is through Him even as all is out of God. All the divine activities during the eons are under His control. Hence all that we do or say should be in His name. It is the incense which makes all acceptable. Even our thanks should not ascend to God without its savor.

SUBJECTION

Subjection is one of the great lessons of the eons. The future does not consist in the self-assertion and independence of God's creatures, but in their subjection to Him (1 Cor.15:28). Even the Son Himself, the great King and Head of the whole universe, will resign all rule and take the place of subjection. It is the only normal and natural condition for a creature. There can be no ultimate perfection so long as all are not in delightful and loving subjection to the Creator. Hence it is one of the chief lessons of the eons to learn to be subject, each in his own sphere. Even masters are reminded that they have a master above them.

In these degenerate days there is a strong tendency to throw off all yokes, and to demand a spurious liberty and independence. This generally accompanies the repudiation of God and the rejection of the lordship of Christ.

Where men will not bow in subjection to God, it follows that the authority of the husband is weakened, that children will not obey their parents, and that workers will not take their proper place beneath their superiors. Among the saints subjection to God should be emphasized, as well as to one another, for it, rather than a theoretical liberty, brings blessing and happiness.

The eons are a training school for the future, and are intended to teach, not merely the creature's dependence upon God, but that insubordination leads to suffering and even death. Herein we see the reason for our social institutions, and the various ranks of mankind. Theoretically, we imagine that mankind would be happier if all were on a level, and there were no subordination. So they would, if all were subject to God. So it will be after the eons are past. But, until then, subjection is God's means of preparing for that blessed ultimate. In the various relations of life we must learn to be subject, each in our sphere.

There is no call upon us to rule, even though this is implied in the subjection of others. The husband is not told to lay down the law, but to love. Parents are not told to be strict with their children, but to refrain from vexing them. Masters are not exhorted to domineer over their slaves, but to be just and equitable in dealing with them. The grace we have received will help us to bow in acquiescent subjection, and also greatly soften the severity and harshness usually associated with human authority. Man's inhumanity to man has become a proverb. It has its place in God's purpose, as a contrast to God's loving rule. It is our privilege to reflect this in our earthly relationships, as well as our own affectionate subjection to Him in the consummation.

CONCLUSION

Colossians is colossal in its scope. Written, indeed, by the apostle of the nations to them, yet it deals with the secret of Christ, which is not confined to us or to this present administration, but reaches back to creation and on to the ultimate reconciliation of all. The Son of God's love, and His activities, from the commencement to the consummation, filling the earth and the heavens, bringing all back to God's heart—such is the background of this epistle. From these transcendent verities follow the truth for us and for today. His high heavenly honors He shares with us, having made us complete in Him. Hence we turn our gaze from the earth to that above.

O that God would open hearts to receive and revel in these revelations! How these would deliver them from their bonds! How these would illumine their darkness! How they would outgrow the immature conceptions of Christianity which stunt and dwarf their spirits! Here we have the fullest knowledge, the highest wisdom, the greatest glory, the very pinnacle of God's revelation. O that God would open the eyes of His saints! Alas! As a whole they reject His glories in place of receiving them. Most of them oppose His blessings in place of believing them. But, thanks be to God, the time is coming when all will find in Him their All. The day is approaching when all will see in Him God's Complement, One competent to reconcile to God all that is now estranged.

His favorite topic was concerning the full control of God in our lives. Bob is survived by his loving wife, Jean. We look forward to seeing him in the snatching away to meet our Lord in the air.

Kitty Land, of Benton, Arkansas, was put to repose on August 22, 2020. She greatly rejoiced in God saving all mankind. EXCEPT WHAT IS HUMAN

"NO TRIAL has taken you except what is human. Now, faithful is God, Who will not be leaving you to be tried above what you are able, but, together with the trial, will be making the sequel also, to enable you to undergo it" (1 Cor.10:13).

There is no escape for a human being from being human. It is especially unfortunate that the AV uses the word "escape" in this passage to describe God's faithful provision for us in the face of human trials. Most modern translations follow the same pattern with renderings such as "a way out." But in using the Greek term signifying out-stepping, Paul does not refer to an escaping from human trials but the "sequel" (CV) or "issue" (Darby) of the trials. It is what God is bringing out of the trial that is in view, not our removal from the trial or a provision of a way of escape.

Trials, in the literal sense of the Greek word, are probings. They are not matters of judgment against wrong actions, but may often truly seem unaccountable to us, as it was with Job. They are common to all humanity. But the difference for believers lies in their acquaintance with the God of purpose, power, wisdom and grace, the God of righteousness and love and deliverance. Our attention is focused on God. In the experience of trial, in prayer and petition, with reliance and assurance, we give recognition to God and are strengthened in all endurance and patience, even "with joy" (cf Col.1:11).

This does not necessarily mean that the probing is taken away. And even if it is, this does not mean that another one will not take its place. In this present life, there is no way out of the human experience of probing trials. But God is faithful, and He is making the sequel "together with the trial."

THE ENDURANCE OF JOB

In encouraging patience and endurance under trial, James writes to Israelites in dispersion: "You hear of the endurance of Job, and you perceive the consummation of the Lord, for very compassionate and pitiful is the Lord" (James 5:11; cp 1:1,12). Here the association of human endurance in trial and the Lord's consummation is somewhat different from that of God's sequel and the human undergoing of trial. The corresponding terms, endurance/undergoing and consummation/sequel, are reversed in the two passages. Thus we infer from James that the Lord's consummation is based on human endurance, while in Paul's letter the human endurance in undergoing trial is settled on our appreciation of the divine sequel which is being prepared whether we appreciate it or not.

These are not contradictory thoughts, but they do represent different stages of divine disclosure. For Israel the promises of blessing are predominantly presented as dependent on human obedience. Under law they were to obey so that Yahweh would bless. But even with Israel, the principle is to be adjusted when God puts His law within them and writes it on their heart (Jer.31:33). Then it will be seen that the blessing ultimately does not come from human obedience (for Israel proves disobedient) but comes as God's own accomplishment (cf Ezek.36:22-32). The consummation the Lord prepared for Job will also be finally seen as fully out of God Who granted Job that measure of endurance he displayed.

Under Paul's evangel, the mature position of beginning with the revelation of divine grace and leading from that to its powerful effects in our lives is clearly set forth from start to finish. There is no suggestion of uncertainty concerning the end results. And it is because of that outlook that the divine sequel becomes an influence of grace rather than something seen as dependent on human action.

However, although James does not look as deeply into the significance of human trials as Paul does, James's reference to the example of Job is relevant to all who are undergoing trial, whatever our calling may be. Job is an excellent example for us all, even under the evangel of grace.

"THERE WAS A MAN"

We may well wonder at first how James could have seen Job as a pattern of endurance. Yet in consideration of the intensity of his afflictions and sorrows, so that he would prefer death to life, we begin to understand something of what James had in view. It was not a matter of stoicism with Job. There was no attempt to overcome passion or subdue pain and grief. It was an endurance that recognized the realities of the trial and searched persistently for an understanding of it. It was a very human endurance, not one of giving in to the suffering nor of seeking to rise above the suffering, but of longing to see that it truly came from God Who acts in accord with His purpose.

The book begins, "There was a man . . . ." Job, however, was not an ordinary man, but one who "was flawless and upright, fearing Elohim and keeping away from evil" (Job 1:1). He was a wealthy man with seven sons and three daughters whom he valued very much (1:2-5). But for all his uprightness, Job was probed with a trial that was altogether human, though uniquely concentrated and severe. It is the superexcellence of Job's goodness and the intensity of his trial that makes his example so striking and helpful to us in our (relatively) lesser afflictions.

Indeed, Job remains under the trial; that is the meaning of endurance. He endures with human anguish, but always looking to God for an answer to the incessant Why? of his heart. "Why is [God] giving light to the miserable, and life to the bitter of soul?" (Job 3:20). Addressing God as the Preserver of mankind, he asks, "Why have You established me as Your target mark, that I should become a load to You?" (7:20). In seeing himself as already condemned he pleads, "Why is this that I should be wearied in vain?" (9:29).

In this we find the pattern of Job's endurance. It was a matter of hope for understanding, and it was a hope that looked to God. While he was undergoing the trial Job did not perceive the "consummation of the Lord." But he felt with every ounce of his being that the Lord must have a reason for the probing and a consummation in view. Job longed to be assured he was not really "wearied in vain."

Job's endurance is shown in the unrelenting focusing of his thoughts on God. "As for me, I would speak to Him Who-Suffices, and to plead with El is what I desire" (13:3). "My eye weeps forth to Eloah" (16:20).

If only Job could know that God was making an outstepping for the trial, not simply an escape from it, but a resulting issue that was of value and benefit. Indeed, in a well-known passage Job hints at such a sequel: "Yet as for me, I know that my Redeemer is living, and after this He shall arise on the soil; and behind my skin I will stand erect, and from my flesh I shall perceive Eloah" (19:25,26).

That Job longed for a message from God which gave meaning to his trial is clear. The very longing helped him endure. And in the end, when Yahweh Himself does speak to Job (chapters 38-41), such a sequel of good is grasped by this troubled man, who now declares, "With the hearing of the ear I had heard of You, but now my eye sees You" (42:5).

SALVATION

All along Job had pleaded for a word from God. When it came it was not what we might have expected. But this was long before Christ came and died for the sake of sinners, and long before the evangel of salvation in Christ could have been made known. Nevertheless, it was a powerful and effective message to Job and quieted all his cries.

In His answer, Yahweh turned the tables on Job and asked him a number of questions. "Where were you when I founded the earth?" (Job 38:4). "In all your days have you ever instructed the morning?" (38:12). "Do you give the horse its mastery?" (39:19). Perhaps the most telling of these appeared after Job was completely silenced in the early part of chapter 40. We might condense this final series of questions as follows: "Do you have an arm like El's? . . . Then even I Myself shall acclaim you, because your right hand has brought salvation to you" (40:9,14).

The forceful irony of this question sums up the divine revelation. Job could not save himself, but the One Who has that arm of power which Job lacked, He can and does bring salvation.

James saw the consummation of Job's trial as coming from the Lord, but also, apparently, in response to Job's endurance. Yet James did not see, or at least did not draw attention to the hidden operation of God in and with the trial. 1 Corinthians 10:13, however, shows that the endurance of Job was in itself a gift given by God. Under grace, we may see Job's endurance as sustained by the faithfulness of God as He made Himself known to Job. This endurance in hope was vindicated by Yahweh's revelation of Himself as Cause and Provider of everything in the universe, from climatic conditions to the stars of the heavens, from the weakest and most ignorant of beasts to the most powerful. All that exists must be traced to God. Consequently it all lies under the disposition of His intention. There is reason and purpose for everything because there is God Who is over it all.

Yet while Job had a fervent hope that God was operating behind the scenes for a divinely perceived goal, and this hope aided Job in keeping him from despair, we are given assurance of expectation. We are told directly and without reservation that God is operating all together for our good (Rom.8:28), and the operating of His purpose is centered in Christ (Eph.1:9-11). In every trial we may be assured that God is making the sequel together with the trial.

Consequently, we rejoice with Paul that we stand in grace and "may be glorying in expectation of the glory of God. Yet not only so, but we may be glorying also in afflictions, having perceived that affliction is producing endurance, yet endurance testedness, yet testedness expectation. Now expectation is not mortifying, seeing that the love of God has been poured out in our hearts through the holy spirit which is given to us" (Rom.5:2-5).

Here we realize that the sequel that sustains us in trial is more than a hope for a consummation God has in view. It also consists of the expectation of that consummation and the assurance that God is able to bring us into that consummation, and not only able but will do so also (cf 1 Thess. 5:24). God is making the sequel to all that is troubling and disturbing in the current eon. Together with every probing that comes from the hand of God, He is making the outstepping, the sequel that will prove to make it all worthwhile, and not only worthwhile but of such value that we would not have had it otherwise.

NOW FAITHFUL IS GOD

Hence the spotlight shines on God. When we experience troubles, especially those inexplicable probings of human beings which, like Job's trials, cannot be easily traced to our own failings, as many as they may be, we do well to turn our full attention upon God. In this we find strength for undergoing the trial: "Faithful is God." Faithful is God Who will not leave us to be tried above what we are able to undergo. Faithful is God Who is making the sequel, the God Who is doing that which is for good. "Faithful is God, through Whom you were called into the fellowship of His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord" (1 Cor.1:9). "Faithful is He Who is calling you, Who will be doing it also" (1 Thess.5:24).

We may not ever see the sequel of a trial during our lifetime, but that is not the point Paul is making in 1 Corinthians. The undergoing of trials is not a matter of experiencing the sequel but of appreciating the fact that God is already making the sequel while the probing goes on. God is faithful in all that He undertakes.

But there is one aspect of God's sequel that we probably all experience even while the trial continues. That is the knowledge of our inability, and a deeper appreciation of God, Who Himself enables us to undergo the probing. Now thanks be to God, Who is making the sequel to every human trial, granting us endurance in expectation, through our Lord Jesus Christ. D.H.H.

EDITORIAL NOTES

In times of unusual stress and uncertainty, such as the present, we need all the more to be growing in the realization of God, for that is the channel of spiritual power "for all endurance and patience with joy" (Col.1:10,11). We are reminded of this again when our brother, A. E. Knoch writes: "I have ceased to expect full clarity of thought from anyone who does not bow to the absolute deity of God, without reservation or restriction" (p.99). Then again he observes concerning the present: "Things are wrong, and the wrongs are not being righted. It is only as we bring in God, and His activities in Christ, in the past and in the future, that all becomes rational and understandable and glorious. In His Beloved and through Him, He will fulfill all the beneficent designs which move His heart" (p.100).

GOD'S WILL AND INTENTION

In translating the ninth of Romans, verse nineteen, I felt almost as if the text before me was faulty. It should surely read, "who hath resisted His will?" Yet the word is not will, but intention. There seemed so little difference, at the time, that I did not appreciate the concordant rendering myself. Since then I have been most thankful for it. It helps to solve one of the deepest difficulties and contradictions connected with the place and problem of evil. To the question, Who hath resisted His will? we may answer, Many, if not all. But to the query, Has anyone withstood His intention? the reply is the opposite, for no one can thwart Him. Even when withstanding His will we are fulfilling His intention.

ROMANS NINE

There are not many passages in God's Word like the ninth of Romans. Seldom are we taken behind the scenes into the realm of the absolute. Much in this chapter seems to contradict other portions of the Scriptures, because they deal with processes, as seen by man, while this is concerned with causes, known only to God. God has a goal. In order to reach it He must have had absolute control from the beginning. All the intervening process, no matter what it may appear to be to men, must be the working out of His original intention. He is the great Potter. His creatures are clay. This is true only in regard to God's intention. Viewed in relation to His will they are not at all the passive material suggested by the clay. "You will not" (cf Matt.23:37) describes man's antagonistic attitude toward God's revealed will.

The case of Pharaoh is the classic example of the chasm between God's revealed will and His hidden intention. His revealed will was very plain. "Let My people go!" It seemed to be fulfilled in the liberation of Israel. But no one who reads the account and believes it can escape the conviction that God's intention included more than His revealed will, and that it involved opposition to that will. This much might be easily inferred if Pharaoh had been hard-hearted enough to play his part. It is put beyond doubt by the action of God in hardening his heart.

God's revealed will was limited to the release of Israel. His intention was to display His own power and glorify His name in all the earth. This is given us as a specimen of His complete purpose and of the process by which He will attain it. Mankind does not comply with His will; His saints do not comprehend His intention. Yet He uses both the opposition and the ignorance to effect His object. No doubt many in Israel were fervently praying that Pharaoh's heart would soon soften, and he would let them go. God's answer to their prayer was to harden his heart. They sighed for salvation. He wrought with a view to His own glory.

It takes little imagination to picture this scene. Its continuous repetition during the first three eons makes it most important to our spiritual welfare. The same conflicting forces are at work today. It is quite conceivable how the saints would have managed the affair. They would have implored Yahweh to compel Pharaoh to let them go. Perhaps they would call a grand prayer meeting for this purpose. Perhaps they would set aside a week of intercession. "We know not what to pray for" was as true of them as of us. Perhaps they would be "definite" in their petitions, and insist that He melt the heart of the king, and so remove his opposition.

How much there is of this today! Many brethren unite in great "world movements," seeking to soften the heart of mankind, trying to do away with sin, seeking to abolish the many evils that harass us, uniting against war and vice and corruption, for all of these are against the revealed will of God. These efforts, we are told, are practical. They are not mere theory, words without works. Of what use is such an article as this, for example, to stem the tide of iniquity? Using the same figure, I would advise all that the tide will become the highest in all history, and that no human effort will be able to stop it, for it is necessary to fulfill God's intention.

The Israelites hoped Yahweh would soften Pharaoh's heart. What they wished was to quietly slip out of Goshen into the promised land. They wanted none of the terrible signs. They did not ask for the passover. Surely they would not have entered the trap which threatened to destroy them. They did not ask for the miraculous passage through the Sea. The forty years in the wilderness was not of their choosing. The most illustrious epoch in their history was forced upon them. It was a continuous exhibition of disobedience to God's will. Yet who doubts for a moment that it was in line with His purpose?

GOD'S WISDOM AND POWER

Now that all is past and we can get a true perspective of these events, who would prefer to have Israel's prayer answered? It was not necessary to soften Pharaoh's heart. It was too soft already. If it had not been hardened the exodus would have been a flat, uninteresting story, with no outward manifestations of Yahweh's power of love. Its glory would be gone. Its God would be unknown. The wisdom and power of Egypt must be exposed by conflict with the wisdom and power of God. His attributes must be revealed by contrast with the mightiest and wisest of humankind.

The antitype of this marvelous period of Israel's history lies just before us, only the miraculous manifestations will be far more wonderful than of old. God is today hardening the world's heart in preparation for that epoch. Men are approaching the wisdom of ancient Egypt in their knowledge of nature, and are far surpassing it in power. Shall Yahweh weaken them before using them as a foil to display His might? Rather it is His wisdom to harden their hearts, so that, in opposing His will, they may fulfill His ultimate intention.

MAN'S WILL, AND GOD'S

Too often we are told that, if man has no free will, he is a mere automaton. This is a mistake. The so-called "freedom" consists merely in the lack of conscious coercion. Being ignorant of the constraining or restraining influences which determine his conduct, and altogether unaware of ulterior forces, he subconsciously yields at the very time that he imagines he is most independent. His freedom of will is simply ignorant unconsciousness or submission to environment or heredity.

In relation to the will of God, men are consciously independent. They can accept it or reject it, and imagine that no other force but the divinity enthroned within them has anything to do with their decision. But when we find the niche assigned them in God's intention they are (thank God!) the most utterly dependent slaves of circumstance it is possible to imagine. It will be found that, throughout their lives, they were not more masters of their fate than they were of the date and details of their birth.

The doctrine of man's free will peoples the earth with a race of puny gods. We object to the dual gods of Persia or the many deities of the Greek and Roman pantheon, yet these ancient pagans never rose to the absurdity of making every man a god. The possession of a free, untrammeled, unconquerable will is the exclusive attribute of deity. Only One God can possess it. Our blessed Lord Himself did not claim it. He came, not to do His own will, but the will of Him Who had sent Him.

ILLUMINATION OF DEITY

The failure to recognize both the divine will and the divine intention has led to incalculable confusion and misunderstanding. Those who reject God's intention rob Him of His godhood and deify man. Those who confuse His intention with His revealed will make of Him a love-lacking tyrant, a hard-hearted monster. Others, who wish to believe all the Scriptures have to say, are not clear how to harmonize His character, with the presence of sin, especially when it becomes evident that sin has a place in the attainment of His ultimate purpose.

All evil and every sin reverses its character completely when we take it from the limited light of God's revealed will to the universal illumination of His intention. This is the reason that we do not hesitate to believe the Scriptures that all is of God. No sin remains such when completely illumined by His intention. It is a failure, a sin, and subject to dire penalties when man commits it, but it is no longer a mistake when it finds its place in God's purpose. The same act which brings shame and dishonor on the creature, when subjected to the divine alchemy, is transmuted into a source of glory and peace to God.

Such general observations are apt to be dismissed as bordering on blasphemy. But let anyone take the great sins in the Scriptures and ponder all their aspects. Each one is essential to God's plan. But it is better to be specific. Pharaoh is the great sinner in this scene. He is the one who opposes God's expressed desire. Make him willing or compliant with God's command, and what is left? In that case God would have failed in His object. To avoid this He finds it necessary to stiffen the opposition. Yahweh hardens Pharaoh's heart in order that he may sin against Him! Some insist that God cannot have such a close connection with sin. They would prefer to fix the blame on Pharaoh, or on Satan. But, while Yahweh directly causes Pharaoh to sin, by doing so He Himself avoids failure of sin.

NEED FOR CAREFUL DISCRIMINATION

Any lack of discrimination when speaking on these themes is likely to cause confusion. The same statement may be both true and false. Two directly contradictory assertions may both be true or both be false, according as they are related to God's will or to His intention. A beloved brother, who had been meditating on these things, made the statement that Adam's "fall" was really a fall upward. I would strenuously object to such a suggestion, apart from explanation. Adam's sin and transgression and offense were very bad and degrading when viewed as disobedience to God's will. When associated with the work of Christ and God's ultimate purpose it was the very best he could have done. Even its immediate effects were not all evil, for he obtained a knowledge of good, impossible in his previous condition.

So with sin as a whole. We almost dread to speak of it in relation to God's ultimate, for few, even of His beloved saints, have seen behind the scenes, and almost any assertion would be false if related to His revealed will. Is sin good? No! It is the worst thing in the world. No words can express our horror and detestation of it. Is sin good? Yes! Not, indeed, in itself, but its effect will be beneficent beyond anything else this world can give, when combined with the mediatorial work of Christ and the reconciliation of which it is the occasion.

Perhaps this is why some beloved brethren insist that I teach that God sins, or is the Author of sin. I have never said this or even thought it, so far as I am aware. If I have unwittingly done so, I humbly retract and recant. But I am informed that various passages in my writings on this subject imply it, though they do not express it in so may words. When I review these passages, I do not see the implication. I did not intend such a thought. I did not express it. To my own consciousness, I did not even imply it. Some inferred from the apostle Paul's teaching that they should do evil that good may come. If he could be misunderstood, I count it an honor to be in the same condemnation.

But what is an implication? Is it not the result of combining what we think with another's statement? It is reasoning from two premises, one our own and one supplied by another. In its crudest form the argument may be stated thus: I believe that all is of God. My inquisitors insist that sin is part of the "all." Therefore, I believe that God sins. It seems very logical to them. I may object and say that I do not concur in their conclusions. I may even say that my premise is not mine, but God's. But no. My scheme is simply an attempt to exonerate Satan and prepare people for the homage which he will demand at the time of the end! Away with such a fellow from the earth!

This places me in a strange position. I cannot but consider their deduction a mistake in logic, a transgression of morals, and even an offense. In short, it is a full-orbed sin. I am eager to acknowledge, however, that it is of God. But even my small mind, weakened by overwork, and dulled by distress, has not the slightest difficulty in discriminating between the human and the divine aspect of these acts. God is making no mistakes. His servants are. He will justify their injustice, not because they are in line with His will, but because they are carrying out His intention. I have no hesitation in thanking God for this distressing antagonism, for I know that in His hands it is no error. Truth as this needs opposition for its development and dissemination. It takes friction to rub off the rust of centuries.

The difficulty seems to be that we cannot easily view an act from its moral character. We do not readily see that no act is sinful in itself, but in its relations. The act of plucking and eating fruit is not necessarily a sin. Yet it was humanity's primal error. The mistake lay in its relation to the God Who had forbidden it. If He had commanded it, it would have been commendable. Now that we know that it was essential to His intention, that He had provided for it before it occurred, that He arranged everything so that it should occur, we see that, though it was a sin in relation to His will, it was no mistake in view of His benevolent intention.

THE LAW

Perhaps the greatest example of the distinction between God's will and His intention is found in the law promulgated from Sinai. Yahweh made known His will in a complete code of laws, besides the condensed commandments which were carved in stone. The Jew, who was resting on law, is said to "know the will" (Rom.2:18). But if it was God's intention that the nation should keep the law, it certainly was a dismal failure on His part. They broke its greatest precept before it reached them.

But, though the failure of the law seems to be contrary to the will of God, it actually was a fulfillment of His intention. It was really given that "every mouth may be barred, and the entire world may become subject to God's righteous verdict, because, by law works, no flesh at all shall be justified in His sight" (Rom.3:19,20). The law which, ostensibly, was to deter from sinning, actually was given for the detection of sin. It was given to prove that no one could keep it. Beneath the revelation of God's will in it was His intention that it should not be kept, but should accomplish its object through its infraction.

"law comes in by the way, that the offense should increase" (Rom.5:20). How differently did Israel, at Sinai, feel about it! They were quite sure that they would greatly lessen the distance between themselves and Yahweh by their obedience to His precepts. Why had He told them what He wanted them to do and to avoid unless it was His will to carry out His instructions? The will of Yahweh was clear. But His intention was quite concealed. He could not make known His intention at that time without frustrating it.

SIN

This should help us in considering the larger question of sin. Sin is always against the revealed will of God. No one can possibly find any excuse for sinning so far as His expressed precepts are concerned. Both conscience and nature add their voice to restrain us from wrong. But we do sin. How can we be justified unless the sin is, in some sense, justifiable? We know that it is God's intention to draw His creatures into loving intimacy with Himself through sin and a Saviour. We know that the temporary term of sin will leave the world infinitely richer in the knowledge and appreciation of God. It will bring God immeasurable treasures of love and adoration. As a whole, its results vindicate its presence for a time. What is true of all sin must be true of every sin.

This truth is the foundation of the doctrine of justification. Because it has been lost, justification has also disappeared, or has been degraded to a pardon or an "imputed" fiction. Few believe that God actually justifies believers. They imagine He only alters the court records, so that no one can legally prove their guilt. It is of the utmost comfort and satisfaction to know that all that we have done is vindicated by the part it plays in carrying out His intention. Do not let anyone sell you an imitation justification! God's is the actual, the genuine, the precious reality.

THE CONSUMMATION

All that the usual theology has to offer us at the consummation, even in the saved, is a partial, patched, repaired and repainted universe. The song of the saints will be in a minor key, "I was a guilty sinner." Their joy will be clouded by eternal regret and shame for their part in the tragedy of the eons. The eonian times will be the eyesore of eternity. Oh! if they only had not been! And so will God's wisdom and power be questioned, and His glory dimmed, for He Himself must be the chief culprit in the collapse of His creation.

But away with such unworthy thoughts! The consummation will not reveal a patched, but a perfected universe. We will not be worrying about our past sins, but overwhelmed with God's wisdom and love in their vindication. Much as they distress us now, much as we fear them and avoid them and dread the very possibility of further sin, God will see to it that they will leave no stain, no blot to mar the bliss eternal, but will blend into His benign designs, and discover to a delighted universe the delicious depths of love which could not be displayed by any others device, or appreciated by any other plan.

This teaching is also the substructure for a mature experience in the things of God. It gives stability, a calm confidence in the face of the chaotic conditions which surround and engulf us. We are not worried, as once we were, by the awful opposition to God's will, nor do we fear for the fulfillment of His purpose. The flood tide of evil and sin, however contrary to His will it may be at present, is essential and indispensable to His intention and the ultimate realization of His will.

He is the great Alchemist Who will transmute everything into glorious gold by contact with the accursed tree.

THE DEATH OF THE CROSS
*
CHRIST, IN JUDGMENT AND SALVATION

Question:

Can you inform me as to the meaning of the word "cross" as well as concerning the meaning of the phrase "the death of the cross"? I have been told, since the common symbol of the cross is pagan and the Greek word translated cross does not actually mean cross but simply "stake" (without any crosspiece), that symbols of the cross should not be used and that even the word "cross" itself should not be used in reference to the death of Christ.

Answer:

THE Greek word translated "cross" is stauros, to which we have assigned the standard STANDer.[1] Stauros is apparently derived from stau, which was the name of an ancient Greek letter which "stood between" "E" (epsilon) and "Z" (zayta) and was retained as a numeral = 6.

The noun stauros ("cross," CV) is used simply of an upright pale or stake in the ancient Greek epic poem Odyssey (traditionally attributed to the ninth century B.C. poet Homer).[2]

1. That is, an upright device (see entry "cross," Keyword Concordance, p.63); cp the term "stanchion," in the sense of a standing support.

2. On stau and stauros: LIDDELL & SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON (New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers, 1850, p.1378; ref. Odyssey, 14, 11; cf Iliad, 24, 453).

While the verb stauroō ("crucify," CV), similarly, is used in early antiquity in the sense of "to fence with pales," the later use, as an instrument of death as in the New Testament and as corresponds to the modern "crucify," may be seen as early as the second-century B.C. in the works of the historian Polybius.[3]

It is evident, then, that by our first century A.D., the use of stauros for the Roman instrument of death by affixation to a wooden device, was well established. It spoke of a vertical-standing, fearful instrument of death, by affixation thereunto and hanging thereupon; but it said nothing as to the particular form of any particular stauros-instrument.

Under Moses' law, death was by stoning (e.g., Deut. 21:20,21; 22:20-24). Afterward, the corpse was sometimes hung upon a tree (Deut.21:22,23). This served at once as a warning to others (cp Joshua 10:26) as well as an especial mark of God's malediction ("one being hung is under a malediction of Elohim"; Deut.21:23).

This explains Galatians 3:13: "Christ reclaims us from the curse of the law, becoming a curse for our sakes, for it is written, Accursed is everyone hanging on a pole . . . ."[4]

The cross (stauros) is often called a "pole" (Acts 5:30; 10:39; 1 Peter 2:24). The Greek word here, xulon (WOOD), however, unlike the English "pole" which speaks of shape, refers not to the shape of the object, but to the material from which it is made. Thus, by means of the word xulon (WOOD), the cross (stauros) is connected with the Hebrew

3. THE VOCABULARY OF THE GREEK NEW TESTAMENT, James Moulton and George Milligan (London: Hodder and Stoughton, Limited, 1949, pp.586,587; ref. Polybius i. 86. 4).

4. "Pole" is one of the idiomatic variants used in the Concordant Version for the Greek xulon, for which we have assigned the standard WOOD. Xulon is "the solid fiber of the trunk and branches of a tree, after cutting, hence [is used] of many things made of wood" (Keyword Concordance, p.331).

Scripture concept of deepest humiliation and shame (cf Heb.12:2; cp Deut.22:23).

In the Hebrew Scriptures, we discover the awful associations connected with one who was hanged upon a tree. And, in the Greek Scriptures, we perceive something of the horror of the ignominious pain and shame of "the death of the cross" (Phil.2:8). Through a familiarity with these considerations, we begin to understand one of the reasons why the heralding of "Christ crucified" so thoroughly scandalized the Jews (skandalizō, SNARE; 1 Cor. 1:23), thus entrapping them in their snare of unbelief.

Crucifixion was originally an Oriental punishment. That is, it was practiced in the countries east of the Mediterranean or the ancient Roman empire. It was practiced by the Persians, the Phoenicians, the Carthaginians, and the Egyptians. Later, it was practiced by the Greeks, probably in imitation of the Persians, and by the Romans who likely learned it from their enemies the Carthaginians. Being mindful of its horror and tortuous nature, the Romans reserved it for slaves, for especially egregious criminals, and for provincials, deeming it too deep a disrespect to impose it on a Roman citizen.

"There were two kinds of cross [stauros]:

"(1) The crux simplex, which was a single stake. Sometimes the victim was fastened to it by his hands and feet, the former being extended above his head. Usually, however, it was a sharpened stake, and the victim was impaled upon it. It passed through the length of his body, issuing from his mouth.

"(2) The crux compacta [i.e., joined together], which was composed of two pieces. It had three forms: (1) The crux decussata [i.e., in the shape of an "X"] . . . . (2) The crux commissa [i.e., set together, at the start of the beam] . . . resembling the letter 'T' . . . . (3) The crux immissa [i.e., growing out, in the sense of 'above'], which had the top of the upright protruding above the transom, 't.' From the middle of the upright there projected a peg . . . on which to support its weight, the body rested as on a saddle."[5]

Since it is evident from the Scripture account that our Lord was not impaled upon a sharpened stake, and it seems unlikely that the less common practice of attachment by the hands and feet to a post was employed, it has generally been assumed that Christ was executed upon a two-piece device according to the most common prevailing custom, upon which the hands would be outstretched upwardly and then nailed to a crossbar or patibulum. Whether the terrible tool of death were in the shape of a 'T' or a 't,' there would have been room in either case for the attachment of the board inscribed with His name and accusation put up over His head (Matt.27:37).

Thus, by stauros, all that can be known is that it was a vertical-standing device composed of wood, which served as the means of execution. Since these fearful contrivances were fashioned in various shapes, and we possess neither declarative nor corollarial evidence of the shape of the particular stauros upon which Jesus was put to death, we therefore do not know its shape. We do know, however, that the word stauros does not speak of any certain shape, and therefore that it provides us with no evidence concerning this minor question.

Instead of giving undue attention to minutiae, we would instead center our thoughts on things of consequence, namely, upon the purpose and achievements of God as a result of the death of Christ and our justification "in His blood" (Rom.3:25; 5:9).

As to the historical issue of certain cross-shaped pagan images, let me say in reply that what pagans may have done with cross-like symbols before the death of Christ has nothing to do with how the Romans crucified people.

5. Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels, David Smith, edited by James Hastings (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1917, p.397).

It is well to become acquainted with the fact that various popular traditions such as the religious observance of Christmas or Easter are not to be found in the Scriptures. Indeed it is true that certain of the accouterments attending such traditional observances have been adapted from their earlier "heathen" connections and pressed into "Christian service." As is our own practice, if one considers such things unfitting, one may simply decline to incorporate them into one's own customs. We need not become preoccupied with such things and their perceived evils, nor should we make overmuch of our knowledge concerning them while diminishing much that is excellent in the faith and lives of many of those devoted to such enshrined traditions.

We have nothing to do with the customs of ancient pagans nor with any more or less t-shaped objects of veneration which some among them evidently possessed.

We would say, however, that a common symbol need not have a common identification. Further, the appropriateness or tastefulness of the use of any such "logo" is manifestly a subjective question. Certainly, in a particular culture, some might well and with a clean heart see fit to exhibit such an emblem of their faith, while others, equally sincere, might deem it inappropriate to do so.

Let us not confound the issue here, by confusing those who "venerate" or worship a cross with those who consider the cross as a symbol of faith in Christ, and so view it as a symbol of their own faith in Him accordingly. While it is not our custom to employ such a symbol personally or as a part of our ministry, we realize that many see fit to do so, and we see no reason to think less of them because of this.

Even though the meaning of the word stauros does not include the notion of "cross member," neither does it exclude it. The question is not, What was its import in the most ancient usage of this word, but, What is its essential meaning and what was its referential meaning in first century Palestine under Roman rule.

Of the latter there can be no question. There, the term stauros was used of the awful wooden instrument of death—whatever its shape—which served as the means of execution of convicted persons in the Roman world.

The learned definition of "cross" found in Webster's New International Dictionary is as follows: "A structure, typically an upright supporting a horizontal beam, anciently used in the execution of malefactors."[6]

Since this accords fully with both the New Testament usage of stauros as well as with the best historical records concerning crucifixion practices, it follows that the modern word "cross," rather than being a supposedly improper term that we should somehow repudiate, is instead the ideal word to use when translating the Greek stauros. Therefore, in speaking of the instrument of Christ's death, not only may we use the word "cross," but we may do so freely, without reservation.

Question:

I was always taught that Jesus suffered for our sins on the cross, bearing our sins away, so that we who believe would be saved. But if all will eventually be saved, why is there still a future day of judgment, a "day of indignation and revelation of the righteous judgment of God"? Concerning the judgment of that day, Paul says that "indignation and fury, affliction and distress," will come upon those "persuaded to unrighteousness," even "on every human soul which is effecting evil" (Rom.2:5-9). In a word, if Jesus suffered once for all, taking away the sin of the world, why should there be a day of judging and a second death?

I am struggling with the teachings in the last three chapters of the book of Revelation. It is difficult to square these chapters with a belief in universal salvation.

Also, if it is true that Jesus died for everyone and that everyone will be saved in the end, why, then, are only certain ones to receive an eonian salvation?

Answer:

In replying to your questions, I would like to begin by making a general comment regarding the last three chapters of Revelation, chapters 20–22. In fact, concerning salvation, it is no more difficult to square these chapters with a universalist belief than with a partialist belief.

Let me explain what I mean. You are correct that (a) there is nothing in Revelation 20–22 that teaches the eventual salvation of all. But I wonder if you have also noted that (b) neither is there anything within this section of Scripture which precludes the eventual salvation of all. Statement (a) and Statement (b) are both fully true.

Revelation 20–22 neither affirms nor denies the eventual salvation of all. It simply does not address the question. In fact, if this portion of Scripture were all that had been provided us concerning distant future events, we could neither say that all will or will not be saved. In that case, we could only say that we have no testimony either affirming or denying either proposition.

As far as the apostle John is concerned, he simply speaks of the second death; he does not address the question of whether there is any life beyond the second death for those having been committed to it.

But it does not follow since John does not address this question here, that neither does any other writer inform us concerning it elsewhere. Much less does it follow because John is not granted a vision of a day when those who had entered the second death will finally be delivered from it, that there simply is no deliverance from the second death.

Paul necessarily sees farther into the future than John; and, unlike John, Paul alone—to whom it was given to complete the word of God (Col.1:25)—deals with ultimate issues:

"For even as, in Adam, all are dying, thus also, in Christ, shall all be vivified" (1 Cor.15:22). The vivification of all, however, will occur in "classes": the Firstfruit of vivification is Christ Himself; thereupon, in due course, those who are Christ's will be vivified; and, thereafter, the consummation of the vivification of all will finally occur.

This will be whenever Christ may be giving up the kingdom (lit., the "reign") to His God and Father, whenever He should be nullifying all sovereignty and all authority and power. He will achieve this, since He must be reigning until He should be placing all His enemies under His feet. The last enemy is being abolished: death. And, this will occur, since He subjects all under His feet. Finally, "the Son Himself" also shall be subjected to God, "Who subjects all to Him, that God may be All in all" (cf 1 Cor.15:22-28).

It follows, then, that at the consummation, every person who entered the second death will be fully returned to life, but this time to unspeakably glorious life, in immortality and incorruption, no longer subjected to vanity but instead truly constituted righteous—vivified—fit for the indwelling of God Himself in such a way that He may be All in all.

From these considerations it follows as well that the apostle John's vision is one of an epochal period, not of endless duration. We know this simply because while John, in Revelation 21 and 22, speaks of the reign of Christ, of saints, and of kings of the earth, while affirming the presence of the second death, Paul, in 1 Corinthians 15, speaks of Christ reigning until He gives up the reign (the kingdom); indeed, of the time when all sovereignty and authority is nullified (which therefore includes that of both the saints and the kings of the earth), and even of the time when death itself is abolished, the glorious day when all will finally have that life of which Christ is the Firstfruit, all unto the end that God may be All in all (1 Cor.15:28).

SET FOR LIFE EONIAN; SIN, OFFENSES, AND ACTS

You also asked, "If it is true that Jesus died for everyone and that everyone will be saved in the end, why, then, are only certain ones to receive an eonian salvation?"

In reply, I would simply say that while the living God, on Whom we rely, is the Saviour of all mankind, He is especially the Saviour of believers (1 Tim.4:10). Eonian salvation is the "special" salvation granted to God's chosen ones, who are also graciously granted faith.

That is, to a very special extent or degree, the One Who is the Saviour of all mankind is also the Saviour of believers in particular, to whom alone, eonian life is given.

Here it is important to keep in mind that faith is the consequent gracious blessing given to those who are, first of all, chosen, foreknown, designated beforehand, and then, in due time, called and granted faith (cp Eph.1:4; Rom. 8:29,30,33; Acts 13:48; 1 Cor.1:24; Phil.1:29).

We are not told why we are chosen and others are not, with respect to membership in the ecclesia and the blessing of eonian life. We simply know—as concerns untold other things as well concerning which we are likewise not informed as to the particular "why" of things—that God has actually chosen (i.e., "willed") that things be as they are, not otherwise, to accord with His purpose (Eph.1:11).

We stand in awe of it all, relying on Him as the Almighty, trusting in His wisdom, goodness, and love.

Now, finally, let me address your primary concern, which you yourself summed up as follows: "In a word, if Jesus suffered once for all, taking away the sin of the world, why should there be a day of judging and a second death?"

I would first of all stress, since the Lamb of God did indeed take away the sin of the world (John 1:29), not only do we who are God's chosen one's not suffer for our sins, but neither does any one else suffer for his or her sins.

This, however, in no way denies the consideration—which is another matter—that in this life, "God's indignation is being revealed from heaven on all the irrever*ence* and unrighteous*ness* of men who are retaining the truth [i.e., whatever truth they do know] in unrighteousness." This is, "the retribution of their deception which must be" (Rom.1:18,19,27b). That is, God's "indignation" here is upon the irreverence and unrighteousness itself; a consequence of this, it is true, is that the effects thereof are experienced by those engaged therein.

This consequence, however, is not in the form of "maledictions" along the lines of the "curses" of the law. Instead, though often dreadful deeds do indeed result in present-day suffering, this is by no means always the case.

It seems evident that "the retribution of their deception" has both a subjective and an objective aspect. That is, we human beings are deceived and led astray both in and as a result of our deeds of irreverence and unrighteousness. If we were not already corrupted, we would never do these things; and, as those who have done them, we must also experience something of what God thinks of them, even if the penality here consists in continuing on in our darkness (which is by no means a trivial judgment in itself), whether or not it also includes consequent, corresponding suffering.

There are three terms to consider: (1) "sins" (which refers to one's failures; lit., "missings" of the mark); (2) "offenses" (which speaks of that which wounds the feelings); and (3) "acts" (i.e., actions, or "works," which speaks simply of deeds themselves, without, at least as such, noting their "missing" or "offending" aspects).

As the Lamb of God, the Sin Offering, Jesus takes away the sin of the world (John 1:29); and, God was in Christ, conciliating the world to Himself (i.e., uniting them unto Him; cp 1 Cor.7:11), which entails His not reckoning their offenses to them (2 Cor.5:19).

Therefore, men's ongoing practices in which they continue to miss the mark of God's ideals, and continue as well to be offensive therein, do not stand in the way of their salvation. In Christ, God has made provision for their needs concerning both their failings and the offensiveness thereof. Therefore, neither men's sin's nor their offenses inhibit their salvation: God has formed the decision (1 Tim.2:4) that all mankind be saved; and, in Christ, all shall be vivified (1 Cor.15:22).

These considerations, however, glorious and significant as they are, do not change the fact that God will bring every act into judgment (Ecc.12:14; God's "judgment," simply speaks of that which God decides to do or bring to pass). Now, in judgment, there are two grand classes of humanity: (1) vessels of mercy, and (2) vessels of indignation (Rom.9:22,23; it should be kept in mind that even the vessels of indignation will subsequently enjoy mercy themselves; cf Rom.11:32).

All God's judgments (i.e., everything that He decides to accomplish) are ultimately salutary and corrective. In judgment, in His judging of a part of mankind, God will display His mercy therein, according to His grace ("mercy" is the mitigation, or diminution, of the severity of judgment). And, in His judging of the remainder of mankind, God, Who is love (1 John 4:8; cp 1 Cor.13:5), in the person of

His Son, will assume the role (cf Heb.1:3) of One Who is indignant, thus manifesting a corresponding severity, with a view toward displaying His indignation and making His powerful doings known (Rom.9:22).

This is what God has determined to do, and He will do it. He has a purpose in it all, and that purpose is to glorify Himself and bless His creatures—to the degree and in the way that He intends.

In consideration of the second death, we need only note that it is not according to God's purpose for all to live during the eon of the eons, which is the final duration, prior to the consummation (it is this eon which is the object of John's vision of Revelation 21,22). It was not God's purpose for us to have lived in times of old. For such a long expanse of time, there was no life for us to be found. Similarly, then, even as we ourselves were not afforded life in millennia past, neither will the majority of mankind be endowed therewith during the eon of the eons.

But it is according to God's purpose for the day of judging to transpire subsequent to the thousand years, and yet prior to the eon of the eons. And, in that "day" (we do not know its duration, but take it that even if comparatively brief it will not be an insignificant period; cf Matt.12:42), the acts of the vessels of indignation will be judged; where appropriate, in severity. Following the day of judging, those brought forth for judging (cf John 5:29b) will be returned to death, being cast into the lake of fire: "This is the second death—the lake of fire" (Rev.20:14b).

We who are God's chosen ones, who are vessels of mercy, will enjoy eonian life until the consummation when we together with all mankind will enter upon the field of endless life which follows.

In closing, I would only declare, "Now thanks be to God, Who is giving us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor.15:57). J.R.C.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

WHEN Brother A. E. Knoch introduced his Studies in Colossians to the readers of this magazine he said they were dealing with an epistle that was "the very summit of revelation" (Unsearchable Riches, vol.31, p.1, Jan. 1940). In this way we also may look at Colossians, especially as it unfolds "the secret of Christ" (Eph.3:4) expressed there as the reconciliation of all through the blood of the cross of the Son of God's love (Col.1:13,20).

There was much unrest and disruption of political systems in 1940 in the initial stages of a great war. And we may say that something similar is happening today, although due to what Scripture would call "plague" rather than war. For the believers, eighty years ago, and for us now, Paul's letter to the Colossians (written nearly two thousand years ago), was, and is a powerful and consoling source "for all endurance and patience with joy" (Col.1:11).

In this issue the various articles, at one point or another direct us to Colossians 1:20. But more so, they direct us to the prayer of Colossians 1:9-11 which prepares the way for that summit revelation of Christ's exaltation, the reconciliation of all through Him. The prayer for the realization of God's will and growth in the realization of God is one for seeing Him more and more clearly as the Father of the Son of His love, Who wills with delight not only the reconciliation of all, but the blood of Christ's cross through which the all-encompassing peace is achieved.

Thus James Coram writes (pages 147-154) of the will of God as the determining factor in all that occurs, even the existence of evil (which is a temporary matter for ultimate and permanent good): "in the relative sense, many things are 'not of God,' for they are contrary to His preceptive will as well as to His callings (e.g., 1 John 3:10; Gal.5:8). But even these, absolutely speaking, find their source, means and goal in the counsels and operations of God" (p.154).

In growing in realization of God and of His will, we come to see that from creation to consummation He carries on His operations in and through His Beloved Son. Thus William Mealand writes, in commenting on 1 Corinthians 8:6: "Would we know God aright? Then we must take true measure of His love as displayed by Christ, for in Him such love is given its desired expression" (p.157). Indeed all is out of God, the Father, and all His Being is made known, and all His doing carried out through the Lord Jesus Christ. In this Christ is "the Complement of the Deity" (as A. E. Knoch points out on pages 160-166). He is not the Deity. "The title 'Complement' is Christ's because He brings all to a satisfactory Completion" (p.163).

Next comes an article entitled "The Love and Will of God" (pages 167-176) selected mostly from A. E. Knoch's writings. Paul speaks of God operating all in accord with the counsel of His will. And here too he directs our attention to the secret of God's will which accords with His delight (Eph.1:9,10). As companion letters, there is everywhere in Ephesians a mutually supporting connection with Colossians, which we do well to note, and as Brother Knoch so often observed.

As for my own articles on Colossians 1:19,20 (pages 177-191), they are based on a change in the CV rendering of verse 19, yet a change (I believe) that will enhance our appreciation of God's will, its counsel and purpose, and indeed its delight—that is, His delight that the Son of His love be His Complement; and His delight that all be reconciled to Him through His Beloved Son. May all the articles presented here comfort and console our hearts and strengthen our spirits in faith and love and expectation with growth in the realization of God. D.H.H.

ON THY ACCOUNT

WE TRUST this study will make it evident that traditional "free will,"[1] is unscriptural, but no more so than fatalism. Yet both these philosophies contain vital truth. Free will ideally recognizes the essential place of those things which are means to an end, and fatalism truly perceives that whatever God has appointed will surely come to pass, according to His own operations. Truth is not made the worse for the company in which we may find it.

Neither are we contending for any cold, secular determinism which knows nothing of loving design, wise direction and glorious purpose. We seek only to point the believer in Christ Jesus to the divine disposings, the gracious counsels and operations of his God and Father, that he may know Him, trust Him and rely upon Him:

"For I laid all this on my heart, and my heart saw all this: That the righteous and the wise and their services are in the hand of the One, Elohim" (Ecc.9:1). "Just as you have no knowledge what the way of the wind may be, Or how bones are formed in the belly that is full, Thus you can-

1. Traditional "free will," is sometimes called "mainstream free will." This is the notion of alternative possibilities in the sense that—not hypothetically but actually—in any certain point in time, even as in any given circumstance and particular state of mind, one might choose to do one thing or another thing. The unspoken premise here is that what one "chooses" to do is something that is ultimately under one's own control. It is evident, however, that any such power of ultimate control cannot actually exist. This is because either one chooses as one does due to something, or due to nothing. In either case, any fancied power of ultimate control is precluded, and therefore cannot exist.

not know the work of the One, Elohim, Who made everything" (Ecc.11:5). "Again I saw under the sun That the race is not to the fleet, Nor the battle to valiant masters, Nor even bread for the wise, Nor riches for the understanding, Nor even favor for the knowing, For season and mischance [or, 'occurrence'] shall happen to them all. For, moreover, a man does not know his season, Like fish that are held in a vicious weir, And like birds that are held in a snare, So the sons of humanity themselves are trapped by a season of evil, When it falls on them suddenly" (Ecc.9:11,12). "I applied my heart to inquiring and exploring by wisdom concerning all that is done under the heavens: It is an experience of evil Elohim has given to the sons of humanity to humble them by it" (Ecc.1:13).

Indeed, "According as it is written [Psa.44:22], that 'On Thy account we are being put to death the whole day, We are reckoned as sheep for slaughter' " (Rom.8:36).

"Account" is a variant of logos, LAY (say)ing; it is usually translated "word." The sense is, concerning the evils that attend our course, God has decided, and He has spoken, saying that this should be our lot, even if the particulars concerning the affairs of each person are far too numerous to record as part of His written Word. Indeed, "Who is this who speaks and it is coming to be, when my Lord did not instruct? Is not the evil and the good faring forth from the mouth of the Supreme?" (Lam.3:37, 38). "For, as the downpour and the snow is descending from the heavens, Yet it is not returning there, but rather soaks the earth, And causes it to bear and to sprout, So shall My word which shall fare forth from My mouth. It shall not return to Me empty, But rather, it does that which I desire, And prospers in that for which I sent it" (Isa.55:10,11).

It is on account of God that we experience evil, and, as surely as "sheep [are set] for slaughter," we will continue to be subjected to it. But this is only so that in the midst of our afflictions and sufferings we might find the assurance of God's love. It must be a vast love (cp Eph.2:4), full of patience and power, for the opposition is fierce and formidable. Though all manner of things threaten to separate us from Him and do their utmost toward that end, in all creation nothing is able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus, our Lord. In all our pains, "we are more than conquering through Him Who loves us" (Rom.8:37). As good as it is to "conquer," it is far better to be inseparable from the love of God.

When we are conformed in character to the image of God's Son and given a glorious body even as His own (Rom.8:29; Phil.3:21), it will be a great understatement to say that we have conquered our failings and overcome our afflictions. As good as it is to meditate upon the marvelous and total victory which lies ahead, it is even better to meditate upon God's present love for us and what this love portends. His grace upon us consists of far more than the eventual defeat of Sin. Its riches are to be found in a realization of His love. Since God is able and since He loves us, "neither death nor life, nor messengers, nor sovereignties, nor the present, nor what is impending, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Rom.8:38,39). Through Him Who loves us, we are "more than conquering"; we are loved.

GOD HAS MADE US

Most believers seem to realize that at least the rest of creation never comes into existence, and can never be sustained, except according to divine providence. Yet if men and their ways were somehow an exception to this, we might never have been born at all. The "possibility" of our having been generated by chance is even far more remote than the absurd fantasy that, "Given enough time and typewriter ribbons, a roomful of monkeys could both create and type out the Encyclopaedia Britannica." It is vital to recognize that "Yahweh, He is Elohim; He it is Who has made us, and we are His" (Psa.100:3).

Left to the winds of chance, we could never have become "pre-expectant in the Christ," and destined to be "for the laud of [God's] glory" (Eph.1:12). We could never have become ourselves, with all the countless things that make us unique, except through our own actual parents, and through that unique begettal, in all its details, which resulted in our birth, to say nothing of all that has happened since. The truth is, most do not even realize that God is their Creator, much less the Creator of evil. They merely think He created all the natural processes which made their life "possible," and then left whatever might happen to freewill chance.

HONORABLE DEEDS AND DIVINE PROVIDENCE

The truth of our words is well represented in the following popular claim: "My parents, even as all of their ancestors before them, 'chose' to have me—or at least they could have chosen not to. No one had to be conceived. Otherwise, there would be no honor in the bed of matrimony or dishonor in adultery."

Such words, which are most persuasive to those attuned to the world's ethics, are actually altogether foolish. In response we can only say, "Let no one be deluding himself. If anyone among you is presuming to be wise in this eon, let him become stupid, that he may be becoming wise, for the wisdom of this world is stupidity with God" (1 Cor.3:18,19).

Such claims can never be maintained. For the determination of what is honorable or dishonorable is not to be discovered by the supposed relationship between human actions and free will, but by ascertaining what God has said is right and what He has said is wrong, according to His revealed, preceptive will.[2]

Even this changes in many ways, depending upon the divine administration under which we are living. It was not wrong for the people of Israel to omit performing those things which were only given through the apostle Paul many centuries later. And it is not wrong for us today to refrain from doing many an external thing that brought dishonor and severe judgment to the transgressor of the law of Moses. For he was under the law of Yahweh, and subject to its curses. However, for ourselves, "Christ reclaims us from the curse of the law, becoming a curse for our sakes" (Gal.3:13).

Though we are not lawless people—we are not without God's law, His rules of action for us (1 Cor.9:21)—nonetheless we are not under law at all, but under grace (Rom. 6:14). Therefore we are certainly not under the law which God gave to Israel through Moses. To be "under law" is to be subject to the lordship of Sin and Death (Rom.6:9,14), because of one's having committed a violation of law. For "sin is lawlessness" (1 John 3:4), and the "ration of Sin is

2. In Scripture, the reference of any certain occurrence of the phrase "the will of God," is evident either from its context, or in the nature of the case. Any particular usage of this phrase seems to always have in view either what we may term, "the will of God, preceptive," or "the will of God, decretive."

The preceptive will of God, consists in the precepts, or instructions, which God has decided, or chosen, to enjoin upon us for our obedience. Such passages point us to the will of God, good and well pleasing and perfect (e.g., Rom.12:2; cp 1 Thess.5:18).

The decretive will of God, is the will of God with respect to what He has decided, or chosen, should exist, occur, or come to pass. Such passages reveal the divine plans, those things which God has purposed to happen or transpire. God is operating all according to the counsel of His own will. Concerning all things, He has decided what should occur. Consequently, He acts accordingly, operating all, causing everything that happens to come to pass (Eph.1:11).

death" (Rom.6:23a). But, "Sin shall not be lording it over you, for you are not under law but under grace" (Rom.6:14). For ourselves, "now the consummation is life eonian." For "the gracious gift of God is life eonian, in Christ Jesus, our Lord" (Rom.6:22,23).

The unbelief of the Jews remained a dishonor to them, even though they were unable to believe (John 12:39). Yet to the chosen ones, "according to the foreknowledge of God" (1 Pet.1:1,2), who were believing "through the grace of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 15:11), was "the honor, yet to the unbelieving: . . . [the dishonor of being those who rejected Christ] who are stumbling also at the word, being stubborn, to which they were appointed also" (1 Pet. 2:7,8). Their stumbling was to be accounted for by their being stubborn, yet they were appointed to this by God (cf Isa.6:9,10; Rom.11:32).

It is hardly to the dishonor of a woman of the most excellent virtue and strength of character that she is unable to engage in base, sordid acts. She cannot choose them, for they are abhorrent to her. Likewise, the vile, wicked acts of those "that do not stop from sin" (2 Pet.2:14), who love unrighteousness and commend the unclean, do not become any less abominable because they are but flesh, and the flesh is not able to be subject to the law of God (Rom.8:7).

Apart from God's all-encompassing operations, any number of things might have hindered either the beginnings of our life or its continuance at countless points along the way. Consequently, we thank Him for our life and breath and all. It is far from ideal to think of ourselves, more or less, as self-made men. For it is not our name that is to be glorified but His. To be faithful, our prayer can only be that our God should be fulfilling every delight of goodness and work of faith and power in us (2 Thess.1:11). Prayer must never be based upon the proud sentiment, "Help me, but not too much, for I still want some glory of my own."

It is God Who fulfills all that is good in us. As the Lord Jesus said of Himself, "Now the Father remaining in Me, He is doing His works" (John 14:10). For ourselves as well, then, it can only be thus, "so that the name of our Lord Jesus may be glorified in you, and you in Him, in accord with the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess.1:12).

INTERCONNECTION AND DEPENDENCY

Not realizing that God's creation of evil is a righteous creation for the good of all and for His own glory, many express shocked disbelief when hearing us say that it is the work of His hand. Yet their unbelief concerning His creation of evil distracts them from facing the fact that neither do they believe that He is the Maker of good, certainly not in man's personal character and well-being, since these, indeed, depend in such great measure on his own choices, and yet it is insisted that nothing at all, certainly not God, causes him to choose as he does. Therefore, notwithstanding its followers' best intentions and outward forms to the contrary, traditional Christianity has largely become an "a-theistic" religion. For the realm of Chance is under the direction of no one at all.

Christianity often represents itself as if it were dualistic: "God only makes good, the Devil makes evil," only to turn about and become polytheistic: "Where you spend eternity is 'up to you.'" It likes to pretend to be monotheistic: "God is the sovereign Lord of all"; but in the end, proves itself, practically speaking, to be atheistic: "Man, even as God, possesses free will [that is, the power of contrary choice], and is not caused to behave as he does."

Nonetheless, if God had not caused someone to bring the evangel to us, or if we had died prior to such a time, we would hardly have been in a position to believe, or to do anything else. Yet, as history and universal experience have shown, things quite inconsequential in themselves have often altered the subsequent course of men's lives in far-reaching ways. This principle of interconnection and dependency is true of all things and at all times, though it should spread to concern itself with multiplied trillions upon trillions of details throughout all time.

The secret of God's will (Eph.1:9) is "to have an administration of the complement of the eras, to head up all in the Christ . . . in Whom our lot was cast also" (Eph. 1:10,11). This reminds us of Proverbs 16:33: "It is the lot that is cast forth in the bosom; Yet from Yahweh is its every judgment." That is, the determination of our destiny, and the destiny of all, is entirely in the hands of God. This is the very point of the figure, "in Whom our lot was cast also." God appoints His Son "enjoyer of the allotment of all" (Heb.1:2), and "Head over all" (Eph.1:22). And when God heads up all in Christ, all will find their allotment in His allotment. None will receive anything but what is first of all His. Truly, all is of God.

However, relatively speaking, many things are "not of God," for they are contrary to His preceptive will as well as to His callings (e.g., 1 John 3:10; Gal.5:8). But even these, absolutely speaking, find their source, means and goal in the counsels and operations of God. "Let all the earth fear Yahweh; . . . For He spoke, and it came to be; He enjoined, and it stood firm. Yahweh, He annuls the counsel of the nations; He repudiates the designs of the peoples. The counsel of Yahweh shall stand for the eon, The designs of His heart for generation after generation" (Psa.33:8-11).

It is true that God's preceptive will and counsel can be repudiated, indeed this is usually the case today. But it is just as true that His decretive will and counsel shall stand. "All My counsel shall be confirmed, And all My desire will I do" (Isa.46:10b). It will come to pass, on account of Him.

GOD AND CHRIST

To us there is one God, the Father, out of Whom all is, and we for Him, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through Whom all is, and we through Him. (1 Corinthians 8:6)

How simple yet sublime a creed is expressed in this lucid utterance! It touches head and heart alike, gathering up in one grand pronouncement statements in similar strain, which reveal the conception we should cherish of God and Christ.

Faith to live upon must ever be linked with intelligence. There must be grasp of truth in ways which bring God and Christ rightly before our minds. And in such an epitome of faith and truth the apostle Paul conveys much. It is like looking at a great picture in which all details of form and coloring conspire to the effective wealth of the whole. Orderly design is blended with living warmth, and the grip of its conception grows upon the gaze. The more we look, the more we see.

And so, in this fine and forceful language, intensity of gaze brings out beauty upon beauty for the joy and peace of belief. In the opening pronoun we not only become sightseers, but recipients. For "to us," creatures of a brief and checkered day, as to this earth life, is given the glad knowledge which lifts us from the welter of gods many, and of lords many.

"To us there is one God, the Father." What self-interpretation! "One God, the Father! How much is enshrined in the thought! Towering far above the wisdom of continents, the lore of sages, all that meets our need as erring children is resident in the words.

"One God." And to us, as to Israel, comes the great declaration, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord" (Deut.6:4).

Then comes all the tenderness and wealth of the words, "The Father." "The Father." Therefore, a Son. One upon Whom to lavish all that a father truly finds it in head and heart to bestow. And even in our weak conception of the filial relationship there come glimpses of its outreaching greatness.

But we are always learning, and ever to find that the divine constructions placed upon the word are fully borne out by faith's experience. And, as the massive, basic support of all that this may mean, we read farther, that it is "the Father, out of Whom all is."

Creation, of which we are but frail yet precious units, not only out of God august, omnipotent and supreme, but forth-flowing even out of the Father, and that through the beloved one Lord, Jesus Christ. Think of it! All that God, the Father, would fain reveal in the holding of such a title, such a relationship, poured out in and through the Son of His love.

Is God love? Has He shown it? Let us mark the words. It is not only that out of Him "all is" but that through the Son, "all is." So, through the one Lord, Jesus Christ, is the ebb and flow of that great stream of life we call humanity. And not only humanity, but all intelligences which are out of God—all, all are through Him.

There is the going forth of the wonderful, throbbing creation, still God's creation, in spite of all its shame and tears, its tarnished glory. And then the sweet and glowing return. "We for Him." "We through Him." Thus we live, move, and have our being for God, and it is "through Him," Whose pre-eminence is so signally graced throughout the ages. And this "precedence of all" is the great pledge of fulfillment of the words "for Him." He stands first, bearing in His gracious pre-eminence the potentiality which reaches out to the utmost bounds of time and space.

Let us take in the full force and meaning of such precedence, and the stupendous possibilities of Christ's coming forth out of God. The sweetness of our meditation of Him will be enhanced, too, as we discern the beautiful character of the filial bond. In terms of simple grace and truth Christ emphasizes this again and again.

Said He: "I came forth and am arriving out of God" (John 8: 42).

"The Father is loving the Son and has given all into His hand" (John 3:35).

"The Father is fond of the Son, and is showing Him all that He is doing" (John 5:20).

Do we not see in these statements the magnitude of the Father's love? And the Son is the recipient of its highest charges, the One through Whom they will take effect. And the Sonship reflects the Fatherhood. The triumph of love waits on both.

Christ's arrival out of God stood for complete manifestation of God's love. He came forth vested with all its grand essentials to fully accomplish the purpose of it. And it is the love as thus shown, that we must always look at when we consider the character and destiny of this, our sphere. Men generally, and some believers, too, are so readily apt to associate events with an issue of their own calculation. To such, love is not the persistent, pursuing and permanent thing which lies back of all that is and shall be. Yet this is the love which inheres the filial tie in the relationship of God and Christ.

Would we know God aright? Then we must take the true measure of His love as displayed by Christ, for in Him such love is given its desired expression. The phrase immediately preceding Christ's great title as the "Image of the invisible God," is that sweet, alluring sentence, "the Son of His love."

Never was there such Sonship, as never such Fatherhood. In the depth of each sublime quality lies the assurance of creation's high destiny. Absolute perfection pertains to each. From start to finish, love is the presiding element. Right to the end of an infinite purpose this love flashes forth via the Son. Not intermittently, like the flashing of those publicity signs we often see, but with permanent luster. There is no break. Hence the beauty of Peter's words, "Whom, not perceiving, you are loving, in Whom, not seeing at present, yet believing, you are exulting with joy ineffable and glorious."

Via the Son. He Who could say with such fervency, "My Father," "My God," thus passing to us that blessed right. Moment by moment He lived in the sweetness and strength which dwelt in the words. They empowered Him to empower us. Note how the spirit of sonship breathes through the intercessory prayer of our Lord, as set forth in John's account.

The dignity and preciousness of our own position as "among the celestials," is foreshadowed in the glorious language which graced the lips of Christ, "I in them and Thou in Me, that they may be perfected in one, and that the world may be knowing that Thou dost commission Me and dost love them according as Thou dost love Me" (John 17:23). And into such an affinity and fondness are we brought by the will and designation of God.

Even so, are "we for Him." And then, as Paul so aptly puts it in Romans eight, "God is for us." God for us! Could words be more heartening? Yet, at times, how long it takes us to realize them in the value they possess. How long to find sanctuary in "the love of God in Christ Jesus." And then, in quietness and confidence, are we indeed "more than conquerors through Him Who loves us."

THE CHANNEL SUPREME

Through Him, the Channel supreme, God is for us, and we for Him. Such are the simple but glorious dimensions of our faith. "One God, the Father, out of Whom all is." What scientific or philosophic phrase could convey so much? It is the last and best word on Creator and creation, linked as it is with the harmonious language, "one Lord, Jesus Christ, through Whom all is."

And we? How great our place, how meet our praise! O that in all He came first, as befits His precedence of all. Then indeed, through Him, should we realize how much we are for God. We should thus be growing in the realization of God, and in the giving of thanks to the Father.

And being more and more "for Him," we should become "imitators of God, as beloved children, and be walking in love." And it is a great thing to display to others the manner and attitude which we know God so faithfully displays to us. What honor, too, is conferred upon us by the injunction!

God and Christ. Father and Son. Did we but imitate God more as Father, through Christ, the Son of His love, we should be more capable in the expression of our faith, both for ourselves and others. And we should maintain the dignity of our calling, for as members of the body of Christ we have a position to maintain. To this end may the greatness of our faith, as enshrined in the words we have studied, keep us more completely and satisfyingly under the sway of the spirit.

"For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor messengers, nor sovereignties, nor the present, nor the future, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus, our Lord."

THE COMPLEMENT OF THE DEITY

THE greatest need to an understanding of such themes as "the deity of Christ" is a concordant vocabulary. The Authorized Version (and the Revised to a lesser extent) has so thoroughly juggled the essential words that it is foolish to expect clarity from their use. The subjoined concordance of the special terms used is given, not to clarify, but to show the source of the confusion. The word "Godhead" is freely used of terms which should be distinguished. Very few who use the terms "deity," "divinity," "divine" and Godhead, can give definitions of them sufficiently exact to keep them distinct.

theios, adjective

Acts 17:29 that the Godhead is like unto gold or silver or stone 2 Pet. 1:3,4 According as his divine power hath given unto us . . . that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature

theiotês, noun

Rom. 1:20 his eternal power and Godhead;

theotês, noun

Col. 2: 9 in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily

Careful analysis and investigation has revealed the fact that English possesses close equivalents for each of these Greek words. We have the terms divinity deity, as well as divine. In view of the supreme importance of this theme, it seems inexcusable to use one vague, misleading, obsolete compound for all three Greek words when appropriate English expressions were constantly being used in theological literature. We will now give the concordant renderings of these words in their contexts, so that everyone may judge for himself of their suitability.

theios, divine

Acts 17:29 we ought not to be inferring that the Divine is like gold, or silver, or stone
2 Pet. 1:3,4 So has all of His divine power . . . been presented to us . . . that through these you may become participants of the divine nature

theiotês, divinity

Rom. 1:20 For His invisible attributes are descried from the creation of the world, being apprehended by His achievements, as well as His imperceptible power and divinity

theotês, deity

Col. 2: 9 Christ, for in Him the entire complement of the Deity is dwelling bodily

Concerning the meaning of divine, the adjective, there can be no question. It may be used of power, of nature, of objects of worship, even of idols, which are supposed to be like that which God is. Paul did not speak to the Athenians about a "Godhead" of which they had never heard. He had never heard of it himself. He objected to the pedestals of stone, and the statues wrought with precious metals, which they thought God-like or divine. These things are not like God. They are not divine.

The English word "divinity" is particularly well suited to the context in Romans. There is a broad scope about it which accords well with the glimpses of God we get in creation. In it we learn of His imperceptible power and divinity. Everywhere in nature are evidences of superhuman attributes, beyond the powers and comprehensions of His creatures. We see a Divinity in nature and a Deity in revelation. This is the force which divine usage gives to these words. Let us not use them in any other sense.

The third word, "deity," is specially before us in our present considerations. The single occurrence is sufficient to fix its meaning clearly. It supplies a term greatly needed in this discussion. It is not applied to Christ. It is applied to the Deity Whose complement He is. So far as the revelation of Himself is concerned, the Deity needs a Complement, an Image, a Word, a Mediator, to make Himself known. Christ is the Complement Who fulfills these functions fully. The entire complement of the Deity dwells in Him in bodily form.

Christ is not the complement of Himself. He is not engaged in revealing Himself. He acts for Another. That Other is termed "the Deity" in contrast with Christ. To say that the fullness of the Deity dwells in the Deity is not only unscriptural but an affront to the spirit of a sound mind. Outside of Christ there is a Deity. Inside of Him is the complement of this Deity. For the purpose of revelation, so far as our senses are concerned, Christ is that Deity. It is His function to show us the Father. Yet, in so doing, He distinguishes Himself from His God, Who is here given a special term belonging to Himself alone. It will greatly aid us if we also confine the term "Deity" to the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, and refrain from applying it to our Lord.

It will be seen from this that it is entirely inadequate to call Christ "divine." This means no more than God-like, which, in some measure, characterizes all His works, and may be used of any of His operations and attributes. He was indeed divine, but in a sense so superior to others that the adjective holds Him down to their level instead of exalting Him to God's. Similarly, there was divinity in all His deeds, but here also, He surpasses the best that is conveyed by the term. The Scriptures use this term of that which is seen in creation, apart from Christ. Hence confusion is easily introduced by speaking of the "divinity of Christ."

The term theotês, deity, however, is used by God in expressing the relationship between Him and His Christ. God claims it for Himself and denies it to His Son. It is the inspired term to note the distinction between them. The plerōma, the complement of the Deity dwells bodily in Christ. If He also were Deity, then we would have the useless assertion that the complement of the Deity dwells in the Deity, and we take away all reason for the existence of Christ, making Him identical with His God, and of no real use in the revelation of the Deity.

THE COMPLEMENT

The title "Complement" is Christ's because He brings all to a satisfactory Completion. But the final phase of God's purpose has been hid from Christendom, so that the creation manages to bring millions of sentient beings into existence, not for their own happiness or the glory of God, but for their unending torment and the eternal disgrace of the Deity. Any philosophy based on the creeds of Christendom must lead to desperation and insanity. Even when death is made to end all, oblivion is no jewel in God's crown, and is no rational apology for creation. Reason and revelation demand that God be glorified, that suffering receive a satisfactory explanation, and that a completed, not shattered universe crown the efforts of Deity and the intervention of His Anointed.

Perhaps the greatest treasure of which the saints have been despoiled is the reconciliation of all. Almost precisely the same words as are used here in Colossians 2:9 are used to introduce this glorious truth in 1:18-20, ". . . that in all He may be becoming first, seeing that the entire complement delights to dwell in Him, and through Him to reconcile all to Him . . . ." It is because He is God's Complement that all will be reconciled. If He does not reconcile all, then all will not be complete and He is not God's Complement. The full force of "complement" is denied by nearly every saint who bears His name. Only a tiny remnant dares to acknowledge Him as God's Complement. It is a jewel of far more value than any gem in any diadem of any potentate of earth.

TRADITIONS OF MEN

"The deity of Christ" is a mischievous phrase, made by man, intended to glorify Christ, but used as a shibboleth to indict all who will not bow to man's dictum. It is the fruit of ignorance and tradition, and few who use it or who seek to impose it on others are able to give an accurate idea of what it conveys. Used in opposition to the error which makes Christ a mere man, it may be temporarily condoned, but as a positive statement of faith it is out of accord with the Scriptures, a mere human invention, without any claim on our faith, and destructive to a clear understanding of the glories of God and of Christ.

The strength of Trinitarianism lies in a naive assumption that one who rejects it must necessarily go to the opposite extreme, and be a Unitarian. It is taken for granted that, if the Son of God is not, in every way, coequal with the Father, He must necessarily be nothing but a descendant of Adam. Thus Scripture is ruled out altogether, for in its pages is not a single text for either position. Therein Christ is God's Image and man's Saviour, God's Word and our Redeemer. He is subject to the Deity, yet Lord of all creation. The unique glories of Christ have been eclipsed by both sides of this controversy, each forcing Him to one extreme or the other, when He belongs between, and can lay His hand on both God and man.

The name "Unitarian" is not unscriptural, and some who claim it may not degrade Christ to the level of humankind, but only insist that there is but one God, as Scripture emphatically declares. But, now that it is represented by an organization with a creed which practically rejects the supernatural, it is not at all applicable to those who believe in monotheism yet do not drag our Saviour down from His high honors. It is to be regretted that an expression which is Scriptural should become the symbol of much that is not of God. But Trinitarianism is a term which has no place in God's vocabulary, either in intent or fact. The number three is carefully kept from all contexts which concern the Deity.

Seeing that the thought of the Trinity is absent from God's revelation and is only derived from it by a process of inference, it has been found necessary, not only to prop it up, but continually to guard its supports. In addition the word has been invested with a superstitious sanctity, so that it is more sacred than the Scriptures themselves.

Trinitarianism rests, not on the utterances of God, Who alone could have revealed it, but upon the consensus of evangelical creeds, the credulity of good and learned and honored men. It is significant that no argument for the Trinity seems satisfactory to those who propose it. They nearly all fall back upon the fact that it has prevailed ever since men ceased to depend on vital contact with God's Word written, and substituted for it the condensed formulas which could be mumbled by any unbeliever, and which have become the backbone of nominal and apostate "Christianity."

The Fundamentalists boldly and blessedly support the teachings of God's Word concerning creation. But with regard to faith in the Deity, what men have evolved from the Scriptures appeals to them far more than the sacred text itself. They cannot understand how a sane man cannot see God in nature, while they themselves fail to give His Word the supreme place in their theology. Being champions of the Bible, they subconsciously include in it the acknowledged creeds and popular interpretations. Let the Fundamentalists and Evangelicals openly declare that their creed is not essential, but only God's Word is fundamental, and they will break down the barrier that holds back God's most abundant blessing. GOD'S DWELLING PLACE IN SPIRIT

The entire complement of God is the family described in Ephesians 2:20, which, in verse 16 of chapter 3, is shown to consist of "every kindred in the heavens and on earth," for all are portrayed as being named after Him. It is God's aim, which He will undoubtedly fulfill, to become, in fact and in acknowledgment, the Father of all. We are already acknowledging Him as our Father, but are we grasping the truth that we should even now be exhibiting those traits of character which are agreeable to the statement that we are "being built together for God's dwelling place, in spirit"? We are indeed the firstfruits of that wider complement of God which is being built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, and of which the capstone of the corner is Christ Jesus Himself, in Whom the entire building, being connected together, is growing into a holy temple in the Lord. Are we perceiving its breadth and length and depth and height? Are we understanding that the whole desire of God for His creation is stemming from the love which is constantly welling up within His own heart? And in all this, are we discerning the love of Christ as well? The two are distinct, though complementary. But if the love of Christ is so great as to be "knowledge transcending," how are we to measure the love of God Himself? Obviously we cannot, but we do know that He is able to do superexcessively above anything that we are asking or apprehending.

John H. Essex

THE LOVE AND WILL OF GOD

GOD, Who blesses us with every spiritual blessing among the celestials, Who chooses us in Christ before the disruption, is "in love designating us beforehand for the place of a son for Him through Christ Jesus; in accord with the delight of His will, for the laud of the glory of His grace, which graces us in the Beloved" (Eph.1:5,6). In this rich revelation we find the basis of all our blessing in the love and will of God. His love predestined us to sonship, His will is to display that love by an exhibition of His grace, possible only through the disruption and the entrance of sin. We were in the Son of His love in the beginning, according to His purpose, we are in the Beloved through the grace glorious which now graces us in Him.

IN LOVE

God begins all in love. The very universe was created in the Son of His love (Col.1:13-16). If the eyes of our hearts were open to this great truth, we could not help seeing that His goal must consist in the display of His affection. We would not be blinded by the intermediate processes, but recognize that these are the necessary background for its revelation. God is love, hence He must commence and consummate all in love, even though the path between is wet with weeping and hard with hatred and dumb with dread and death. Love is the root and love is the fruit of God's whole purpose. Let us, who are privileged to enjoy a taste of its entrancing sweetness before the goal is gained, look back to its inception, and fix our hearts firmly in that primeval plan.

All this is Godlike. It transcends our human ways and thoughts. Man knows little of what he is about, and he does not understand, far less control, the process. The future is hid in darkness. Whence he comes or whither he goes he knows not, neither does he know the way. But, with God, the end was the beginning. The final outcome determined the commencement and the course of its accomplishment. If He is to end in being beloved by all His creatures, He must begin in love. The substratum of every step He takes, no matter how it may appear on the surface, is love. It is not simply the silver lining of the cloud, the ameliorating circumstances which attend evil, but the burden of woe is itself imposed by love, for a time, in order to procure its own appreciation, when it is removed.

THE DELIGHT OF HIS WILL

The word "will" has been hardened by opposition. It suggests stern inexorable adamantine determination. But, before there was aught to clash with it, God's will had no such iron aspect. Then it was immersed in love. Its decrees were its delight. As the servant of love it determined that its master should not only be known, but should receive the heartfelt adoration of all who were the objects of its affection. God's will does not delight in its power or inevitability, but in the fruit of His favor. It seeks the laud of the glory of His grace, which graces us in the Beloved (Eph.1:6).

No epistle is so full of grace as Ephesians. It not only begins and ends with grace, as most of Paul's epistles do, but strains the capacity of human speech to express its lavishness. Romans presents salvation through grace (Rom.3:24; 4:16; 11:6). Ephesians goes further, and presses salvation in or for grace (Eph.2:5,8). This is not in the past for the sinner, as most versions suggest, but the grace which is the result of being saved. It is the vast storehouse of grace on which we may draw at any time. The forgiveness of our offenses is in accord with the riches of His grace (Eph.1:7). Our future will display its transcendent wealth (Eph.2:7). Thus the eons will be dazzled with its glory.

The grace glorious has two distinct aspects, deliverance and dominion. From the lowest place in the universe the saints are taken and raised to the highest in this administration of God's grace. Sinners from the depths and darkness of divine displeasure are exalted to the highest pinnacle of His favor. From being a curse to themselves and all who came near them, they are transformed into a blessing to the utmost bounds of God's creation.

THE SECRET OF HIS WILL

At present most of God's creatures are out of harmony with Him. He is either unknown, ignored, or defied. The ideal relationship with God is well expressed by the word "complement." We should combine with Him to make one harmonious whole. All that is in Him should find a response in us. There should be such mutual reciprocation in every relationship of life as will be most delightful to both. As Creator we should take our place as His creatures. As Father we should be His beloved sons: He the Reconciler, we the reconciled. He the Deliverer, we the delivered. But, more than this, we are accorded a place with Christ in His work of revealing Him to the celestial hosts. It is only as we ourselves are filled with His affection that it can overflow to others.

HIS GLORIOUS RICHES

No epistle in the Scriptures is so full of harmonies as Ephesians. There is a continual assurance that each phase of our blessing is in accord with all the rest. Our sonship suits the delight of His will (1:5). The "forgiveness" of our offenses is raised on the scale to harmonize with the riches of His grace (1:7). The secret of His will is consonant with His delight (1:9). Our predestination is in unison with His purpose (1:11). Paul's dispensation agrees with God's grace which, in its turn is attuned to His powerful operation (3:7). The insight of the celestials is in line with the purpose of the eons (3:11).

God's riches are glorious. In these last days riches have increased. There are many men of vast wealth, and fortunes have been amassed which are amazing. Great as is their material magnificence, they are sadly lacking in moral glory. Much of our unrighteousness and crime is connected with money. It occasions far more misery than it alleviates. In general, riches are a menace to society. Yet all will acknowledge that wealth has power. It is fast becoming the paramount force in human affairs. It overrides social prestige and political influence. What could we not accomplish with an unlimited command of means! Yet one thing cannot be bought by all the wealth of all the world. That is love. God's wealth alone has the moral glory that influences the affections.

Outwardly we may be as weak as Timothy, with his frequent infirmities. We may be clothed in rags and live in the meanest of shelters. There may be nothing to indicate that we are rolling in the real riches. This wealth is not for the outer man at present. It is spiritual, and for the spirit. It is for the man within. Men behold the external appearance, God looks on the heart. Through His spirit our hearts become the habitation of Christ. This is the ground of our strength, for our vitality and stability depend upon the apprehension of God's love which has been poured out into our hearts through His holy spirit (Rom.5:5). As a plant seeks its sustenance and strength in the soil, so we should search for our sustentation and support in the subsoil of God's activities, the fact of His affection. We can flourish in no other ground. Here alone can our roots find nurture and our trunk find strength. Both of these are necessary for fruit, such as love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control (Gal.5:22).

CHRIST'S UNIVERSAL HEADSHIP

To those in the embrace of the glory of His grace, God makes known the secret of His will to have an administration of the complement of the eras, to head up the universe in the Christ (Eph.1:9,10). He presses Wisdom and Prudence, with all the resources at their command, into the service of this great secret. Christ has many eonian glories. This is the highest of them all. He is the Son of Adam, the Son of Abraham, the Son of David. He is the King of Israel, the Owner of the land, the King of kings. All of these glories are not only confined to the earth, but find fulfillment in the day of the Lord. They do not enter the final eon, when, as the Son of God, He administers the whole universe.

The clearest intimations of the eon after the day of the Lord found in the Old Testament may be summed up in the statement that, in that era, Christ will continue to reign over the earth, even after His priestly functions vanish. The secret here revealed also definitely assigns Him the headship over the earth, and consists in enlarging the scope of His reign to include the heavens (Eph.1:10). Christ is to be the Head of the universe! That Messiah's rule included all the earth was a secret the initiates have known from early times. To be with Him in this earthly Kingdom was the high hope He put before His own. Even Paul, at first, had looked for this earthly paradise. But now, as we have seen, he longs for blessing in the heavenly spheres. His hope is no longer fixed on earth, but among the celestials.

It is not possible that there can be a blessed place, anywhere, apart from Christ. Our hearts have no heaven but where He is. So it is essential, at this point, to insert this secret of Christ, lest it seem that we are exalted and He is left beneath upon the earth. If our blessings are among the celestials, if we are to reign in regions supernal, it follows that these are beneath His sway, for we have naught without Him. Before this, God's revelation was confined to the earth. There was no necessity for revealing His higher glories, for His saints were not partakers in them. Now that our destiny is celestial, we are entrusted with a secret so staggering, so superb, that few of His saints have ever heard of it, almost none believe it, and these are unable to measure or even imagine its immensity.

Christ will be Head, not on the earth alone, but over the highest heavens. His sway will include the vast universe in its embrace. The heavenly realms, which men are only beginning to explore, will all be beneath His pierced feet. Look with me, on some dark night, into the starry sky and behold a few of His domains. Come with me to the desert and see them double their number in the clearer air. Join me on yon mountaintop and peer through the greatest glass that man has made to search the star-strewn firmament. A thousand times as many stars swim past our wondering gaze. But mortal eyes are far too weak, even with the greatest of telescopes. Let us allow the stars to set their seal upon a photographic plate. So many millions more appear that our spirit falls upon its face in awe, for we have begun to glimpse the grandeur of His celestial kingdom.

The headship of Christ must not be confounded with His salvation. The rule of our Lord should never be confused with reconciliation. Universal reconciliation cannot occur until He abdicates the throne. His headship ceases when He hands over the Kingdom to God the Father. The universal sovereignty of the Son of God precedes the consummation. Universal reconciliation follows it. His headship is in the last eon. Reconciliation does not become universal until after the eonian times are past. The complement of the eras lies between the judgment era of the great white throne and the close of all the eras, for it must be the last.

The word plêrōma is somewhat difficult to translate correctly. The usual rendering of the Authorized Version is fullness. But it never denotes the state of being full, but rather, as they have translated it in its first occurrence, that which is put in to fill up (Matt.9:16). It is that which fills, or the complement. The eras of human history will some day fulfill their cycle. The final era, which completes their number and rounds out their ministry, is characterized by the rule of one Man over the whole universe. He Who descended into the lowest depths to save, ascends to the highest place in order to rule.

It is worthy of note, in passing, that the Circumcision epistles never mention a plêrōma, for their ministry was not final. Paul speaks of the complement of the nations (Rom.11:12,20), of love as the complement of law (Rom. 13:10), of the ecclesia as the complement of Christ (Eph. 1:23; 4:13), of Christ as the complement of God (Col.2:9) and of all else (Col.1:19). Only in Paul's epistles do we find God's work brought to final fullness. He alone adds the finishing touches. These are indicated by this word plêrōma, or complement.

The only indication of this era we have in the Old Testament is that rule, the reign of Christ and His saints, is to continue further than the priestly millennial reign. Priesthood is only for olam ("forever"). Kingship is for olam va ad ("forever and ever"). This is in exact accord with the clearer details given us in Revelation. There we find that the reign of the saints as kings and priests is limited to the thousand years, (Rev.20:6). They still continue to reign in the next eon, but there is no temple and no priesthood. This is the complement of the eras. The throne of God and the Lambkin is upon the earth. John has no vision of the heavens. It is a secret reserved for Paul and the celestial saints. We have no part in the new Jerusalem. Our portion is in the high heavens.

From our present viewpoint we are apt to get a most distorted view of God's dealings in the eonian times. We look back at almost seven and a half thousand years of human history and find it written with tears and blood. We look forward hopefully to a thousand years of bliss for suffering mortals, but even that blessed era will close in revolt and fire. Is this the full cycle of the eras? Has God accomplished all He set out to do? Has man been fully tested? Mankind has fully manifested its sin. We are satisfied on that score. But we are not sure that Christ has done all that He can do. He is a Man, and as a Man we are sure that He can bring humanity to the very summit of perfection. This He does not accomplish in the day of the Lord. Hence this is what is before Him in the day of God, which follows it.

How long will this final era be? There is no definite revelation given to us. We feel sure that the thousand generations of which the Psalmist speaks (Psa.105:8) must be within the eonian times. This would give the eons a period of at least twenty thousand years. Perhaps it coincides with that great astronomical cycle, the precession of the equinoxes. That would be about twenty-four thousand years. During this period the sun seems to shift its crossing of the ecliptic, through all of its signs. In twenty-four thousand years the polar star seems to make a complete circle. If the eonian times are so long, we have only begun them, and there will still be nearly sixteen thousand years left at the end of the millennium. This leaves a long, long time for the final eon, the era which completes the cycle.

There is no such thing as chance in God's sight. A lottery, in Israel, was not an appeal to blind fate, but to Yahweh.

We who believe, in this present era of grace, were taken by lot to share the celestial honors of our Lord. When the yearly meeting of farmers occurred in each community in ancient Israel, they divided into groups, and first of all the allotments were divided among the heads of these groups, who allotted them to the others. We belong to Christ. He is our Head. He has been allotted the heavens: our lot is cast in Him.

THE COUNSEL OF HIS WILL

Yahweh had counselled with His people Israel concerning their blessing and destiny. It was quite clear even to the apostle Paul that he would have his place in the earthly Kingdom of which the Hebrew prophets and our Master Himself had spoken. How could he look forward to aught else but what Yahweh had revealed? But now, without explanation, his blessing and destiny both are changed. What right had God to make this alteration? Did He confer with Paul about it first? Did He consult anyone affected by it? We may be sure He did not do it without competent advice. But to whom could He go? Who was able to advise Him? No one! So He takes the counsel offered by His own determination. In this crisis He retires into the privacy of immanent and absolute deity and bases this fresh departure on the immutable sovereign will which underlies every activity in the universe.

How Godlike is this thought! He does not apologize to Paul. He does not even explain. Why should He? He is the Deity. He does what He wishes. Notwithstanding appearances, this is precisely what He is doing everywhere and at all times. He is not hindered by His own revelations. He is operating the universe in accord with the counsel of His own will. It always was His intention that Paul (and we) should be associated with Christ's heavenly headship. And it was His will that this should be kept secret until Israel had been thrust aside. To Paul, to us, He wishes to be known as the only and absolute Deity, Who is working our welfare even when we are not aware. He would have us trust in Him, not merely His promises.

THE WISDOM OF GOD'S WILL

God's will is sourced in Himself, and is determined by what He is. As He is essentially Light and Love, it is His will to reveal Himself, especially His affection. As no other motives can change this, His will is constant and His purpose immutable. As He has all power, nothing is able to thwart His will. But, as He has all wisdom, and revelation is best accomplished by the use of opposites, He uses darkness to reveal the light, evil to give the knowledge of good, and hate to impart a comprehension of His love. These temporary intentions seem to oppose His will, but must eventually serve in fulfilling it. Then there will be no night and no more doom, and all will be reconciled to God.

THE LAUD OF HIS GLORY

The revelation of God is a synonym for His fame or glory. What He does is so marvelous and what He is is so wonderful that no glory could exceed His unveiling. Let us not be satisfied with a knowledge of His acts, or an acquaintance with His ways. These are but the pathway to a knowledge of Himself. Let us go on until we no longer "stand on the promises," but rest in God. Hitherto God had stressed His ways and words and demanded faith in their fulfillment. Now He makes known His secrets, which deal with previously unknown activities. From these we learn His inmost motives, and we learn the great lesson of the eons, to trust all to Him. The future, beyond the consummation, is unknown. But the God of the post-eonian eternity we know, and that is all we want to know!

GROWING IN THE REALIZATION OF GOD

We have reprinted A. E. Knoch's Studies in Colossians in this volume of Unsearchable Riches. These were originally published some eighty years ago, based on the Concordant Version as it existed at that time, which was principally translated by Brother Knoch. The translation is excellent, and the studies very insightful, well worth sharing again and again, for they point to a highly important and relevant portion of God's Word for us. And they do so in a way that speaks truly to both our minds and hearts. For example:

"All that God does is done in love" (p.59).[1]

"Creation was not an independent act, without any relation to subsequent developments. On the contrary, it was logically the result of God's purpose which could not be fulfilled until the far future. Creation is, indeed, the prelude to reconciliation" (p.60).

"In the cross we see the utter worthlessness of man as well as the supreme exhibition of the love of God. Reconciliation is effected by the revelation of God's love in the deepest display of human hate" (p.69).

ALL THAT GOD DOES

Creation in the past and reconciliation in the future. And in between the cross. These three acts of God are the critical points of all His doings. They are carried out in love. Creation is an act of God's love. Reconciliation is an act of God's love. The cross is an act of God's love. My existence is an act of God's love related to the act of creation. My future is to be one of reconciliation and peace, which will come about as God's doing, in and through the Son of His love, in creating me in Him and reconciling me through Him, through the blood of His cross.

"In [the Son of His love], the Firstborn from the dead, through the blood of His cross, God is completely equipped to consummate the purpose of love, and bring every enemy back to His bosom, not only saved but reconciled" (p.63).

COLOSSIANS 1:3-20

With these most critical acts of God in mind, creation, the cross and reconciliation, let us look at Colossians 1:3-20 again, with a change of wording in verse 19 from that given on pages 3 and 4 of this present volume of Unsearchable Riches:

THREE REALIZATIONS

Colossians begins with a prayer of thanksgiving (1:3-8) followed by a prayer of request (1:9-11), and these in turn open the way to the hymn of thanksgiving (1:12-20) divided here into two parts, the first concerning the Father, and the second the Son of His love. The prayers direct attention to the blessing of realization three times, First thanksgiving for the Colossians' realization of God's grace (1:6), second the request for them to be filled full with the realization of God's will (1:9) and third the request for their growth in the realization of God Himself (1:10).

The believer begins with the realization of God's grace. This is set forth most fully in Romans as the manifestation of God's righteousness in the gratuitous justification of the sinner out of and through the faith of Jesus Christ (Rom.3:21-26). For this we give thanksgiving to God.

PRAYING FOR REALIZATION[2]

Paul's prayer of request in Colossians 1:9-12 is for realization that directs our walk and our way of living. He requests God that we may be filled full with the realization of His will with all wisdom and spiritual understanding—not as an end in itself, but so that we may walk worthily of our Lord Jesus Christ for every act of pleasing, bearing fruit in every good work. This request is then expanded with the "and" of the last phrase of verse 10, Paul now requesting God that in filling us full with the realization of God's will, He may be giving us growth in the realization of God Himself! And this also is not an end in itself. Growth in the realization of God leads to our being endued with all (spiritual) power, in accord with the might of God's glory

2. Realization is a strengthened knowledge (ON-KNOWledge) that connects with some vital fact; it is often translated recognition in the CV (cf KEYWORD CONCORDANCE p.242).

(His glorious might). And even more than this, the realization of God builds up all endurance and patience with joy as we live our present lives in this world of darkness, that is, this world filled with ignorance of God.

How important therefore are these realizations. We do well to repeat Brother Knoch's comments: "Let us pray, then, that the saints may be filled with a realization of [God's] will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, for only thus can we walk worthily of the Lord for all pleasing, and bear fruit in every good work. Here it is not merely a matter of pleasing God or of doing good—we all may do that in some measure even in our ignorance—but of putting quality and flavor into our actions such as will delight God's heart" (p.52).

And again: "The latest revelations of [God's] will are especially adapted to display the excellences of the divine wisdom and love, so that all who realize His will will appreciate Him in the measure in which they understand it. As this is unfolded to our hearts we should grow in our appreciation of God, and thus approach the final goal ahead of others of His creatures. May God become All in us in increasing measure as we contemplate the secret of Christ, and see His hand and head and heart engaged in drawing His creatures to Himself through sin and salvation" (p.53).

Here certainly is power for all endurance and patience with joy.

THE HYMN

Thus Paul sings in a sort of double hymn, easily memorized, but in a form that is poetically condensed, first concerning the Father, then concerning the Son of His love. But all is for our realization of God and of His will. What is said about the Son in verses 14-20 is a revelation of God's love which is vital to our walk and for endurance and patience with joy, just as what is said about the Father in verses 12 and 13.

That we are having the deliverance and pardon of sins, in Christ, and that He is the Image of the invisible God, Firstborn of every creature, is no less a revelation of God's will for a realization of God than the fact that God makes us competent for a part of the allotment of the saints in light. It is God Who creates all in and through and for the Son of His love. So also God places Christ as the Cohesive Factor for all of creation, bringing all together harmoniously. As for us whom God already rescues in spirit out of the jurisdiction of darkness and transports into the kingdom of the Son of His love, in doing this it is God Who gives us His Son as our Head, the Head of His body, those called out for a special place as the complement of the One Who is completing the all in all (Eph.1:22).

In taking account of all this concerning the Son of God's love we are being filled with a realization of God's will and are growing in the realization of Himself. For it is His God and Father Who makes our Lord Jesus Christ Sovereign and Who rouses Him as the Firstborn from among the dead. It is God, out of Whom and through Whom is all in the absolute sense, Who makes known His love in granting to Christ First Place in all His eonian operations.

To be growing in realization of these glories of Christ is to be growing in the realization of God Who has purposed them and Who brings them about in operating all in accord with the counsel of His will (Eph.1:13).

GOD DELIGHTS IN THE SON

In Ephesians 1 Paul speaks of the delight of God's will in relation to our sonship (v.5) and of God's delight itself in relation to the secret of God's will to head up all in the Christ (verses 9 and 10). Now in Colossians 1 where Christ is identified as the Son of God's love (v.13), the verb "delights" is used in relation to the entire complement dwelling in Christ and all being reconciled through Him (verses 19 and 20).

In commenting on the words "the entire complement," Brother Knoch first writes: "In Him [Christ] the complement delights to dwell" (p.64). Yet he follows this with a review of those occasions in our Lord's earthly ministry when God directly speaks of His delight in His Son: "At His [Jesus's] baptism, when the heavens were opened to Him, the voice declared, 'This is My Son, the Beloved, in Whom I delight' (Matt.3:17; Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22). So again, when He was transformed on the high mountain, a voice came out of the cloud and testified to the delight of the Father in His Beloved (Matt.17:5; Mark 9:7). Peter reminds us of this in his epistle, and tells us that it brought Him honor and glory from God the Father (2 Peter 1:17). Long before Isaiah records the same fact (Matt.12:18; Isa. 42:1): 'My Beloved, in Whom My soul delights' " (p.64).

It is clear that whatever Brother Knoch understood by taking "the entire complement" as the subject of the verb "delights," he was not distinguishing this from God's delight for His Son in Whom the entire complement of the Deity dwells, and through Whom all is reconciled.

GOD AND CHRIST AS RECONCILERS

In his studies on Ephesians, commenting on the headship of Christ, Brother Knoch writes: "The rule of our Lord should never be confused with reconciliation. Universal reconciliation cannot occur until He abdicates the throne. His headship ceases when He hands over the Kingdom to God the Father . . . Reconciliation does not become universal until the eonian times are past" (p.172).

God as the Father is the Reconciler of all that is estranged from Him. He does this through His Beloved Son. But it does not become a completed and fully experienced achievement until God becomes All in all (1 Cor.15:28). The consummation is the viewpoint of Colossians 1:19,20. God is the Reconciler of the all.

In Ephesians 2:13-19, however, Christ is presented as the Reconciler of those afar (termed "Uncircumcision") and those near (termed "Circumcision"). So also in Colossians 1:21 Christ is seen as the Reconciler of us who once were, in our comprehension, estranged from and enemies to God. These passages do not speak of universal reconciliation, but of processes toward that goal. Colossians 1:19, 20, however, speaks of the goal. Consequently it speaks of God as the Reconciler, through His Beloved Son, making peace through His cross. Here God is the Reconciler Absolute, and His Beloved Son is the Channel through Whom God operates with delight in bringing all to this glorious consummation.

CONTEXT AND GRAMMAR

We have seen that in every way the context, near and far, supports the revised reading of Colossians 1:19. It is God, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who delights the homing of all that is needed to complete His purpose of love to be placed in Christ—in the Son of His love.

19 [t]For in Him [the Son of God's love] God [the Father] delights for the entire complement to dwell, 20 And through Him [the Son of His love] God delights to reconcile [a]all [io]to Himself (God [-]making peace through the blood of His [Christ's] [c]cross), [God reconciling the all] through Him [Christ], whether [c]those on the earth or [c]those in the heavens.

There remains for now a few comments on the grammar: The Greek verb in verse 19, eudokêsen, can be taken as it-delights, referring to "the entire complement," or He-delights, referring to God [or, the Father] understood from the context. English translations are about equally divided on this point, the AV, for example, inserting "the Father" as the subject of the verb, but the RSV having "the fulness of God was pleased." Throughout the hymn the identification of the pronouns He (or, it), and Him must be decided by the context and Paul's message as a whole. The first "Him" in verse 20 clearly refers to Christ and the second "Him" refers to God—"through Christ" all reconciled "to God." Yet, as now rendered in the revised CV (p.179), it is necessary in English to add a lightface "-self" to the "Him." This corresponds grammatically with Ephesians 2:15 ("that [Christ] should create the two, in Himself") and Philippians 3:21 ("the operation which enables [Christ] even to subject all Himself"). In these two passages the original texts of codices Alexandrinus, Vaticanus and Sinaiticus have only the personal pronoun "Him" as here in Colossians 1:20. But the CV has chosen to use the reflexive form ("Himself") as inserted in the margin of Sinaiticus by a later (often reliable) hand. Nevertheless, it is evident that the personal pronoun "Him" was sometimes used in the sense of "Himself" (cf Matt.6:19 where the pronoun "your" needs to be taken as "yourself" in English).

The revised reading is thus possible grammatically, and highly likely contextually. God delights to have the entire complement dwell in Christ, and He delights to reconcile all to Himself through Christ. In no way does this detract from the glory and honor of Christ (as presented, for example, in Ephesians 2:15 and Philippians 3:21). He is the One, and only One, in Whom and through Whom, and through the blood of Whose cross, God's purpose of love and delight is made known and is brought about.

D.H.H.

THE RECONCILIATION OF ALL TO GOD

ALL who are estranged from God will be brought into the enjoyment of that reconciliation and peace toward God which has been established through the blood of Christ's cross. This is assured in the words of Colossians 1:19,20:

19 [t]For in Him God delights for the entire complement to dwell

20 And through Him to reconcile [v]all [io]to Himself ([u]Making peace through the blood of His [v]cross), Through Him, whether [v]those on the earth or [v]those in the heavens.

A PIVOTAL POINT

This passage is a pivotal point in Colossians. It is the climax of that portion of the hymn of 1:12-20 which focuses on Christ as the Son of God's love, the Image of the invisible God in Whom God delights to have the entire complement dwell. As such Colossians 1:20 is vital for the realization of God (1:10) as He is revealed as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (1:3). It is also the major basis for our appreciation of the reconciliation God has made and for persistence in the faith day by day, as presented in the rest of the epistle. Colossians 1:19,20 cannot be passed over lightly. All believers should take this announcement of universal reconciliation very seriously and with the highest degree of optimism.

THE REALIZATION OF GOD

In Colossians 1:10, Paul prays for growth in the realization of God. The great impediment to this realization is the presence of sin and estrangement which keeps God's creatures at a distance from Him. It is in the removal of this estrangement that God makes Himself known to us, and this operation is carried out in and through His Son. Hence, Paul precedes his prayer for the realization of God Himself by reference to the realization of God's grace (1:6) and the realization of God's will (1:9), both of which relate to the death of Christ.

God's grace is made known to us in the evangel which declares that Christ dies for our sins, is entombed and has been roused (1 Cor.15:3,4). We all are sinners, being justified gratuitously in God's grace, through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus (Rom.3:23,24). In grace, through faith, are we saved, and this is not out of ourselves; it is God's approach present, not of works, lest anyone should boast (Eph.2:8,9). The evangel tells us that God gives and we receive. It declares that God acts and we are blessed.

God's will is similarly revealed in the message of Christ's death for sinners. God wills that all mankind be saved and come into a realization of the truth (1 Tim.2:4). Hence God counseled (intended) the death of His Son (Acts 2:23; 4:27,28), sparing Him not, but giving Him up for us all (Rom.8:32). Not only was this God's intention, but because of the glorious results of the cross it was God's will, as our Lord indicated in Gethsemane (Matt.26:42).

We cannot grasp the riches and power and glory of God's grace or perceive the righteousness and wisdom and love of His will as they are manifested in the death of His Son apart from seeing their results. His will involves the giving up of His Son to death in light of the good it would achieve (and it alone could achieve) not only for human sinners, but for all of estranged creation in blessing and realization.

In Colossians this evangel is expressed most strikingly in Paul's soaring hymn of praise in 1:12-20.

THE CHRIST OF COLOSSIANS

In this marvelous passage Paul sings of Christ, of Whom God is the God and Father, and in Whom all are reconciled to God. This hymn speaks of Christ in relation to God three times. First of all He is the Son of God's love (1:13). Then He is the Image of the invisible God (1:15). And finally He is the One in Whom God delights that the entire complement [of the Deity] should dwell (1:19), and through Whom God delights to reconcile all to Himself, making peace through the blood of Christ's cross.

Colossians 1:19,20 is the climax of this hymn. All else leads forward to this conclusion. Christ reveals God as the One Who brings estrangement and enmity and evil itself to an end by means of one astounding act at the cross.

THE IMAGE OF THE INVISIBLE GOD

As the One in Whom, through Whom and for Whom all is created (Col.1:16,17), Christ reveals the invisible God. In the work of creation Christ images God's power and intelligence. But until the cross He could not reflect God's love and His delight which shapes His power and which infuses His wisdom.

We cannot realize God as He is if we see Him only as a God of supreme ability and power. Christ as Creator mirrors God's power and divinity (Rom.1:20). We must also know the joy and peace that comes with a realization of God in reconciliation. Consequently, in His love for His Son, God counseled that Christ would not only be the Image of His hand, but also be the Expression of His heart's desire. In all things Christ becomes first (Col.1:18).

There are other powerful creatures, created in Christ Who is the Firstborn of every creature, who are referred to in verse 16 as "thrones, lordships, sovereignties and authorities." But they cannot reflect the love of God. Certain among them might be able to bring creation into an imposed order, but they could not gain what God wills for His universe in expressing the desire which is in His heart. The Image of the invisible God must be also the Son of His love in order to convey this love to all His creatures personally.

This Christ does for us already in spirit as the Head of His body which is that out-calling of human beings, chosen and called in grace, delivered from sin and death into righteousness and life by His death and resurrection. He also does this as Sovereign over all the powers of the universe, exalted as Saviour and Lord, in light of His obedience to the death of the cross (Phil. 2:8-11). And again He does this as the "Firstborn from among the dead," the One in Whom all who are dying will be vivified, He Himself leading the way (1 Cor.15:22).

Consequently, Christ is the Image of the invisible God, not simply by the work of creation itself, but also by bringing all of creation to its intended completion. This is the theme now of the dramatic, closing lines of the hymn.

IN WHOM THE ENTIRE COMPLEMENT DWELLS

The Son of God's love, the Image of the invisible God, is now to be seen as the One in Whom the entire complement dwells. It may have been that some people, known to the Colossians, were referring to spiritual lordships and sovereignties as the "pleroma" or complement of God. History records such a religious concept some years later, and the terminology used here suggests it was already appearing to the dilution of Christ's honors in people's minds.

Christ is the One and the only One in Whom the "entire complement" is making its home. In Colossians 2:9 we learn that this "entire complement" is the "entire complement of the Deity." It refers to that which makes God complete. God delights to reveal Himself in the fullness of His love in Christ as the One Who shed His blood at the cross for the reconciliation of all. As the One in Whom the entire complement [of the Deity] dwells, Christ becomes the Channel through Whom all is reconciled to God. In this, Christ makes God fully known and appreciated everywhere throughout the universe.

"AND YOU"

Paul has finished his hymn recounting the glories of Christ, ending with Christ as the One through Whom God reconciles all to Himself. Now he turns back to the "brethren in Christ" (1:2), and addresses us personally: "And you, being once estranged and enemies in comprehension, by wicked acts, yet now He reconciles by His body of flesh, through His death, to present you holy and flawless and unimpeachable in His sight" (Col.1:21,22).

Here, Christ is seen as the Reconciler, for our present reconciliation to God, in spirit, is part of the process toward the glorious consummation of the reconciliation of all.

All the requirements for reconciliation are accounted for. There is estrangement and enmity. That is the sorry but necessary contribution we have made to the process. There is the death of God's Son Who has come among us in a body of flesh like ours. And there is the God and Father of Christ Whose will and delight is to bring us to Himself, through His Son, in realization and appreciation of Himself.

What God intends the blood of Christ's cross to accomplish for all who are estranged from Him, He has already granted to us in spirit. What we have now is based on what Christ has gained for all. In seeing the certainty and the grace of this peace which we have received on the basis of Christ's death for us, and in "persisting" in this faith (Col. 1:23) we will surely be experiencing much of the peace of this reconciliation today. This is the basis of the believers' assurance and walk in these present times of uncertainty and struggle. We believe this evangel which says that God has doomed the estrangement of His creation to extinction through the death of His beloved Son. And in believing this our hearts are consoled (Col.2:2) and our faith stabilized (2:5).

PERSISTING IN THE FAITH

According to Colossians 1:23, if we believe that we have (in spirit) been delivered from estrangement and enmity by the death of Christ and have been brought into reconciliation by His blood, apart from our own works, and we persist in this faith, we will be experiencing much of this reconciliation even now. The evangel is full of riches of assurance. But the horror of unending torment or annihilation debilitates faith. And the view of God that such concepts demand constantly erodes the peace of reliance on Him and the assurance of His glorious delight in Christ that the evangel of Colossians 1:19,20 presents.

We cannot grow in realization of God's wisdom and power or His goodness and love if we suppose He is not able or not willing to bring all into that peace and happiness which the cross of Christ has gained. It is what such a tragedy painted by traditionalism says about God and the cross of Christ that should convince us that all passages of Scripture dealing with judgment and condemnation speak of temporary means and not everlasting states. There is no deficiency in the effectualness of the cross of Christ and no dualistic contradiction in the will of God.

Christ does die for all, and therefore all will be reconciled to God.

We are thanking the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ for the glorious achievement of His delight through the blood of Christ's cross. It is a triumph over our enmity and hostility, and that of all His estranged creatures, and it will be manifested in the deeply felt and fully appreciated reconciliation of all. D.H.H.

Concordant Version of the Old Testament

Over a century has passed since a "concordant version" of the Scriptures was first proposed by A. E. Knoch and Vladimir Gelesnoff. When the translation of the Greek Scriptures, or "New Testament," was then published in 1926, an announcement was made that work had begun on the Hebrew Scriptures ("Old Testament"). Now after all these years, with thanksgiving to God, we announce that the entire CONCORDANT VERSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT is now in print and available to order.

By analyzing the contextual usages of each Hebrew and Aramaic word, a single English word was first selected as its most suitable equivalent. Then, to achieve readability, some words were given a limited number of idiomatic variants that are harmonious with the sense derived from the investigations. English words used as the common translation of particular Hebrew words, and even idiomatic variants, were not used for other Hebrew words.

Boldface type was used for words (or even parts of words) having exact counterparts in the Hebrew. And lightface type was used for words (or parts of words) which were added to clarify the meaning of the respective word in the Hebrew text. In addition small symbols and abbreviations were inserted between or attached to words to represent omitted terms, to indicate grammatical features and the sources of emendations to the Hebrew text.

UNSEARCHABLE RICHES, FIRST QUARTER 2021
BEING THE FIRST NUMBER OF VOLUME ONE HUNDRED TWELVE

EDITORIAL

WITH this issue of our magazine we turn our attention to the book of Ephesians, which from the first issue one hundred and twelve years ago was, to A. E. Knoch, the focus of his attention and concern. It is an epistle of love delighting in secret surprises and gifts which gather grace "as they are undeserved and unexpected" (p.15).

It was given to Paul to dispense the evangel of the untraceable riches of Christ to the nations, and to enlighten all as to what is the administration of the secret which has been concealed from the eons in God. Yet this evangel is in accord with the gratuity of the grace of God (Eph.3:1-9). All that Paul makes known, including that which had been concealed from the eons in God accords with his previous dispensing of the gratuity of the grace of God. The transcendent riches of God's grace in vivifying those of the Circumcision and those of the Uncircumcision together, jointly, in Christ, and rousing us together and seating us together among the celestials in Christ Jesus (Eph.2:4-7) have their harmonious contact with the superabounding grace made known in Romans and the earlier epistles. And that grace as it concerns Jesus Christ, our Lord, is traceable to the law and prophets (Rom.3:21) while being a message "apart from law" (Rom.3:21). It is God's operation of love in and through the giving of His beloved Son that gives unity to all of God's Word.

Yet indeed Ephesians (along with its companion epistles) reaches to heights of God's grace and measures of His love that were unknown before, although preparations had been laid down for them.

Hence in taking the theme of "His Achievement Are We" (Eph.2:10), which flows from the fact that God is operating all in accord with the counsel of His will (Eph. 1:11), James Coram points to the basic issues of "faith, choice, foreknowledge, voluntary action, judgment and trials" (p.35), as they are dealt with throughout Scripture. But he does so especially in relation to "the evangel for today" which is the evangel of the grace of God, "through Jesus Christ's faith" (p.36).

Finally we reprint an abridgement of Brother Knoch's article, "In Grace and Out" (first published in volume 31, pages 137-148), which begins: "Grace is a fundamental characteristic of the present administration of the secret (Eph.3:2,9). It is the favor of the previous transitional era continued and intensified and enriched . . . . Grace, undiluted by law, unspoiled by works, unconfined by aught of man, is the fullest, freest outflow of God's essence, which is love" (p.42).

Here, as is fitting, much attention is given to Ephesians 2:5,8, where our salvation is twice located "in grace." Yet it was not given to our brother (or previously to me, or most others I know of) that Paul was referring to Christ's faith, not our faith, in verse 8. Thus we insert a lightface "His" in our revision of the CV (p.7). We are saved in God's grace (both superabounding grace as found in Romans, and transcending grace as found in Ephesians) through the channel of Christ Jesus's faith, and this whole operation of salvation is not of ourselves. It is altogether God's approach present. Regarding this, I hope, God willing, to prepare a defense for our next issue. It has become clear to me that Paul had in mind (and those receiving the letter) that the words "through faith" recapitulate the phrase "through Jesus Christ's faith" in Romans 3:22 (cp Rom. 3:26; Gal.2:16; 3:22, as well as Eph.3:12).

THE ADDRESS ON THE ENVELOPE

Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God, to call the saints who are also believers in Christ Jesus (Eph.1:1)

LOVE delights in secret surprises. Its gifts gather grace as they are undeserved and unexpected. This precious quality greatly enhances the riches of God's love. From its hiding place in the inmost recesses of His affections He has brought forth a surprise such as He only could have planned, so wondrous is the wisdom it reveals, so fathomless the affection it unfolds. Among the many secrets of Holy Writ we have chosen to meditate upon the one which most closely concerns us in this eon, that secret economy or administration which God concealed from previous eons in Himself, but which is now made known in the Ephesian epistle, by which the very heavens are apprised of the variety of God's wisdom, and the whole universe will yet learn the transcendent wealth which is found in His favor. The object of such love is love responsive. The secret that reveals the activities of His heart should kindle a kindred flame in ours, and lead to the adoration which is His due. This is the goal before us in these meditations. Let us not rest satisfied until the flood of His affection overflows our swelling hearts in appreciation and praise.

EPHESIANS 1:1

1 Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus through God's will, to all the saints ˙who ˡare also believers in Christ Jesus:

God has revealed Himself in many ways in His Word. The historic, prophetic and literary portions are usually in the form of short scrolls or pamphlets. His latest and highest communications have come to us in the form of letters, or, being formal and of a public character, epistles. When the postman brings a large stack of mail, we must first sort it out, if several receive their letters at the same address. Before we open it and read it we must make sure for whom it is intended.

In early days there were no envelopes, so the address of an epistle was always the burden of its opening lines. So the epistolary portions of the Scriptures are usually introduced by some specific indication as to the particular person or persons from whom the epistle comes and to whom it is to go. Peter and James are especially particular on this point. Paul always prefixes his name, and usually follows with the character he assumes in writing and a concise description of those he is addressing.

The name "Paul" has a strange sound to one accustomed to the Hebrew titles of so many of the ancient scrolls. Of course, Paul was an Israelite, like most of the other sacred penmen, but God changed his Hebrew name, Saul, to a foreign one, "Paul." This change was made at that crisis in his career when he was severed from his associates for a special ministry to the nations (Acts 13:2,3). Not only that, but the very first time that we read of the evangel being proclaimed directly to a gentile, not a proselyte, we are told casually that Saul "is also Paul." Furthermore this gentile was also called by this name, for he was the proconsul Sergius Paul. Still more significant are Paul's dealings with Elymas, the magician, who sought to pervert the proconsul from the faith. He undoubtedly is representative of Israel, and foreshadows the opposition to Paul's ministry for the nations. The climax is capped by Paul's miracle, so unlike his other gracious deeds. He brought blindness on the apostate Jew "until the appointed time." What a marvelous miniature of Paul's ministry! During Israel's blindness he brings salvation to the nations (Acts 13:6-12).

The name "Paul" is in full accord with his ministry. Though usually taken as a Roman name meaning "little," it seems far more likely that it is Greek, (though the Latin also had this root) from the element pau, meaning CEASE, from which our English word *pau*se is derived. His name should always suggest to us the pause in God's dealings with Israel, the interval during which the nation is blind, like Elymas, until the appointed time. How suggestive this is! Every time we attempt to enter one of Paul's epistles we are notified that what follows is to be applied during the period of Israel's blindness. And the fact that all of his epistles are thus marked, stamps them as one, and identifies them with this period, when God's grace goes out to the nations.

Paul introduces himself according to the character of the epistle. Is it concerned with service? Then he speaks of himself as a slave. Is it authoritative? Then he appears as an apostle. Where fellowship is the theme he associates others with him in his salutation. The Perfection epistles, Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians, are fine examples. As he alone is the authoritative revelator of the mystery, he presents his credentials in Ephesians as an apostle; as service and fellowship are uppermost in Philippians, he introduces himself as a slave, along with Timothy; as Colossians is concerned with correction and communion, he is again an apostle, along with Timothy.

The revelation of the secret depends on the authority of Paul as an apostle. There were not wanting those who questioned or denied his right to the title. He was not one of the twelve. He could not qualify for such a place. He did not become an apostle until after the main ministry of the twelve had been accomplished. The one who took Judas's place had to be taken from among those who had been with Christ all the time from John's baptism until His ascension (Acts 1:21,22). This was the one condition, and Paul had not been with Him at all. Moreover, his apostleship was based on the very reverse of this. It was necessary that he should not know our Lord until after His ascension, for he is the apostle of Christ Jesus, the glorified, not Jesus Christ, the rejected Messiah.

The title apostle has often been defined as "one sent." But it has not the usual element for send. This is pempō. Apostle is made up of two elements, apo, FROM, and stellō, PUT. Its literal meaning is to put some one at a distance, as a representative. Its nearest English equivalent is commissioner. An apostle was given a commission, with authority to enforce it. The commissions for the twelve were given them by the Lord while He was yet with them. Paul did not receive his from them or through them, but from the Lord Himself. The vast differences between his commissions and those of the twelve should show how utterly impossible it is that Paul should be numbered with the eleven.

Apostolic authority was by no means confined to the twelve. Among the Circumcision there must always be so many, and no more or less, for Israel's twelve tribe's call for twelve rulers. But no such condition determines the number of apostles among the Uncircumcision. Paul, however, is so great that he overshadows the others far more than Peter does his fellow apostles. Indeed, it is probable that, if we confine ourselves strictly to this final and culminating revelation of the mystery, Paul is its only apostle. Though Timothy is included in the salutation to Colossians, his apostleship is not recognized there. He is simply brother Timothy. And, now that the men have passed away, and Paul alone has left inspired epistles, he has become for us the one and only apostle, the only authority in doctrine and practice.

Repeatedly, Paul ascribes his apostolic office to the will of God (1 Cor.1:1; 2 Cor.1:1; Col.1:1; 2 Tim.1:1). None of the twelve do this. They were chosen by Christ in accord with the revealed counsel of God. Their commissions, their careers, all about them, was in line with Yahweh's promises in the Law and in the Prophets and in the Psalms. Some details and developments may have been secret, but their whole course was in keeping with a program previously prepared. One of the special points in Paul's call was that he should know God's will (Acts 22:14). This cannot refer to a knowledge of the Hebrew Scriptures, but to matters still unrevealed. It was Paul's special privilege to explore new and unknown fields of God's purpose. To be appointed an apostle by His will is suggestive of a fresh departure in the divine activities.

Thus far the writer of Ephesians has introduced himself. Now he writes the address on the envelope. When he indicates the destination of his letter, he characterizes those to whom he is writing. He sends it "to all the saints who are also believers in Christ Jesus." It is said that an expert can read the history of a man's health by looking at his teeth. So we can see the apostasy from Pauline teaching in the interpolations and mistranslations and interpretations of these simple words.

It is evident that the force of "being . . . in Christ Jesus" was lost very early. As is the case today in many quarters, the names and titles of our Lord had no special significance. Indeed, in the highest evangelical circles the irreverent use of our Lord's personal name is very painful to sensitive spirits. And how few would recognize the great distinction between "Christ Jesus" and "Jesus Christ"! Yet this is the whole point in this address.

All who are in touch with God are holy ones or saints. This is the most inclusive name by which they can be known. From Adam and Abel to the last to be called in the eons to come, in every era, and in all the various administrations, not only men but messengers, are called holy ones, or saints. When Paul wrote this epistle the saints were divided into two classes. One group, associated with the twelve apostles, mostly of the Circumcision and proselytes, were proclaiming Jesus Christ as the rejected Messiah. The other group, associated with Paul, mostly of the Uncircumcision, recognized His present heavenly exaltation, which is expressed concisely and forcibly in the title Christ Jesus. To this class this epistle was sent.

No more correct or concise direction could be given for the delivery of this epistle. It is not for unbelievers, but for saints. It is not for those in Jesus Christ, but those in Christ Jesus. Try as we will, we cannot find any better address for the envelope, even though we should add much to it. It is for some Jews and some gentiles, hence we cannot easily draw a line there. Though mostly for the Uncircumcision, it also includes some of the Circumcision. We cannot use this distinction. There is only one way to divide them, and that is their attitude toward Christ, as expressed in the two titles Jesus Christ and Christ Jesus.

Since the significance of the title "Christ Jesus" was lost, this sentence in the salutation has been beyond the apprehension of copyists and translators, hence they have tried to remedy the apparent fault. So the scribe of Alexandrinus, or some one before him, added "in Ephesus" in order to make sense. It is most likely that this epistle was sent to Ephesus as well as to all the Pauline ecclesias, and there may have been a tradition to that effect which led to the insertion of this phrase. But the character of the epistle is such that it is clearly a circular letter, one copy of which might be addressed particularly to Ephesus, but which is by no means to be confined to that ecclesia.

We are confirmed in this position by the fact that both Vaticanus and Sinaiticus, the most ancient of our manuscripts, were originally written without "in Ephesus." In Vaticanus someone has added it in the margin. It can be seen at the end of the third line of the center column, not far below the heavy ornamental bar which disfigures the upper margin of the manuscript. In Sinaiticus it is by a later hand. It is clear that the phrase ("in Ephesus") has crept in, and was not a part of the early texts, or of the original autograph. Only the difficulty of translating without it has kept it there. The critical editors usually put it in square brackets. A few mark it to be omitted in their margin. Hardly any hold with the so-called "received text" in retaining it without question. It should be omitted.

This epistle contains no local allusions. The apostle has no special place in mind. The theme is developed along the broadest lines. There are no special expedients as in Corinth, no corrections as in Galatia and Colosse. Every part of the epistle applies equally to all the ecclesias. It is of such a character that it could not be withheld from any saint in Christ Jesus, in any place or at any time. It applies to us today as fully as if we had just received it fresh from the pen of Paul.

This epistle was for all the saints in Christ Jesus. It should have been sent to all the saints who had come under Paul's teaching. It would not have been understood by any others. Since it was written for them, surely it must have been sent to them. Only some of these were at Ephesus. Others were at Corinth and Thessalonica and in Galatia, as well as Philippi and Colosse, wherever Paul and his preaching had penetrated.

We call it "Ephesians." As we need some name to distinguish it, this will serve the purpose better than any other because it has become inseparably associated with this epistle in all that has been said and written about it for centuries. So "Ephesians" it shall be, with the distinct understanding that this name is a mere expedient. If the title had not already been misappropriated we would suggest calling it Paul's General Epistle or his Perfection Epistle, as we have already used the plural of the latter phrase for Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians.

In the transitional era preceding the present secret administration of God's transcendent riches of grace, Paul wrote his epistles to the Thessalonians and to the Romans, the Corinthians, the Galatians, as well as his first letter to Timothy. The question arises, did the revelation of the secret in Ephesians and its companion epistles annul the previous revelation completely, and ignore its recipients, so that Romans to Galatians and Thessalonians are obsolete, or do they still stand just as they are, so that Ephesians is a mere addition to their message? Or is there a third course indicated, between these two extremes, their acceptance as a whole, yet with modifications in detail to accord with the later revelation? Is this epistle addressed to those in Christ Jesus to whom Paul wrote his previous epistles?

The third item of the secret settles these questions for us satisfactorily. We are joint partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus, through the evangel of which Paul became the dispenser (Eph.3:6,7). Note the past tense of became. It tells us that Paul is speaking of the evangel which he had preached. It is limited by the title "Christ Jesus" to that which is recorded in his previous epistles and does not include his ministry in the synagogues in Acts. In this evangel the nations had been partakers, but not joint partakers. It was to the Jew first. The nations had a secondary place. The secret now revealed is not that the nations are to be partakers, but that they are to be joint partakers.

Broadly speaking, we have a complete answer to our questions here. All of Paul's previous epistles are definitely declared to be ours, yet with such modifications as the abrogation of Israel's priority involves. Ephesians does not restate Paul's previous evangel, for that would have been useless. All to whom the new revelation came were acquainted with it. All that they needed was the ability to adapt it to the larger light.

As a consequence, the epistle to the Ephesians is full of contacts and contrasts with Paul's previous teaching. Not only are we given the broad basis on which to build our attitude toward Paul's other writings, but many of the details are developed for us, and the character of the link between the two is carefully considered. We will confine ourselves in this study to these two aspects. In what particulars and how does the fact that we are now joint partakers affect Paul's previous epistles? What is the character of the link between them? Is it a sheer break, a mere development, or a super-added glory?

The third item of the secret is elaborated in the last eleven verses of the second chapter. There the apostle would have them remember what they were in flesh, during the previous era, before Ephesians was penned. This chapter will help us greatly in our quest. But it is of the utmost importance to note that the contrasts are not between the position the nations occupied in spirit, as revealed in Paul's epistles, but with their place in flesh, as seen in the book of Acts. Indeed, the great difficulty which almost everyone has in understanding this chapter lies in the failure to make this distinction.

The disabilities are all physical, not spiritual. In Paul's previous epistles the spiritual unity of Jew and gentile is emphasized; in Acts their physical differences are to the fore. It is only in flesh, as seen in Acts, that the nations are apart from Christ, alienated from the citizenship of Israel, guests of the promise covenants, having no expectation, and without God in the world. This is graphically illustrated for us by the presence of Trophimus, the Ephesian, in Jerusalem, where the very rumor that he had been brought near to God in the sanctuary, caused the riot which led to Paul's imprisonment (Acts 21:27-29).

All these physical disabilities are largely ignored in Paul's writings, so the contrast is developed by references to Acts. The great change is symbolized by the razing of the central wall of the barrier, which Trophimus was supposed to have passed (Eph.2:14), and the nullifying of the apostolic decrees (Eph.2:15; Acts 15:20; 16:4). The consequence is that the place accorded the nations in the book of Acts is no longer true at all. There they were guests and sojourners; now we are fellow citizens. There they were outsiders; now we are members of God's family; there they were kept away from the sanctuary; now we are God's dwelling place, in spirit (Eph.2:19-22).

Now these contrasts are emphatically not with the position of the nations in spirit in Paul's previous epistles, but with their physical standing at the time when these epistles were written. In them these physical disabilities are hardly mentioned, and one who reads them today would scarcely know that these existed. The great gulf between Paul's written ministry and the record in Acts may be seen by comparing the record of his stay in Thessalonica (Acts 17:1-9) with the epistles written to the same place not long afterward. In Acts it is all Jewish. In the epistle one would hardly guess that there were any Jews in the city. To be sure there were a vast multitude of the reverent Greeks allotted to Paul, but the very term in Acts suggests proselytes.

The point for us to see is that, while Acts is in contrast to Ephesians, the epistles are in contact with it. Without actually revealing the secret of joint participation, the nations, in spirit, have access into the presence of God (Rom.5:1,2), unhindered by the barrier wall in the sanctuary at Jerusalem; the decrees issued by the apostles are not even mentioned, and physical relationship to Christ is definitely ignored (2 Cor.5:16). These epistles are preparatory to Ephesians. Trophimus and Paul, in Acts, are far apart in flesh; in the early epistles they are near, in spirit; in Ephesians they are one.

The second item of the secret is that we are a joint body. No body is known in Acts, though it undoubtedly existed at the time. But Romans and Corinthians reveal the existence of the body long before the secret of the joint body was made known. Our main question might be restated in concrete terms thus: Is the body of Romans and Galatians the same one as we have in Ephesians, or a different one entirely? We are compelled to take a middle ground. It is the same body, but changed. It is composed of the same class of saints, but its constitution has been altered to agree with the higher and later revelation.

The body in Corinthians was not a joint body. The meaning of this term is not as clear as it might be in English. It describes a body in which believing Jews and gentiles are of equal rank, respectability and honor. There is no such thing on earth. No bodies we are acquainted with are joint bodies. The word had to be coined in Greek, for the thought was unknown. It may be that there are celestial bodies like this, but none on earth. The body as described in Corinthians at such length was such as we know—an earthly body in which the head held the highest rank and each member differed from all the others in respectability, strength and honor. God blended them together by mutual sympathy and need.

In the Corinthian body the Circumcision would claim the better parts. The gifts—first, apostles; second, prophets; third, teachers, and after these the lesser graces—would claim superior places. But in a joint body these distinctions disappear. Now Jew and gentile are both the subjects of such transcendent riches of grace that they are joined in one (Eph.2:1-10). The inequalities produced by the gifts are no longer possible in the realm of purest grace. No one can boast, for all are His achievement.

We are warranted, then, in taking the truth of the one body as in Romans (12:4-8) and First Corinthians (12: 12-31) with such modifications as Ephesians calls for. The body is the same, it is composed of the same class of saints, but it has been affected by the change in administration. Not only are the members all of the same rank now, being a joint body, but the gifts in the body are adjusted. Those which accorded with the Kingdom ministry of Acts have ceased, for blessing on earth is no longer in view. Only apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers are found in Ephesians (4:11).

This is in perfect accord with the teaching of the thirteenth of First Corinthians, for some of the gifts are there definitely limited to the era of immaturity. Even prophecy is given its place in Ephesians. It, together with the apostolic office, is in the foundation (Eph.2:20). Now that the foundation has been securely laid we have no need for the authority of an apostle or the revelations of a prophet. Any prophecy which could come today could only lay a different foundation, which is not of God. Of all the false prophets who have proclaimed themselves in later years, not even one has so much as understood what the true foundation for the present grace is.

The destiny of the one body is not clearly revealed in the earlier epistles. Only Ephesians gives us the grand truth that it is the complement of Christ with respect to His celestial place, and will be His executive in ruling the entire universe (Eph.1:22,23). It could not be revealed at that time, for the secret of Christ's universal headship had not been made known. Acts gives Him no sovereignty in celestial realms. So far as its testimony goes, He has no Kingdom until He returns to earth, and will have none elsewhere.

But there are hints in Paul's previous epistles which need little stressing to suggest a celestial sovereignty. Paul asks the Corinthians, "Are you not aware that we shall be judging messengers . . . ?" (1 Cor.6:3). And he insists that there are celestial bodies in the resurrection (1 Cor.15:40). Is not this almost equal to saying that some of mankind would have a celestial destiny?

The first item of the secret is that the nations now are joint enjoyers of an allotment (Eph.3:6). This is elaborated in the opening section of Ephesians (1:3-14). The subject is developed until we are given a distinct point of contact with Paul's previous epistles. This new revelation was to be limited to those at that time who were in a state of prior expectancy in Christ (Eph.1:12). There is not a single suggestion of such a class in the book of Acts. Yet it is the burden of the Thessalonian epistles. There we find that they were waiting for His Son from heaven (1 Thess.1:10). They were not in darkness, that the day of the Lord should overtake them as a thief (5:4). They were not appointed to indignation, such as the saints in Israel must endure before the Lord comes to them. They were to procure salvation, whether watching or drowsing. This was to occur by the Lord's descent out of the heavens, and their snatching away to meet Him in the air (1 Thess.4:13-17). This was a special revelation through Paul, after his separation from the Circumcision, not even alluded to in Acts, so altogether outside the Kingdom ministry to the nation of Israel. It gave the nations a prior expectation. It became a distinguishing mark of those who receive Paul's message, so that, in seeking for some feature to indicate the recipients of the new revelation, he seizes on this special expectation, to be realized before Christ came to the Circumcision.

But what does this involve? The saints, as well as the subject, are left "in the air." This is hardly a permanent dwelling place. Will they come down again and be subservient to Israel? Or will they ascend with Him to celestial realms? Ephesians supplies the answer. Should they descend, they could never be joint allottees. Israel has the first place on earth for the eons. We cannot oust them. God's gifts may be delayed, but they are never regretted. We must ascend if we are to be joint enjoyers of an allotment. But how can we have any place among the celestials apart from Christ? So the apostle first unfolds the secret of Christ, His universal headship (Eph.1:10). We are to have our position with Him in the heavens.

The first Corinthian epistle leads to similar reflections. How were we to judge messengers, or rule them, from our inferior station on the earth? The way of a bird in the air is beyond our control. How shall we exercise authority over messengers who can fly through the realm of space? The answer is hinted in his fifteenth chapter. Why speak of celestial bodies in connection with our resurrection? What has the glory of the sun, the moon and the stars to do with our vivification? He does not say. But he tells a secret. We shall be changed. Are not all to be changed in resurrection? That is no secret. But the instantaneous change he alluded to was something unknown before. It could be nothing less than a body fitted for celestial scenes.

Thus, while we find a continual contrast to all that pertains to the Circumcision and the book of Acts, we find a continual contact with Paul's previous epistles. It is enigmatic (1 Cor.13:12), to use Paul's own characterization. The tendency is clear enough, for it is away from the physical and terrestrial to the spiritual and celestial. But our destiny is not, and, indeed, could not be revealed so long as God was lingering over His apostate people Israel. It was from glory to glory, each higher revelation being built on its predecessor (2 Cor.3:18).

Another satisfactory solution of our inquiry can be found in the special provision made to bring the saints of Paul's day into their new standing in Christ Jesus. Apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers are given for the adjusting of the saints, with a view to the work of dispensing, for the upbuilding of the body of Christ, until we should all attain to the unity of faith, and the realization of a son of God, to mature manhood, to the adult stature of Christ's complement, that we should by no means still be minors . . ." (Eph.4:11-14).

The words we have italicized are worthy of close study in this connection. None of them suggests a break. The first one is the most important. What is meant by adjusting? Our common version renders the verb mend (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19), perfect (Matt.21:16; Luke 6:40; 2 Cor. 13:11; 1 Thess.3:10; Heb.13:21; 1 Peter 5:10), fit (Rom. 9:22), restore (Gal.6:1), prepare (Heb.10:5), frame (Heb. 11:3), perfectly join together (1 Cor.1:10). It is evident that it is impossible to get the true sense through the English renderings. The CV uses the synonyms adjust, adapt, attune.

The most of the usual renderings are in accord with our contention that there was no rupture, no break, in passing from the previous to the present administration of God's grace. Yet one word, mend, does suggest this. We are told that James and John, with their father, were in the ship mending their nets (Matt.4:21). Now this is most unusual. I have seen some fishermen adjusting their nets in their ship, so that there will be no trouble when they let it fall over the side for another catch, but I have not noticed that nets were mended on board. They are taken to some more convenient, roomy place. Every time they are used they must be folded in their place for the next catch. Only seldom were they mended. The evidence is all in favor of adjusting rather than mending.

There are some passages in which mending will not do at all. The Lord did not come with a mended body, but one adapted to His new sphere of service (Heb.10:5). It was not the form of God repaired. So we may be sure that the gifts were given to adjust, adapt, attune the saints to the new revelation. The same ministry is needed today, for those who have received the truth of Paul's earlier epistles. We freely concede that much more than this is needed in most cases, for the majority of the saints are stranded in Acts. Nothing but a decided break with that administration will be sufficient to prepare them for even the rudiments of the grace which is ours in Christ Jesus.

The adaptation was based on the change from an incomplete to a complete revelation of God's purpose, from an inferior to an equal station in His grace, and from a terrestrial to a celestial destiny.

The next important function of the gifts to the ecclesia was to bring them out of minority into maturity. This may be a sudden transition, but it does not involve the repudiation of everything, far-reaching as the change may be. Paul, in the thirteenth of First Corinthians, dwells at some length on minority and maturity and makes it clear that, in that era, the saints were not mature. "For," he says, "at present we are observing by means of a mirror, in an enigma, yet then, face to face" (1 Cor.13:12). He is not speaking here of meeting the Lord, but of full knowledge in an era yet to come when the saints would become mature. That time came when Ephesians went forth.

It is still the function of the pastor and teacher to lead his hearers out of minority into maturity. But, alas, how many of the leaders of His beloved saints are themselves mature? The most alluring spiritual height seems to be those gifts which mark minority. The body of Christ is being dragged down, not built up. Spirituality is usually confounded with emotion, and often with striving after those transient gifts.

Is there any wonder that they are surging hither and thither, and whirled about by every wind of teaching? So long as the saints prefer the minority of Paul's earlier epistles or the infancy of Acts, they will be unstable as to the truth, or firmly fixed in error.

Another interesting token of the close relationship of all Paul's writings is found in the latter part of Ephesians. He does not hesitate to appeal to teaching not found in the earlier portion. The panoply of God (Eph.6:13) consists, in part, of righteousness and of the evangel of peace. This evangel is for the feet—indicating our contact with the world. It is not the peace of the second of Ephesians, between Jew and gentile, but of the fifth of Romans and the fifth of Second Corinthians. Righteousness takes us back to the third and fourth chapters of Romans.

Justification is not mentioned in the prison epistles. Neither is conciliation. These themes are practically confined to Paul's preparatory epistles (Romans, 1 Corinthians, 2 Corinthians, Galatians). They are not affected by the new revelation and suffer no vital modification, unless we wish to note that the different prepositions used in regard to the justification of the Circumcision and Uncircumcision—out of and through—no longer have any force (Rom.3:30). Both are now justified through faith, for there are no longer any believers among the Circumcision who have not become participants of this grace.

The rendering "ordinances" (Eph.2:15), suggests that all the observances, especially baptism and the Lord's dinner, are done away. But the translation is quite incorrect. The reference is to the decrees issued by the apostles (Acts 15:20). There is no hint that observances, as such, are abolished. Each must be examined on its own merits. Whatever was given specially to Paul after his separation has a strong claim on permanence. What drifted in from the previous Kingdom testimony is not so secure.

Baptism in water was never given to Paul. Christ sent him, not to baptize, but to preach the evangel (1 Cor.1:17). He seldom did it himself. He teaches that we all are baptized in one spirit into one body (1 Cor.12:13). The body of Christ cannot exist apart from the baptism of the spirit. So there are two baptisms in his earlier epistles. In Ephesians there is but one (Eph.4:6). Baptism in water loses even the precarious place it had. Water baptism is not for us.

The Lord's dinner is very different. Paul did not receive it from those before him, as we would expect. He received it by special revelation from the Lord (1 Cor.11:23). He commended it to the Corinthians, and corrected its abuse. How different from the treatment accorded baptism in the same epistle!

Another important contrast is the continuance of the gifts. They were to be limited to the minority status of the ecclesia and were to vanish with the advent of maturity. But, with the full realization of the impending change, he ignores any suggestion of recall when dealing with the Lord's dinner. It is to be observed till Christ's coming. The "covenant" associated with it is the dispensation of righteousness (2 Cor.3:6,9) which comes before us in literal language in the third and fourth chapters of Romans.

To conclude: Ephesians is a general epistle written by Paul to those who, like himself, had been severed from the rest, and associated with Christ in glory, rather than in His rejection. When the destiny of the twelve apostles and those associated with them had been clearly revealed, and culminates in the Kingdom of Israel on earth, the destiny of this new departure was unknown. Ephesians unfolds this secret, hence it is only for those who are "in Christ Jesus." Today, notwithstanding the fact that the church knows nothing of this, and follows the twelve apostles, and rejects Paul and his teaching, the Kingdom administration is no longer in force. By grace, all are associated with the risen and ascended Christ. Let us pray that God will reveal to His saints the transcendent glory which is theirs in "Christ Jesus."

OUR SAVIOUR, GOD

GOD ALONE is our Saviour. Through Isaiah, He declares, "I, I, Yahweh am El [God]! And there is no Saviour apart from Me" (Isa.43:11). He is the Subjector and the Saviour: "An El, just, and a Saviour. And none is there except Me" (Isa.45:21).

Our need for God is an all-encompassing one. We need Him "every hour," continually, not merely upon occasion. For at all times we either need to be saved from sinful practices or to be preserved in the paths of righteousness.

The presence of God's saving power is often unrecognized, even among those in whom it is operating extensively. Ignorance of divine grace is a primary cause of human ingratitude. Men are inordinately proud of their self-control, for they suppose it to be their own creation. They do not realize that self-control, along with all else that is virtuous and agreeable, is always a fruit of the spirit (Gal.5:23); it is never a work of the flesh.

It is a major step forward when the unbeliever finally turns to God, having discovered that he is not really self-sufficient after all. It is at least as great an advancement when the believer repudiates all confidence in the flesh, and begins to rely upon God alone.

Whenever we are faithful, it is true, in a relative sense, that thus we "save ourselves" (for example, from withdrawing from the faith; cf 1 Tim.4:1,16). But we only do this in His grace. Therefore boasting in man is debarred: "Toil I—yet not I but the grace of God which is with me" (1 Cor.15:10).

Our actions are God's channels; they are not a source, but a conduit. Any course of action which we may take which is essential to a goal, is the fruit, not the root of salvation. Though practical salvation is through our works, it is not out of our works. For grace is not out of works, and salvation is both in and by grace. "Now if it is in grace, it is no longer out of works, else the grace is coming to be no longer grace" (Rom.11:6). Should we be enabled to carry such marvelous salvation into effect in our lives, this will be so thanks to our Saviour, not ourselves: "For it is God Who is operating in you to will as well as to work for the sake of His delight" (Phil.2:13).

All that is faithful and pleasing to God is due in its entirety to His gracious provision and direction. A realization of this truth is essential to maturity and humility. For no one can walk humbly with his God who conceives of himself as the one who finally turns defeat into victory. Therefore, we must not boast of what we have "let" the Lord do in our lives. Submission to Him can never afford us an occasion for self-boasting, but only a further opportunity to thank God for His saving grace.

It wounds our self-respect to think that we might actually need such a gracious and powerful provision. And when we recognize God's true grace, it cuts ever so deeply into our pride. Many are ready to assure us that such grace is neither given nor needed. We find such claims to be quite flattering; they make it easier for us to preserve our self-reliant attitudes and ways.

However, we will do well to consider the story of the gracious creditor and his two debtors, one of whom owed ten times more than the other. Since neither were able to pay, "he deals graciously with them both" (Luke 7:42). Though both were appreciative, it was the one "with whom he deals the more graciously" who was "loving him more" (Luke 7:42,43). Similarly, when God gives us an understanding and appreciation of the graciousness of His operations, both for us and in us, we are enabled to love Him more.

May we not, like Belshazzar, exalt ourselves over the Lord of the heavens, in Whose hand is our breath, and "for Whom" are all our paths (cf Dan.5:23). When we exalt ourselves, due to our failure to perceive God's all-sufficient hand upon us, we fail to honor Him. When we take such an approach, our career can only be "weighed on the scales and found lacking" (cf Dan.5:27).

TWO FUNDAMENTAL ERRORS

Most believers consider "free will" and "eternal punishment" to be foundational truth. However, a few consider these same concepts to be foundational error. Of course many among those on both sides of these questions have simply taken a position; most are not aware of the basic issues to be decided. Consequently, confusion is perpetuated, prejudice and ignorance prevail, and these important matters are never resolved.

We propose to examine many of the basic issues involved in these questions, such as faith, choice, foreknowledge, voluntary action, judgment and trials. The fulcrum point of our considerations will be God's achievements through the death and resurrection of Christ. What is the scope of these achievements in our salvation and with respect to His ultimate purpose to become All in all?

The prevailing idea today is that God saves us (from "eternal punishment") only after we first save ourselves from being disqualified for His alleged "gift." While He wishes to assist us even in this, He will only do so if we are willing and cooperative. One must save himself from unwillingness. Finally, we are left on our own. When we need Him the most, He will do nothing. That is: God helps those who help themselves.

Though it is acknowledged that we cannot earn salvation, it is insisted that we still have to qualify for it! Such a claim is nonsensical, for "earn" and "qualify" are synonyms.

The basic idea of compensation is common to both. For example: a successful salesman qualifies for a luxurious vacation by earning a sufficient number of bonus points.

The popular idea that we must qualify ourselves for salvation in order to escape being consigned to everlasting punishment is a repudiation of God's grace. Besides, all power and ability come from God, Who alone is our gracious Saviour.

This is our theme throughout this study. The purpose for its writing is to make known this great truth. We are taking up the error of human free will first, and the error of everlasting punishment second.

FAITH AND THE EVANGEL FOR TODAY

It is wonderful to know that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners" (1 Tim.1:15), not merely to make it possible for sinners to be saved. Similarly, we were not conciliated to God through accepting Christ or believing in the death of His Son. Instead, "We were conciliated to God through the death of His Son" (Rom.5:10). Likewise, Christ did not die in order that our sins might be forgiven; for He would never need to die for God merely to forgive us. He died that God as our judge, might have a just basis for justifying us or declaring us righteous. He "was given up because of our offenses, and was roused because of our justifying" (Rom.4:25). We are "now justified in His blood" (Rom.5:9).

But this is only so "through Jesus Christ's faith" (Rom.3:22), "the faith of Jesus" (Rom.3:26). This is what such passages as these say; they speak of Christ's own faith, not of our faith in Christ. They no more mean our faith in Him, than the words "the faith of Abraham" (Rom.4:16) mean our faith in Abraham! It is incorrect to translate them otherwise. To do so is to interpret, not translate. But since men are so confident that they are saved (from "Hell") through "accepting Christ," they assume that any reference to faith in association with Christ must be their own, instead of His. They think of their own faith as what keeps them from being lost. Such a conception of "grace" is perfectly indistinguishable from a reward.

THUS YOU BELIEVE

Faith is essential to our salvation, but it is not a "requirement." It is "essential" only in the sense that there are none in Christ but those who have faith in Him; they all genuinely believe that He died and rose (cf 1 Thess.4:14). All such ones are brethren in Christ. For God gives all His people at least some faith in at least this much. God is especially (though not exclusively) the Saviour of believers (1 Tim.4:10); it is these chosen ones who alone are "happening upon the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with glory eonian" (2 Tim.2:10).

Why did the Corinthians believe? Was it merely the result of a "free will" decision of their own, or was it because, like Paul, God's powerful grace was with them in a wonderful way? To all who have eyes to see, Paul's words concerning this matter are unmistakable:

Paul had been the foremost of sinners (1 Tim.1:15). For beyond all others, he had committed much contrary to the name of Jesus the Nazarene, and punished and persecuted the ecclesia of God exceedingly (1 Cor.15:9; Acts 9:1; 26:9-11). Therefore it required "all His patience" (1 Tim. 1:16) for the Lord to deal with this terrible sinner and to graciously save him. Many years later, when writing his Ephesian epistle, Paul painfully recalled those evil days, and in light of them could only speak of himself as "less than the least of all saints" (Eph.3:8).

"Yet, in the grace of God I am what I am [now]" (1 Cor. 15:10a), Paul insists to the Corinthians. For the Lord had met him on the Damascus road. The faith and love of Christ Jesus came over him and changed him from being the foremost sinner among men into the faithful and obedient apostle to the nations, of whom we are to become imitators (1 Cor.11:1; Phil.3:17).

Paul accounts for the faith of the Corinthians (even as the heralding of the twelve, cf 1 Cor.12:5) on this same ground: "His grace, which is in me, did not come to be for naught, but more exceedingly than all of them toil I—yet not I, but the grace of God which is with me. Then, whether I or they, thus [houtos, THE-SAME-AS] we are heralding and thus you believe" (1 Cor.15: 10b,11).

The grace of God is effective, not merely potential. Faith is God's gracious gift to us, with which He overwhelms our former unbelief, imparting to all whom He calls a measure thereof, whenever it delights Him to unveil His Son in us (cf Phil.1:29; 1 Tim.1:13-16; Rom.12:3; Gal.1:15,16). This proves that salvation is not a refusable offer, and that faith is not spiritual currency. Faith is not meritorious. Accepting Christ is not a transaction. Salvation is a gracious gift, not a covenant or agreement. Those who are yet of a mind to "strike a deal" with God, are in no mood to acknowledge their need of a Saviour.

CHRIST PAID ALL

Salvation in Christ is not "the greatest bargain in all the universe," for it is not a bargain at all. It is neither cheap nor expensive. It is free. We need not be "willing to pay the price," for there is no price to pay. Christ paid it all. He was made sin; God condemned sin in the flesh in the sacrifice of His Son (2 Cor.5:21; Rom.8:3).

Salvation is not a reward for having done the right thing, or for "meeting conditions." As with Abraham (Rom.4: 16-21), our faith reveals to us what is already true, concerning what God has promised. It gives us assurance.

"God, Who saves us and calls us with a holy calling," has promised to glorify and conform to the image of His Son, all those whom He chose "in accord with His own purpose and the grace which is given to us in Christ Jesus before times eonian"; this evangel "now is being manifested" (2 Tim.1:9,10). "Now you, brethren, as Isaac, are children of promise" (Gal.4:28; cf Rom.9:9-11). This is the gospel—not some offer of a way to escape "Hell."

The customary "invitation" or "altar call" of today is simply a vain tradition of men (cf Mark 7:8). Since it "gets results," it is used. Through it many become converts to the "Christian religion." The number of those from among such throngs whom God Himself has already chosen is known to Him, not ourselves. Such popular techniques are based upon the false idea which has well been termed, "decisional regeneration."

However, such presentations are not faithful ones. For Christ is to be announced and proclaimed, not offered as a "great opportunity" (cp Acts 13:38,39). This is to be done so that, "whoever were set for life eonian" (Acts 13:48; cf Eph.1:3-6) may believe "through grace" (Acts 18:27; cf Rom.10:14,15).

"Yahweh, our Elohim, You are the Setter of welfare on the hearthstones for us, For, moreover, You contrive all our doings for us" (Isa.26:12).

THOSE WHO ARE CHOSEN

It is no part of our calling or service today to be crying out to men, "Repent! for near is the kingdom of the heavens!" (Matt.3:2); or, "Return and turn away from all your transgressions, And your depravity shall not become a stumbling block to you" (Ezekiel 18:30). Instead, in this present "day of salvation" (2 Cor.6:2), we are to dispense "the word of the conciliation," "how that God was in Christ, conciliating the world to Himself, not reckoning their offenses to them" (2 Cor.5:18,19). This tremendous change in the divine dealings during the present administration is "the world's riches" (Rom.11:12) quite apart from their acceptance or appreciation of it.

The terrible judgments which are predicted for "the conclusion of the eon" (Matt.24:3) are yet to come at the close of this present age. They are for that era. But this present era is not that future era. The present administration, as a foretaste of God's glorious plans for the new creation, is not concerned with such matters. It is utterly anachronistic to herald wrath in a day of conciliation.

The evangel for today is to be proclaimed on behalf "of those who are chosen, that they also may be happening upon the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with glory eonian" (2 Tim.2:10). Most of those who are naming the name of the Lord have never heard a clear presentation of the evangel of God. Instead they have been subjected to a great deal of confusion, in the midst of which, and in spite of all the error, "Christ crucified" was still proclaimed (cf 1 Cor.1:23). And, in such cases, God has used this marvelous message—not the contiguous "profane prattlings" which were also present (2 Tim.2:16)—to bring many of His people into the beginning of their life of faith. Therefore, "seeing that, by every method, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is being announced, I am rejoicing in this also, and will be rejoicing nevertheless" (Phil.1:18).

The evangel is not to be conceived as the presentation of an investment opportunity, a "good deal," through which all who are smart enough to recognize a good thing when they see it and willing to pay the price to "get in" may do so. One does not "join" the ecclesia (out-called ones) of God, as if it were a fraternal organization or some popular "church": "Yet now God [the Placer] placed the members, each one of them, in the body according as He wills" (1 Cor.12:18).

The truth is, though we too were once terrible sinners, even as the rest, "when the kindness and fondness for humanity of our Saviour, God, made its advent," it came to us "not for works which are wrought in righteousness which we do, but according to His mercy" (Titus 3:4,5a). God chose to be merciful to us, we did not put Him under obligation to be merciful. He decides to whom He will grant His mercy, and when He will do so. We did not qualify for it; therefore God was not obligated to give it.

Salvation is not afforded man at his own convenience, whenever he would care to take it to himself. Furthermore, there is no injustice with God in acting purposefully, choosing some for certain blessings and positions which He does not grant to others. "For to Moses He is saying, 'I shall be merciful to whomever I may be merciful, and I shall be pitying whomever I may be pitying'" (Rom.9:15). When God is merciful to us, it is only because He is also gracious to us (cp Exodus 33:19).

Most seem to conceive of one's obtaining of the holy spirit in a way similar to that of Simon, the magician. Like him, they "infer that the gratuity of God is [somehow] to be acquired" (Acts 8:20). Whether one seeks to acquire the holy spirit through money, or faith, the principle is the same. God's gifts are not for sale. Peter's testimony to those who would represent salvation in Christ as an acquisition for which men may qualify, is, "Your heart is not straight in front of God. Repent, then, from this evil of yours" (Acts 8:21,22).

Let us rejoice in the realization that God is our Saviour! —"He saves us, through the bath of renascence and renewal of holy spirit, which He pours out on us richly through Jesus Christ, our Saviour" (Titus 3:5b,6). This is so, "that, being justified in that One's grace, we may be becoming enjoyers, in expectation, of the allotment of life eonian" (Titus 3:7).

IN GRACE AND OUT

GRACE is a fundamental characteristic of the present administration of the secret (Eph.3:2,9). It is the favor of the previous transitional era continued and intensified and enriched. Superabundant grace (Rom.5:17) had already been manifested in justifying the nations apart from the law or works of any kind, through faith, that it may accord with grace (Rom.4:16). Grace glorious, rich, transcendent, is our portion now (Eph.1:6,7; 2:7). That which the eye did not perceive, and the ear did not hear, and to which the heart of men did not ascend—whatever God makes ready for those who are loving Him—He has revealed to us by His spirit through His latest revelation (1 Cor.2:9,10). And is not this to be expected? So long as God was hindered by human help, His heart was restrained. So long as He was thwarted by creature attainments, His love could not find a free outlet. Grace, undiluted by law, unspoiled by works, unconfined by aught of man, is the fullest, freest outflow of God's essence, which is love.

But alas! Our tiny cups are far too small to contain it. Our unnatural hearts are too full of self to give God His place as our All. Our pride insists on having some share in the favors He bestows. How desperately the law-laden Jew clings to his own doings! If he cannot justify himself by law keeping, he will at least make it his rule of life after he has been justified. He cannot bear to be bereft of all merit. God must not be All. Man insists on doing his share in creating his future bliss. He must earn, he must deserve the blessings he receives, or lose his self-respect.

Paul found it necessary to devote a whole epistle to the defense of grace. The Galatians had started well, and had received the evangel which he had heralded with its abundant grace. But for Jews, who had been reared under the law, this was entirely too much to accept. The fact that God Himself had given the law was enough to convince them that He wished it to be kept. They did not realize that His intention was quite the reverse, that He wished to humble them and teach them their own incompetence and need of Him through its enactments. These Jews did not only try to keep the law themselves, but also sought to fasten it upon those of the nations who believed. Thus they ran counter to the grace which God had made the fundamental feature of the evangel of the Uncircumcision. With stern severity the apostle deals with these Jews because of the seriousness of their error. Even the Galatians are not spared. He tells them plainly that they had fallen out of grace (Gal.5:4).

The Galatian repudiation of God's grace is more virulent today than ever. Almost all "religious" training, even when definitely evangelistic, is centered in human effort and attainment. Not only is the evangel tainted with Circumcision requirements, such as repentance and baptism, which seem to give the seeker something he can do in order to assist God in securing his salvation, but the saint is loaded with duties which are to help God to finish His work.

But if the superabundant grace of Paul's evangel is repudiated, what shall we say of the rich, the glorious, the transcendent grace of this secret administration? Is it not possible, nay, probable, indeed, inevitable, that we also have repudiated it, at least to some extent? Alas! how could it be otherwise with mortal men? Christendom has hardly heard of the present grace, and those of us who have, are prone to mix in our own efforts and attainments as though these could procure the gratuities of God. There is a strong current which is corrupting the grace glorious, limiting it to those alone who receive, or understand, or think they perceive the higher truths of Paul's later epistles. It is always some human attainment which merits this grace, although, in the nature of things, this is impossible, for then grace is no more grace.

(IN) TO-GRACE chariti

One form of the word grace is particularly rich in its implications, yet it is rather difficult to carry over into good English in some connections, especially the verb be. It is simple when the verb will allow the use of the preposition to, as when Paul and Barnabas were given over to the grace of God (Acts 14:26). Webster's dictionary says that the dative "is generally indicated in modern English by to or for." Much experiment convinced us that to is the best standard for the sublinear of the CONCORDANT GREEK TEXT, and subsequent experience has confirmed this. It is the best uniform rendering. In the version, however, the matter is far more complicated, for each verb has an influence on the following connective. We have tried specially hard to get a good rendering for the parenthesis in Ephesians 2:5. We cannot say "to grace you are saved," so we used Webster's second choice and rendered it "you have been saved for grace." This comes close to the sense, yet seems to limit it to the future. In some passages, as Galatians 5:1, for is fine. "For freedom Christ frees us!" And so it seems here, yet, for the sake of uniformity, we have considered adding a word thus: "to (enjoy) grace are you saved." These renderings, however, do not fit well in similar passages, so we have adopted a regular rendering for such cases, by inserting the connective in in place of to.

The dative case, answers the question Where? and indicates rest in the object named. Hence the characteristic connective is IN, which cannot be used for any other case.

If we add in, then, for the dative, we are not likely to introduce any false relation. Hence we have thought it well to translate the dative "in grace" in all of those marvelous passages where this has to do with our present position. We, and other translators, have used by, which is, perhaps the most agreeable English. But by is so wide in its usage that it may also denote agency and efficient cause. Its nearest equivalent in Greek, hupo, is never used with the dative. We seek to restrict this connective to the efficient cause in the CONCORDANT VERSION. This is especially clear in such statements as, "that which is declared by the Lord through the prophet" (Matt.1:22). Grace is not the efficient agent (by) or the channel (through), but the sphere in which God operates in this and the preceding administration.

Justification is by God as the efficient cause (Rom.8:33), and in Christ (Gal.2:17), and therefore in grace. We are justified gratuitously in His grace, through the deliverance which is in Christ Jesus (Rom.3:24). It is not that grace is in the past, and exhausts itself in vindicating us, leaving us to stand in law or works, as the Galatians thought, nor is it merely the channel through which justification came. It is the element, the province in which justification is effected, which remains, not only to maintain our righteousness, but to form a fit field for the further outflow of God's favor. This is the glorious feature which we seek to unfold in this essay. The dative form of the word grace (our word charity is a close transliteration), is not only bursting with gifts for us, but an apprehension of its nuances will preserve us from the prevailing tendency to make His gratuities attainable by means of human efforts or insight.

In Paul's latest and highest revelation a double appeal is made to the fact that salvation through faith (Eph.2:5,8), as heralded in Paul's evangel, is in grace, hence is the proper atmosphere for the further favors now revealed.

The usual rendering is much used to prove that salvation is not of works, and suggests to most minds that the efficient cause of our salvation was grace. This is blessed, of course, yet seems rather incongruous in such an epistle as Ephesians, where it finds no close connection with the context. The point is that the condition of salvation which is theirs through faith, apart from works, is in the sphere of grace, hence they were vivified together with the Circumcision recipients of Paul's evangel when Christ was vivified. Such a blessing could not come to any mortal on the ground of attainment, and is possible only to those whom Paul had previously put "in grace."

This is enlarged upon in one of the most precious passages even in this precious epistle. "For in grace are you saved, through faith, and this is not out of you; it is God's oblation, not of works, lest anyone should be boasting. For His achievement are we, being created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God makes ready beforehand, that we should be walking in them." The scene of our salvation is not in ourselves or our deeds, but in God's favor. He is the one Who is working and even prepares the good works which we may do.

GRACE INVOLVES JOY

Grace, in Greek, comes from the stem joy, for that is its fruit. And so it is that we are exhorted, with psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, in grace, to sing in our hearts to God (Col.3:16). Grace can tune our heartstrings as nothing else can. Our vocal cords may not be able to voice the harmony within. Some of us cannot make music on an instrument or in our throats so as to enchant our fellow men. But all of us can make music in our hearts to God. And it will be found that songs which celebrate ourselves, our superiority and attainments, are rare, for these claims are not in grace, and put a damper on our joy.

FALLING OUT OF GRACE

Perhaps the best reason for choosing in to indicate the dative case of grace is the direct contrast which it presents, to Paul's graphic figure, when he described the Galatian apostasy. He said, "You fall out of grace!" (Gal.5:4). They had been in grace, or they could not have fallen out of it. In these days, when there is such a strong tendency to depart from the faith, it will be found that a falling out of grace usually accompanies error. Those who divide the saints into groups according to something in them have fallen out of grace. One who claims to belong to the 144,000 and leaves others in the great company proclaims his own merit, denies the one body, and has fallen out of grace. If we claim to belong to a higher and more privileged group in this administration, we destroy its very foundations, for it is based upon the unity of those far and near, the oneness of those privileged with those who had no covenant or claim on God. It is noteworthy that no one claims to belong to an inferior group. Let us not exalt ourselves at the expense of God's most precious exhibition of grace! Falling from grace used to be a phrase applied to one whose conduct contradicted his profession. The reformed drunkard was said to fall from grace if he took to his cups again. It was freely used of so-called "backsliders," and carried with it the loss of salvation. But, of course, all this is entirely foreign to the context where it is found in the Scriptures. The Galatians did not lose their salvation, but their liberty (Gal.5:1-4). They still remained brethren. They had the spirit (Gal.3:2,3). They were disturbed, but not lost. All of us fail in doctrine or deportment. This, however, does not affect that which we have in grace. It was only in their thoughts and practices that the Galatians fell out of grace. Failure in these can only make it abound. In law failure is fatal, but grace is stimulated and multiplied by failure.

GRACE THE TOUCHSTONE

Since grace is the fundamental feature of this administration, which is especially designed to exhibit God's grace to the universe, all doctrine and all deportment may be tested by it. If we have drunk deeply of grace we intuitively shrink from all that involves merit on the part of man. Salvation with the slightest tinge of works, no matter how reasonable or how ably defended, or "proven" in the Bible, finds no response in our spirits. Destiny dependent on human attainment is utterly repugnant to us, for it is a falling out of grace and a repudiation of the very basis of this secret administration. And we will find that our conduct usually agrees with our teaching. Graciousness goes with truth: ungraciousness with error. Not that it is merely sentimental and will not rebuke and expose where this is needed, especially in these last days, but even this will be done in harmony with grace.

Here is where the spiritual saint is safer than the learned scholar. The question of truth may seem difficult in our present ignorance and the strange variety of interpretations which abound, but if God's grace has gripped us, this will be our guiding sun in the midst of the prevailing gloom. It will enable us to steer clear of all the sunken rocks of human merit that threaten to make shipwreck of our faith. We will refuse to deduce from one set of passages what God plainly denies elsewhere when our reasoning leads us to lean on man instead of God, because this conflicts with the spirit of grace. O that our hearts were established firmly and finally in the freedom of His favor! Much as we value a knowledge of the external facts of God's revelation we have found that these are not acceptable to us in this administration unless our hearts are prepared by an appreciation of God's grace.

The Problem of Evil and
the Judgments of God

How can we explain the presence of evil? Is there a purpose for evil, and will it come to an end? Can there be two independent opposing forces in the universe? If God alone is supreme, what is the purpose of judgment? Surely there are answers to these troubling questions in the Word of God.

This book traces the divine function of evil (whatever is harmful or destructive) from its inception to its consummation, by presenting scriptural solutions to the various long-debated questions concerning God and His sovereignty.

As one of its subjects, it probes and takes issue with the commonly accepted explanation that Satan, and not God, is responsible for evil. To quote the book's author: "Almost all of us are shortsighted. We see the judgments, but fail to recognize that they are only part of God's way with mankind, that they are definitely not an end. We confuse the going with the goal. Judgment is God's strange work. He uses it as a preparation toward a glorious consummation."

The message in this book is especially valuable to us in these days of doubt and distress, to lead men to rely on and rest in God alone.

EDITORIAL

WE BEGIN this issue of our magazine with Ephesians 1:2,3, which may be translated and arranged as follows:

2 Grace to =you and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.
3 Blessed is the God and Father of our ·Lord Jesus Christ
·Who blesses us i·with every spiritual blessing, among the celestials,
in Christ,

We end with Romans 5:8,9, which may be translated and arranged as follows:

8 yet ·God is commending this ·love of *sfHis *ioto us, seeing that,
While we |are still sinners,
Christ dies *ovfor our sakes.
9 Much rather then, justified now in His ·blood, we shall be |saved from ·indignation through Him.

The title of the middle article is "One God and One Lord," taken from 1 Corinthians 8:5,6 where we read:

5 For +even if so be that there |are those being termed° gods, whether in heaven or on earth, even as there |are many gods and many lords, 6 *btnevertheless
To us there is one God, the Father, out of Whom ·all is, and we *iofor Him,
And one Lord, Jesus Christ, through Whom ·all is, and we through Him.

In one way, the articles might well be considered in reverse order, starting with James Coram's presentation of the evangel of our salvation as an announcement of God's grace centered on the death, entombment and rousing of Christ (pp.89-96). Then our brother lays down the case for a clear concept of our Lord as the Image of God and Mediator between God and humanity (pp.66-87). Thus with this foundation we may take up Brother Knoch's study of our spiritual blessings among the celestials which are "in Christ" (pp.51-65 and an appendix on p.88).

But if, as believers we start with the transcendent riches of God's grace as they begin to be unfolded in Ephesians 1:2,3, and then give attention to the Person and place of Christ in Whom we have all our blessings, it is well to end again with the evangel itself. For it is the beginning of our faith and yet needs always to be recalled and considered anew even as we are taken from glory to glory. D.H.H.

REPOSING

Orville Hunt, of Palm Bay, Florida, was put to repose on June 27, 2021 at age 82. Born and raised in Wisconsin where he attended a Bible college and where he met and married his wife Connie. They spent eight years in the Philippines in a mission centered on the evangel of God's grace, but restricted to believers. It was after their return, settled in Michigan, that Orville's concept of Christ's work at the cross magnified as it ultimately embraces all humanity. Thus as his faith expanded, his ministry contracted, and he took on work as a roofer. But as we knew him as host and teacher, we knew him as a gracious brother, reflecting in his life and words the evangel he believed.

Mary Ann Fry, of Spencer Port, New York, was put to repose on June 21,2021. She and her husband, Edison W. Fry, who predeceased her in 2007 rejoiced in God, studying His word early in the morning every day. They passed their love and faith to their three children. Mary Ann's famous sayings during difficult times were "Everything is happening according to God's plan" and "Trust in God—He doesn't want us to worry."

SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS

> Grace to you and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. Blessed is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who blesses us with every spiritual blessing, among the celestials, in Christ. (Eph.1:2,3)

"GRACE to you and peace from God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ." Divine favor, and the weal it works, is the height of human blessedness. The usual Eastern salutation was Peace! It was a wish for welfare in all things. Paul always prefaces it with grace. This is the keynote of our relationship to God and Christ in all of Paul's epistles. And he does not only wish us to have it, but he proceeds to present it to us. This is especially true of the epistle before us. In it the grace of God is not only the first to greet us as we enter, but enriches us with its lavish redundance to the very end.

Nowhere is this invocation more fitting than here, for it introduces us immediately to the grandest and most glorious exhibition of divine favor which ever illumines God's love, either in the past, the present, or those wondrous future eons which are the special display of His power and perfections.

"Blessed is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Who blesses us with every spiritual blessing, among the celestials . . . ." With inimitable wisdom the whole message of this epistle is compressed into these two introductory phrases, every spiritual blessing and among the celestials. All the rest may be referred to these two themes. The secret itself begins with a repetition of the first, for everything said to be "joint" is in spirit (Eph.3:6). And the three items of the Ephesian secret are entirely dependent on the fact that our blessings are not on earth, but among the celestials.

The strongest possible stress, however, is laid on the statement that our blessings are spiritual. It is difficult to see how greater emphasis could be given this foundation fact. Ephesians, the fullest exposition of God's present dealings with the nations, opens with this striking declaration, and it is confirmed at every step. The believers among the nations have become joint enjoyers because they were sealed with the spirit of promise (1:13). In flesh, they were apart from Christ (2:12). Access to the Father's presence is by spirit (2:18). We repeat, the mystery itself is limited to the realm of spirit. It is only in spirit that we are joint allottees, and a joint body and joint partakers.

The full force of this phrase will not dawn on us until we have fully considered its implications. When we say that our blessings are among the celestials, nothing is actually said of our place on earth, but the mere mention of the higher sphere is the most conclusive evidence that our blessings are not on earth. So with the character of our bliss. The word spiritual is contrastive. It insists that the physical and the soulish have no place in our blessedness.

In the Kingdom Israel will have spiritual blessings, but they will be mingled with all the delights which we can only sip, because of the frailty of our mortal frames. Disease and death, which crush our efforts to quaff the cup of pleasure to the full, will be defeated. The paradise, the "heaven" of which men dream, will be on earth.

Our blessings are above all this. It is not really right to say that we will have no physical or soulish blessings, because this would indicate a lack, a loss, a deficiency. The positive statement that we have every spiritual blessing, in Christ, gives us the gold that makes silver and copper of no account. So superior is the spiritual bliss that all need, all desire, for the inferior felicity will vanish. At present we do not apprehend this. We long for the lower delights. But they are not ours in Christ. Just as we will be satisfied with being "confined" in a universe and leave the earth for Israel, so we will be supremely content with our transcendent spiritual felicity and leave the physical pleasures to the earthly people.

We must also read this phrase in the light of the previous position of those to whom it was written. They had already enjoyed some spiritual and physical blessings, in anticipation of the future Kingdom, in which they were supposed to have a part. There is a change in two directions. Their place in flesh vanishes and leaves them no title to physical felicity. Their place in spirit develops until it includes the very limits of spiritual bliss.

It is evident that these phrases, "spiritual blessings" and "among the celestials," are new revelations, and denote a change in God's dealings with the believers among the nations. The celestial destiny was not made known before, though much had been revealed in preparation for it, as we shall see when we consider the phrase more closely. So also, the exclusively spiritual character of our blessings had not been previously expressed, yet there had been a constant trend in their direction, from the very first indication that God was doing a distinct work among the nations. They were weaned from the physical gradually. Here we have the climax, for all physical precedence must be set aside in the administration of the mystery.

The general teaching of the Scriptures as to spirit is well worthy of our attention, and may be considered later when we inquire into the subject of spiritual endowments. At present let us consider the theme in connection with the blessing of the believers among the nations through the ministry of Paul, first as it appears on the surface in the history of his acts, and then as seen in the doctrine of the spirit in his preparatory epistles.

Parabolically, we are given a graphic representation of the retirement of the flesh and the ascendency of the spirit in the apostle's personal career. From his call to his severance at Pisidian Antioch, his ministry was based entirely on his physical presence. He spoke by word of mouth only. He wrote no epistle. Later, when he went among the nations, he supplemented his personal presence by writing to the Thessalonians, and to the Corinthians, and to the Galatians, and to the Romans. But before he writes to the Ephesians he is put in prison. Physically, he is retired from service. Only by his epistles he held spiritual communion with the saints. It is a parable of the spirit's gradual ascendency over his fleshly presence in the ministry.

As we shall see, this is often enforced in his writings, and it is even emphasized in the account of his ministry in Acts. His very severance was by the direct decree of the holy spirit, and he is sent forth in the same way (Acts 13:2,3). This is in undoubted contrast to our Lord's method with the twelve apostles. These He separated and sent forth during His physical presence on the earth.

Those who can see beneath the surface will discover continual intimations of the tendency toward spirit throughout Paul's acts. Consider the marked contrast between his long personal sojourn in Ephesus and his last visit. He did not even go to the site of the city, but called the elders to meet him at Miletus (Acts 20:17). He told them that they would see his face no more. Physically, he faded from their view, never to return. Spiritually, he came to them again in this epistle (for it undoubtedly was sent to Ephesus, too). They were pained to part with him, but who can tell what joy he brought to them in his spiritual return?

The prophecy of Agabus (Acts 21:11) points in the same direction. Its very wording is significant. "This the holy spirit is saying, 'The man whose girdle this is, shall the Jews in Jerusalem be binding thus, and they shall be giving him over into the hands of the nations.'" The holy spirit is the speaker. The girdle speaks of service. It was the action of the Jews in Jerusalem which was forcing the flesh to retire. They were compelling Paul to enter a ministry to the nations in which his flesh would have no place. All this is graphically represented, not only by the action of Agabus, but by the actual occurrence.

Have we ever fully realized the meaning of Paul's imprisonment at the close of Acts? Have we comprehended the significance of the fact that the perfection epistles come to us from a prisoner—a man who cannot claim or dispense physical benefits, or serve by means of his personal presence? There is a close accord between the circumstance and the substance of all revelation. While Paul's flesh is being confined, his spirit is set free.

THE SPIRIT IN THIS ECONOMY

The great change in the operation of the spirit can be understood only when we carefully consider the force of the terms used. We read of the spirit coming on for power, of filling for utterance, of baptism for cleansing, of sealing for safety, of the earnest as a pledge, and of homing for communion. The first of these, coming on for power, Paul never applies to the nations. The last, homing for communion, which takes its place, is used only by Paul, in view of the impending climax of Ephesians. Instead of receiving an occasional visitation, the believers among all nations become the permanent home of the holy spirit. This is not for the operation of miraculous displays, but for the maintenance of constant fellowship. Almost all of these are continually confused with the baptism of the spirit, which we will consider first.

THE BAPTISM OF THE SPIRIT

What is the baptism in holy spirit? Aside from the promise given by John the baptist (Matt.3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16; John 1:33) that they would be baptized in holy spirit at the coming of Christ, and our Lord's declaration that they should be baptized with holy spirit at Pentecost (Acts 1:5), we have only one other mention of spirit baptism in the Scriptures. This is Paul's declaration that, "in one spirit we all are baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether slave or free" (1 Cor.12:13).

If we allow an interpretation of this phrase which is often heard, that the baptism of the spirit is known only when evidenced by miraculous manifestations, we are confronted with a serious difficulty at the outset. We know that many are members of the body of Christ who have never experienced some of these supernatural signs, yet we are assured by the apostle that all who are members of Christ's body have become such by the baptism of the spirit. We must either deny that all who are members of Christ have this baptism or modify our conception of its meaning to accord with the experience of all who are His.

Baptism in water was the type or symbol of the spiritual reality. It spoke of cleansing and union. It was ceremonial washing, and associated its subjects by a common bond. Saul of Tarsus washed away his sins (Acts 22:16). The sons of Israel were baptized into Moses (1 Cor.10:2). These two thoughts—cleansing and unity—are only typified by water, but realized in spirit. The disciples were cleansed on the day of Pentecost and the believers in Corinth were united into one body by the baptism of spirit.

There is not the least suggestion of power in the term baptism—either in water or in spirit. John the baptist wrought no miracles, neither did his baptized disciples. Those who were baptized by our Lord's followers received no enduement. His apostles and disciples needed a special commission to enable them to cast out demons, cure the sick, or strengthen the infirm. Their baptism conferred no power. The same is true of the antitype. The baptism of the spirit does not endue the believers with might. It only cleanses and unifies.

At first sight, this seems to be contradicted by the record in Acts. Did not the Lord say that they would be baptized in holy spirit at Pentecost (Acts 1:5)? And did not the holy spirit come with power, accompanied with tongues of fire and the gift of languages? This is true. At Pentecost they were not only baptized in holy spirit, but the holy spirit came on them (Acts 1:8) and they were filled with holy spirit (Acts 2:4). The power was not due to baptism but to the other manifestations of the spirit's presence.

Consider carefully the two distinct promises given by our Lord concerning Pentecost. First He said, "You shall be baptized in holy spirit after not many of these days." Then, when the testimony to the Kingdom is before Him, He says, "But you shall be obtaining power at the coming of the holy spirit on you, and you shall be My witnesses both in Jerusalem and in entire Judea and Samaria, and as far as the limits of the earth" (Acts 1:8). Power is not associated with baptism, but with the on-coming of the spirit. The figures are opposites. Baptism is a dipping in. Power springs from a coming on.

The same important distinction is manifest in the twelfth chapter of First Corinthians. The baptism of the spirit is the ground of unity, not of power. The spirit is the channel of the graces, which it gives and operates. What a vast difference between this thought and the dipping of all in the spirit! O that we could clear away the cloudy conceptions which are confusing so many believers today! The baptism of the spirit has become connected with so much which is unwarranted by the Word that it has become the cause of division, rather than unity. We beg of all to search and see that baptism never brings power. It never is the source of spirit manifestations. It is used only of cleansing and consequent unity.

The perversion of the doctrine of spirit baptism should be a helpful warning to those whose hearts yearn to know and obey the will of God, for it points out how easily we may deflect from the truth unless we use the utmost care and accuracy in considering the inspired records. It shows how easily we may reason from false and insufficient premises, and found a great movement on a figment of human imagination. Power came down at Pentecost. The disciples were baptized in holy spirit at that time. But this does not prove that one was the consequence of the other. The fact that power was promised in connection with the coming on of the spirit, and is never associated with baptism, disproves it. Yet what a marvelous movement is based upon this blunder! An untold amount of teaching concerning the operation of God's holy spirit is centered around this serious error. Good men and godly find it a challenge to their faith, and they seek to make it their own. The lesson we should learn is the stupendous importance of trifling departures from the Word. The enemy may use them to deceive and to seduce the very elect.

The great lesson for service in this economy of God's grace is almost the reverse of that which obtains at Pentecost. That power did not continue. Let anyone trace the exhibition of power through the book of Acts and he will be convinced that, as the Kingdom hope vanishes, power also departs. At the beginning the twelve are mightily endued and are able to brave the opposition of their rulers. At the end they have been forced from the holy city and their cause is lost. Only a lone apostle, a prisoner in Rome, remains as God's ambassador. All the power he has, lies in his weakness.

That is the great lesson which is needed today. God's strength is now being perfected in infirmity. God is working with weak instruments so that the glory may be His. Great power would disqualify us. It is one of the special excellencies of grace that it operates more freely in infirmity than in strength. God can, and has, wrought great things through those whom He has empowered. He is doing far greater marvels through the feeble, the faint, those who cannot claim a share in the glory of His achievements. Let us, like Paul at the close of his career, boast in our lack of physical power, for then we are more acceptable servitors of His grace.

THE "COMING ON" OF THE SPIRIT

In ancient times the spirit of the Lord came upon those who were His instruments. Balaam prophesied under its power (Num.24:2). Othniel delivered Israel (Judges 3:10), and Gideon acted in its strength (Judges 6:34). When Samuel anointed David the spirit of Yahweh came upon him from that day forward (1 Sam.16:13). His captain, Amasai, had the spirit come upon him (1 Chron.12:18). The spirit of God came upon Azariah the prophet, and he encouraged Asa to put away the idols out of the land (2 Chron.15:1,8), as well as on Zechariah the priest, who was stoned in the court of the temple (2 Chron.24:20,21). The spirit of Yahweh fell on Ezekiel (Ezek.11:5); He worked, not by an army, nor by power, but by His spirit (Zech.4:6).

This same coming on is continued as the power of God's operations when Christ and His apostles were proclaiming the Kingdom. He Himself was generated in this way (Luke 1:35). Such was the power of Pentecost (Acts 1:8). But never, in all of Paul's career, does the spirit operate in this way. It is not now an occasional outpouring. The spirit is not outside of us. It dwells in us. It is there, not to work miracles, but to vivify every act of these mortals bodies (Rom.8:11).

At Pentecost the spirit came on them for power, filled them for utterance, and they were baptized in it for cleansing. The baptism and the filling continue, but the coming on is replaced by another nearer and closer relationship which was not known at Pentecost. Only in Paul's epistles do we read that the spirit is making its home in the believers (Rom.8:9,11; 1 Cor.3:16; 2 Tim.1:14). Instead of an occasional visitation it has a settled habitation.

As this operation of the spirit is most important in its contrast with the present method, we give a list of the passages in which it is referred to, so that the student may study them for himself. There is some variety in the imposition of the spirit. It falls on the proselytes (Acts 10:44; 11:15). It will be poured on Israel and all flesh in the coming Kingdom (Acts 2:17,18) as it was in the past on the believing proselytes (Acts 10:45). It is placed on Christ (Matt.12:18). It remains on Him (Mark 1:10; John 1:32,33).

THE HOMING OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

Up to the end of Acts the spirit is found ON the saints: from Romans, through Paul's epistles, the holy spirit makes its home IN the members of His body. This change is fraught with far-reaching significance. There is all the difference which we find in Israel's early history, where Yahweh manifested Himself in two distinct methods. He occasionally came upon men, such as Othniel and Gideon, David and Amasai, Zechariah and Ezekiel, energizing them for some superhuman effort. But He also made His home in the holy of holies. One was intermittent and temporary. The other was His permanent abode.

Since sin has invaded the universe God makes His home in inaccessible light (1 Tim.6:16), and in houses specially prepared and sanctified for His presence, such as the tabernacle of the wilderness, the temple of Solomon, the more glorious sanctuary of Ezekiel (Ezek.43), in the person of His Son (John 2:19-21) and, in this economy of transcendent grace, which anticipates the glories of the ultimate consummation, in the bodies of His believing people. In the time to come He will dwell in a temple made of living stones. They will be a part of His abode. We, each one, are His temple.

We need not doubt the reality of His homing in Israel's sanctuaries. Our version is inaccurate in saying that the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands. He is not now dwelling, or making His home in them. It is very true that He does not make His home in Ezra's building (Ezra 6:3), or Herod's house, or the temple of the end time (2 Thess.2:4). But we may be sure that the tabernacle and the temples of Solomon and Ezekiel are hallowed by the Shekinah. In the past He dwelt in houses made by men's hands, and He will deign to do so once again. But now He is not making His home in such structures, but in bodies made by Himself as the Creator and hallowed by the sacrifice of Christ.

The figure of the temple is transferred to our bodies by the apostle. "Are you not aware that you are the temple of God and the spirit of God is making its home in you?" (1 Cor.3:16). As the presence of Yahweh sanctified the temple, so we also are holy because we are His home. This is the true basis and power of holiness. It is not in ourselves, but in Him Who homes in us.

The homing of the spirit is set forth most fully in the eighth of Romans (verses 9-11). There we read, "Yet you are not in flesh, but in spirit, if so be that God's spirit is making its home in you . . . . Now if the spirit of Him Who rouses Jesus from among the dead is making its home in you, He Who rouses Christ Jesus from among the dead will also vivify your mortal bodies because of His spirit making its home in you." This is the marvelous and continual miracle of the spirit in this economy. It gives life to the dead. We should be in constant enjoyment of resurrection power, which makes the body of sin, though dead, the instrument of righteousness.

The spirit homing within us, not only hallows our mortal frame and gives it life, but also guards that which He has committed to us. Paul charged Timothy, "Guard that ideal thing committed to you, through the holy spirit making its home in us" (2 Tim.1:14). These three passages fully set forth the present place of the holy spirit in contrast with its place in the past. Then its presence was occasional and extraordinary. Now it is the normal experience of all believers. Then God dwelt in temples, now He homes in those whom He has hallowed.

THE SEALING AND EARNEST OF THE SPIRIT

The sealing and earnest of the spirit are also exclusively ours. In fact, as both are permanent and the earnest is a foretaste of the very blessings we are considering, these tokens could not be given to other believers. As these phases of the spirit's operation will come before us at length a little later on (Eph.1:13), we will not unfold them at this point.

The full import of the phrase "spiritual blessings" cannot be obtained by reasoning. We are not able to formulate premises from which any safe deductions can be made. This may be illustrated by what may be termed the Kingdom argument, which is as follows: There are spiritual blessings in the Kingdom. We are in the "kingdom" (Col. 1:13). Hence all of the spiritual blessings of the Kingdom are ours. This is beautifully simple and convincingly logical, if only the premises were true.

The "kingdom" in which we find ourselves today is, in some ways, a contrast to the Kingdom of the heavens. That will destroy and displace the kingdoms now on earth. That will rescue mankind from human rule and deliver them into the Kingdom of Christ, as the Son of Mankind. "The kingdom of the Son of His love" delivers us out of the jurisdiction of darkness into a realm which in no way interferes with our subjection to the powers that be. It is a strictly spiritual kingdom, in opposition to Satan's present sovereignty.

That it is not even the spiritual counterpart of the millennial Kingdom is evident from the title used. The "kingdom" of the Son (Heb.1:8) is not to be referred to the thousand years, but to the "eon of the eon"—the succeeding eon, in the new creation. The reason doubtless lies in the fact that, in that future "kingdom" of the Son, unlike the millennium, there will be conciliation. God will be on terms of amity with all mankind. It is not the rule of the iron club, but of the scepter of the Son—a title of relationship and affection. Such is the future type of the present "kingdom" of the Son of His love (Col.1:13).

Without repeating all that we have written on the subject of the heavenly kingdoms, we wish to press the two great phases of the future sovereignty of the earth and their spiritual counterparts, so that we may not be misled by mistaken analogies.

As to time, let us note that the Priest-Kingdom of Christ and His saints is for the thousand years. This is commonly called the millennium. Let it be clearly noted that this has two distinct aspects toward the nations. It is a Melchizedek reign. Christ and Israel are intermediaries between God and the nations. They are Priests as well as Kings.

The spiritual counterpart of this period is found in Paul's earlier ministries, when he as a priest ministered the evangel of God to the nations, and as an ambassador conveyed the decrees of the elders to his converts. During this interval we find the powers of the coming Kingdom exercised by Paul himself and by those who received his message. There was blessing in body and soul as well as in spirit, but all in subordination to Israel.

But the reign of the saints is not limited to the millennium. That is only the first phase of the coming Kingdom. They are to reign for the eon of the eons, but not as priests. Priesthood vanishes in the new creation. The power of God's Christ is replaced by the loving sway of His Son. The present "kingdom" is the spiritual anticipation of this sovereignty. Hence it is called "the kingdom of the Son of His love" (Col.1:13). The figure is continued in Colossians, for we are said to have deliverance and the pardon of sins, in this "kingdom."

Christendom has confused the spiritual counterparts with the future fulfillments, so that the coming Kingdom has been spiritualized away. Others have reversed this process, and have tried to make the Kingdom a present reality. Let it be ours to separate the coming phases, the Kingdom of Christ for a thousand years, the sovereignty of the Son, for the final eon, and the kingdom of the Father, after the eons are past. And let us also distinguish the anticipatory spiritual fulfillments. The Kingdom of Christ, and the powers of the millennial era do not illustrate our blessing. The succeeding "kingdom" of the Son speaks of the present grace. We are in a new creation.

Beyond this, let us note that the present "kingdom" is a figure of speech. There are certain points of likeness between that which we enjoy and that which will be the position of the nations in the new creation. We are not at liberty to define these similarities. This is done for us by the spirit. The nations at that time will not be rescued from their human governors. Neither are we. They will be liberated from the thralldom of Satan and his hosts. So are we. We are rescued out of the jurisdiction of darkness (Col.1:13).

Godward, they will have deliverance and the pardon of sins. Considering ourselves under the figure of this "kingdom" of the Son, we also have these blessings, for they are the only means of conciliation known to government.

These two aspects are the only ones which we have any right to press without doing violence to the laws of language and the Word of God. There are aspects of that "kingdom" of the Son which have no counterpart in the present. Indeed, they are contrary to this administration. For instance, Israel will still rule over the nations. That must not be imported into the present grace. Likewise, there will be physical felicities at that time to which we are strangers. These are not elaborated in the figure, hence we may lawfully deduce that they are not a part of the picture.

Even now, therefore, we have spiritual blessings among the celestials, though we have no physical blessings among terrestrials. Unknown, despised on earth, yet we are the first of its inhabitants to be freed from the fearful influence of the powers of darkness, who are hurrying humanity to its doom. They already recognize us as the supreme sovereigns of the universe, to whom, as members of the body of Christ, is pledged the pinnacle of creature bliss.

The negative implications of this great declaration are of tremendous practical importance. The mere statement that our blessings are among the celestials, rules out the terrestrial felicities of the favored nation. And the fact that they are spiritual, sets aside the soulish, sentient, sensual, as well as the fleshly and material, which have so large a place in Israel's promised Kingdom. And the great exemplars given us in Philippians fully confirm this truth. None of them were noted for either health or wealth. On the contrary, Paul dilates on his distresses, Timothy has frequent infirmities, and Epaphroditus lingered near the doors of death. These men gave a living expression to the great motto which appears above the portal to present truth:

SPIRITUAL BLESSINGS AMONG THE CELESTIALS.

ONE GOD AND ONE LORD

THE SCRIPTURAL EXPRESSIONS FOR "GOD" signify neither supremacy nor unoriginatedness of being. And, these terms may be used either in a relative sense or in an absolute sense—even when used in a literal sense and in a faithful sense. "God" is a title which speaks of Subjectorhood or Placership.

Ultimately speaking, "there is no other God except One" (1 Cor.8:4). "The Head of Christ is God" (1 Cor. 11:3). The God and Father of the believer is also "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph.1:17). We believe, then, that the Supreme God is the One Whom the apostle Paul terms "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph.1:3), Whom Christ Himself terms "the only true God" (John 17:3).

While we believe "even if so be that there are many being termed 'GODS,' whether in heaven or on earth, even as [there is a sense in which] there are many gods, and many lords, nevertheless for us there is one God, the Father, out of Whom all is, and we for Him, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through Whom all is" (1 Cor.8:5,6).

It is revealed that, in Christ, "the entire complement of the Deity is dwelling bodily" (Col.2:9). If the entire complement of the Deity, however, dwells in Christ, this does not make Christ God, any more than if the entire complement of a salesman's samples are contained in a box, the box is the salesman's samples. The box remains the entity containing the samples, not the samples themselves.

It is revealed as well that Christ, before taking the form of a slave and coming to be in the likeness of humanity,

"being inherently [lit., "inhering"] in the form of God, deems it not pillaging to be equal with God" (Phil.2:6). This fact, however, again, is no proof that He is God but is rather a disproof of any such proposition. One who is equal with another is not the other but himself. Equality between two, regardless of their nature and regardless of the particulars of that equality, is not a proof of identity but of its denial. Equality always denies identity, and must ever be relative, else it becomes identity. Then, it is no longer equality. If Christ our Lord, in some respect, is equal with God, this proves that Christ is not God and that God is not Christ.

"The Word" of God in John 1:1 may well have in view not only God's personified Word, Christ, but His written word as well. In any case, "THE WORD was toward God." Any sense, then, in which it is correct to say that "the Word was God," must be compatible with the Word's being, first of all "toward God." This fact precludes the Word's being literally and identificationally God, and entails Its being God only figuratively, in a representative sense. Hence it is simply incorrect to reason that if in John 1:1 Christ is the Word, it follows that He is therein affirmed to be God, in either a literal or absolute sense.

Since we wish to consider the nature of God's being according to the claims both of Trinitarianism and Modalism, a word needs to be said concerning the English word "being" itself. One who has "being," merely speaks of one who exists or is (cp Heb.11:6). Similarly, an "entity" is that which has existence. And, the modern term "person" simply means a being characterized by conscious apprehension, rationality, and a moral sense, whether or not a corporeal being or a human being. Anything that has being, is anything that has existence. But when we speak of a being, we mean a "person," the expression "person" being understood in accord with the definition stated above. In this sense, then, God is a "Person." "Personal" qualities are those characteristics which pertain to a person; specifically, conscious apprehension, rationality, and moral sense.

Academic Trinitarians, however, do not use the word "person" in the sense presented above. This has resulted in much confusion. This is especially so since ordinary folk who feel obliged to believe in "the Persons of the Godhead" are unaware what this very phrase is supposed to mean.

The teaching of Trinitarianism is that God is one Being, existing eternally in three hypostases: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. More succinctly stated, God exists in three hypostases.

"Hypostasis" is the formal, theological equivalent for the popular term "person." In Trinitarian theology, that which is to be understood by the latter expression, is that which is defined by the former. The Trinitarian definition of "person" is, "one of the three modes of being in the Godhead; a hypostasis."[1] The word "hypostasis," itself, simply means that without which something cannot be, the "essential nature of anything; a subject in which attributes are conceived to inhere, or a . . . mode of existence."[2] A hypostasis, then, is an "essentiality."

It needs to be emphasized that the orthodox Trinitarian does not affirm that God is both one and three in the same sense. He rather affirms that within the one God there are three distinct "Persons," each one of Whom is uncreated and of the same essence or nature (any distinctions between the three being ones of service or office). By "person," however, the knowledgeable Trinitarian does not mean a literal person, in the sense of an actual, living being; instead, he uses the word "person" strictly in an accommodated sense as a token for the technical "hypostasis" (i.e., essentiality).

1. Webster's New International Dictionary, second edition, unabridged; p.1828.
2. ibid., p.1229.

Consequently, then, more clearly stated, God is one Being, existing eternally in three essentialities: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Briefly, God exists in three essentialities.

The Trinitarian, if he would maintain a viable monotheism and yet avoid adopting opposing views, has no recourse but to affirm that these three essentialities are modes of the same Being, three modes in which God always and actually exists (not to be confounded with Modalism, the opposing doctrine which affirms a plurality of divine modes merely in the sense of divine roles in which God Himself is sometimes presented).

To be consistent, orthodox Trinitarianism must affirm and does affirm,[3] that by the "Trinity" they mean that God has His existence in three distinct modes, each of which being marked by a certain, "personal" quality. These modes are denominated, respectively, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit.

It is confusing, however, for Trinitarians to claim that these three hypostatic (i.e., essential) modes are "distinct but not separate." This is because "distinct" and "separate" are synonyms. It is only a question of idiom whether we use one term or the other. What the Trinitarian actually means to say, however, by the slogan "distinct but not separate," is that while there are distinctions which separate what is to be understood concerning each hypostasis, one from another, nonetheless these distinctions do not constitute any of the three hypostases separate beings.

Even so, if the three hypostases termed the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, are in fact three modes or ways

3. "In theological language we would define a person [i.e., a hypostasis] as a mode of subsistence which is marked by intelligence, will, and individual existence" (Loraine Boettner, Studies in Theology, chapter 3, "The Trinity," p.109; Presbyterian and Reformed: Philadelphia).

in which God subsists (i.e., continues to exist), then it follows that each itself, literally speaking, is not God Himself. Each of these three cannot literally be God, but rather a mode of God's existence, a way in which God subsists. It would only be, wherever any of these are termed God, or spoken of as God, that we are to understand, by figure of association, God Himself.

Trinitarians, indeed, as a shibboleth, insist on declaring, "Jesus is God." Yet however important this affirmation is conceived to be as a righteous slogan, such is not actually an accurate statement of Trinitarianism itself.

An outsider might reasonably suppose that by the affirmation "Jesus is God," the Trinitarian means to say that Christ is the Deity, the one true God. The Trinitarian's actual claim, however, is that the Son, Christ Jesus, even as the Father and the Holy Spirit, is a hypostasis or essential mode in which God subsists. That is, Christ Himself is not a Being or Person, but is instead an aspect of a Being or Person.

One who believes such a proposition cannot, apart from self-contradiction, also believe that Jesus, in a literal, identificational sense, is God.

Yet they do wish for Christ to have "full Godness," including, by all means, uncreatedness, together with no immanent subordinancy to the Father, only "economic" subordinancy. They also wish for both the "Father" and the "Holy Spirit" to have full Godness, including uncreatedness, whatever Their respective administrative offices. And, they wish for there to be only one actual Being Who is God.

With such a wish list, however, the Trinitarian simply has no alternative but to conceive the Deity as a Being comprised of three hypostatic (i.e., inherently essential) modes, three person-like aspects that have being, but do not, individually in themselves, constitute a Being. Simply stated, God consists of three person-like aspects, one of Whom (or rather, of Which) is Christ.

But from this it follows that none of these three, including Christ, is an actual Being. Therefore, as presented in Trinitarianism, Christ is not a Person in the actual sense of the word but a Thing. Specifically, according to such a system, Christ is not, identificationally, God, but is only God, synecdochically speaking (i.e., by near association), the partial Thing being put for the whole Being. This hardly makes Christ "fully God," but only ("fully" or otherwise) an aspect of God.

Indeed, the knowledgeable Trinitarian affirms that not only the word "person" but all nouns and pronouns in reference to the Father, Son, or Holy Spirit, are not literal (which would make them references to actual Beings), but are "accommodations," mere anthropomorphisms.

MODALISM: JESUS ALONE IS GOD

In considering the claims of Modalism as to how it is that "Jesus is God," it is helpful to note that Modalists rarely if ever explicitly distinguish the figurative, representative "is" from the literal, identificational "is." Accordingly, in certain instances, at least to many, it may not be clear which of these two senses Modalists have in view. Indeed, one often wonders whether it is clear even in Modalists' own minds which sense they have in view, or even if they make this distinction at all.

No being "is" another being, literally speaking. And, there is one God, Who is a Being. It follows, then, were it to be affirmed that Christ is the Deity (is Yahweh Elohim, is God) representatively and that God alone is a Being, it could only be that by the term, "Christ," a representative thing is put for the One represented. Hence, in such a case, in saying that Christ is God, one would not be speaking in a literal, identificational sense, identifying a named person with one of his titles, but in a representative sense, identifying some*thing* that somehow pertained to a person with the person himself.

This, however, is not the Modalist position; nor is it the Modalist's claim. Instead, the Modalist's notion and assertion is that the Being, Christ, is actually God Himself. Accordingly, the Modalist likewise claims that "the Father" is only a character or role in which Jesus is sometimes presented. But from this, since no being is another being, it follows that no such Being as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ actually exists. This is because if Jesus is God the Father, "God the Father" is a character or role, not a being. To say otherwise would be to say that there are two beings each of whom are God, which is to say there are two Gods, which is impossible since there is one God.

Modalists, however, in addition to affirming that Christ is identificationally the Deity, also affirm that Christ is a theophany, a visible manifestation of God; God manifested in a physical form in flesh; God appearing in the form of a man. Thus, Christ is the form of God; He is the form in which God appears.

The Modalist acknowledges that God is spirit, and that He Himself does not have a body. The Modalist acknowledges as well that the form in which God appears is a body, and that that form is not only an appearance but a real human body.[4]

The claim that Jesus is God manifest in flesh, may be restated as God is manifested in the flesh of Jesus. From this, however, it only follows that God is represented by

4. "Since God is an invisible Spirit and is omnipresent, He certainly does not have a body as we know it . . . . Jesus is God manifest in flesh . . . . The New Testament records no theophanies of God in human form outside of Jesus Christ. Of course, He was not just God appearing in the form of a man, but He was God clothed with a real human body and nature . . . . God manifested Himself in the flesh in the person of Jesus Christ" (David K. Bernard: The Oneness of God,Word Aflame Press, Hazelwood, Missouri, 1983), pp.12,27,40,302.

Jesus, which is to say that Jesus, representatively speaking, is God. But from this it does not at all follow that Jesus is literally, identificationally, the Deity. The Modalist's error is that He claims that Jesus is literally God, and offers as proof the proposition that Jesus is figuratively God. If the Modalist grasped his error here and were consistent, he would soon repudiate Modalism.

If the Modalist's claim were simply that Christ is representatively God and that He is the Image of God, he would be affirming our position, not his own. But if his claim instead is that Christ is identificationally God, he is denying that the God and Father of Christ is a Being; that is, he is denying that the God and Father of Christ, Himself exists.

Such a proposition, however, is impossible, for "there is no other God except One . . . . the Father, out of Whom all is" (1 Cor.8:6). It should further be noted that since Christ is the Image of the invisible God (2 Cor.4:4; Col. 1:15), He cannot be God Himself. Whatever its particular nature, whether an image is an entity or a being, it is always a copy, not an original. Since Modalists themselves acknowledge that Christ is a Being, and must affirm with the Scripture that He is an Image, it follows that He is not the One Whom the Image represents, God Himself, but is a Being distinct from God. Christ, then, the Image of God, is not God, but a Being Who represents and reflects God.

Modalists acknowledge that "God" is a term which speaks of a Being, and that "Christ" is a term which speaks of a Being. What they deny, however, is that these two expressions refer to two Beings. Instead, Modalists insist that these two expressions refer to the same Being. That is, Modalists deny that God is one Being and that Christ is Another. Indeed, since Modalists insist both (1) that Christ is God, and (2) that there is only one Being Who is God, they have no recourse but to claim that the expressions

"God" and "Christ" refer to the same Being. Accordingly, when declaring that "Christ is God," Modalists use the word "Christ" as a term of identification for God, even as we use the words "Abraham Lincoln" to identify the man who was President of the United States during the Civil War. Even as it was declared, "Abraham Lincoln is President," Modalists declare, "Jesus Christ is God."

From the premises Christ is God and there is one God, it follows that the titles "Father" and "Son" are not titles, respectively, of One Who is the Father and of Another Who is the Son, but of One Who is both the Father and the Son. According to Modalism, this One is Christ Jesus. Hence the basic Modalist claim, "Jesus is God."

Accordingly, Modalists also claim that all the divine names and titles of Scripture are names and titles of Jesus, Who is God Himself. Whether in reference to various roles in which He serves or modes in which He is manifested, Modalists reason that since every divine name or title is a name or title of God, and Jesus is God, every divine name or title is a name or title of Jesus. It is on this basis that Modalists claim that "Jesus is the Father," and, "Jesus is the Son." Their thought is that, representatively speaking, "the Father" is Jesus, and "the Son" is Jesus. That is, the expression "the Father" is a term which represents Jesus in a certain role, and the expression "the Son," likewise, represents Jesus in a certain role.[5] As we have already shown, however, in making such claims, Modalists are quite mistaken.

5. "The fact that Jesus is God is as firmly established in Scripture as the fact that God is one . . . the Scripture identifies Jesus as the same being as God—the same being as the Father . . . . the three terms . . . [Father, Son] and [Holy Ghost] . . . . indicate three different roles, modes, functions, or offices through which the one God operates and reveals Himself . . . . the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are manifestations of the one God with no distinctions of person being possible"; ibid., pp.55,125,211,252.

GOD'S IMAGE AND EXPRESSION

God in Himself is invisible and inaudible (1 Tim.1:17; John 5:37; cf Heb.11:26,27). God is spirit (John 4:24), without intrinsic form or shape. God is omnipresent, filling heaven and earth (Jer.23:24), pervading the universe (Psa.139:7,8). In Himself, He is indiscernible and unknowable by ones such as ourselves, limited by sentient faculties. If God would make Himself known, revealing Himself to our sight and hearing, He needs an Image, an Expression, a Mediator between Himself and mankind. That which fills this need—"the complement of the Deity" (Col.2:9)—dwells bodily in the One Who is His Christ, His only-begotten Son, Christ our Lord.

Christ's glory consists not in being the Deity but in revealing the Deity to us. Even as John so gloriously declares, He "tabernacles among us, and we gaze at His glory, a glory as of an only-begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth" (John 1:14).

The Scriptures reveal that Jesus is "the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt.16:16). Since our Lord is God's Christ (i.e., Anointed) and Son, it follows that He is not God. All would acknowledge that the fact that Solomon was David's son, proves that Solomon was not David. Yet due to the blinding power of tradition, few are able to see that, just as surely, the fact that Jesus is the Son of God, likewise proves that He is not God.

Instead of simply affirming that Christ is the Son of God, orthodoxy has instead claimed that while it is true that Christ is God's Son, it is also true that He is God Himself. Thus it is claimed that Christ is fully Man and fully God.

Yet since such a proposition is self-contradictory, it is not only false but also incoherent. Even so, from the days of the early church councils, the teaching of the "deity of Christ" has been deemed essential truth. Accordingly, the advocates of this teaching have made countless arguments in its defense.

Since the Scriptures expressly declare that Jesus is indeed God's Christ and Son, the orthodox themselves must acknowledge that this is so. Yet what they have also affirmed, besides His being the Christ and the Son of God, is that Jesus is God Himself. Ironically, by insisting that Jesus is God, traditionalists have effectually denied the very truths which they formally affirm, our Lord's divine Christhood and Sonship.

The primary stratagem in defense of the Trinitarian teaching that Jesus is "God, the Son," has long been the artful claim that Christ has "two natures." According to one of these natures, He is human; according to the other, He is God. He is God-Man; that is, He is both Man and God.

In the fourth ecumenical council, held in Chalcedon (modern Kadiköy, Turkey) in 451 A.D., not only were the earlier creeds of Nicaea (321) and of Constantinople (381; subsequently known as the Nicene Creed) approved, but Pope Leo I's Tome confirming two distinct natures in Christ was also approved, over against the teachings of those who denied this papal dogma. "The overall effect [of these and other rulings] was to give the church a more stable institutional character."[6] Yet however effective this council may have been in the service of organized religion, it was only one of the many formalized departures from scriptural truth which have obtained throughout church history.

"The unique glory of Christ Jesus as the Mediator of God and mankind has often been obscured by explanations made in defense of 'the deity of Christ.' In his book entitled, The Lord From Heaven, Sir Robert Anderson says, 'With us, therefore, the issue is a definite and simple one, namely, whether Christ is God or only man.' This statement neither defines nor clarifies the theme, for the evidence is abundant on both sides. Moreover, this declaration disregards the special place of Christ as the divine Link between God and man. The Scriptures are emphatic concerning His work of mediation. 'There is one God, and one Mediator of God and mankind, a Man, Christ Jesus . . .' (1 Tim.2:5). Those who make Him either Deity absolute or merely human must do so by avoiding this truth and all the divine explanations of those relationships by which Christ bridges the chasm between us and God.

6. "Council of Chalcedon," The New Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th edition, vol.2, p.711.

"All saints believe that, in some sense, Christ is a Mediator between God and man. Some hold Him to be absolute Deity, yet are compelled to acknowledge some limitations. Others make Him a mere man, yet more than all other men. His true place is seldom clearly defined. The solution lies in the great truth that our Lord is unique, quite unlike any other personage in the universe. We do not need to effect a compromise between the conflicting views concerning Him, for both are wrong, though each contains elements of truth. Let us not allow such explanations to rob us of the Mediator, the Christ we need.

"The key to His present constitution is very simple. He is derived from two distinct sources. His spirit is directly from God, unlike any other man. His body, however, is purely human. His soul, which is the consciousness resulting from this combination, is a thing unmatched, capable of direct communion with the Supreme Spirit, and condescending to the corrupt condition of mortal men.

"The point we wish to press is this, that the likeness of Christ to God, instead of incorporating Him into the so-called 'Godhead,' is itself the most satisfying evidence that He is not the Supreme. Nothing is similar to itself, except in a rhetorical figure. Likeness disappears in identity. Nor can this be limited to 'personality,' for Christ and God are alike apart from 'personality.'"[7]

MYTHICAL CLAIMS

The claim that Christ has a "dual nature" is central not only to Trinitarianism but to Modalism as well. Hence, according to this theory too, Christ is "both fully God and fully man at the same time."[8] Indeed, Modalists suppose that nearly all that militates against their position may be shown to be false either by claims such as that the Father is a role not a Being, or by the claim that Christ has two natures.[9]

For example, in explaining the plaintive words, "My God! My God! Why didst Thou forsake Me?" (Matt.27:46) the Modalist insists that we are to understand that this was only Jesus' "human nature" crying out.[10]

If it should be suggested that if Jesus is God and since He prayed to God this would entail His praying to Himself, the Modalist's ready reply is that, rather, what transpired was that the human nature of Jesus prayed to the

9. For the Modalist, "either the multiple attributes and roles of God or the dual nature of Jesus Christ," are the explanation of (i.e., the means which he employs to set aside) all that would otherwise debar his position; ibid., cf p.135.

10. ibid., cf pp.146-234, especially pp.170-198. The author considers a wide range of texts which, to non-Modalists, plainly preclude Modalism. The essence of his justification of Modalism in the face of all such passages of Scripture is simply that "Jesus had two natures—human and divine, flesh and Spirit, Son and Father" (p.198) . . . . The New Testament . . . teach[es] the dual nature of Jesus Christ and this is the key to understanding the Godhead. Once we get the revelation of who Jesus really is— namely, the God of the Old Testament robed in flesh—all the Scriptures fall into place" (p.232).

divine spirit of Jesus that dwelt in Him. Similarly, when Christ died on the cross, it is affirmed not that Christ (Who, it is claimed, is God) died, but only that the human body of Christ died, the divine spirit leaving the human body only at death.

Our response to all such ingenious claims, is that no passage of Scripture either declares or entails any such thing as the "dual nature" of Christ, or the proposition that "Christ is fully God and fully man." "The dual nature of Christ," then, is not of faith; it is rather merely an artful contrivance, concocted in the first place in an attempt to support a false theory. The very idea for which it seeks to stand is irrational and absurd.

"Nature" is a singular concept; it speaks of one's inherent character or basic constitution. Whatever the particulars of one's nature may be, one who is fully one thing is not fully another. A mule may be the progeny of a donkey and a mare, but it is "fully" neither of these. It is the offspring of its parents; its nature incorporates elements from each; but its nature is not fully the same as either.

"Christ is the Mediator Who links humanity with its Creator, so that He is neither man nor God in an absolute sense, yet He is either in a relative one. The combination is not that of two 'natures' which can never be harmonized, but that of body and spirit, the same elements which unite perfectly to form the souls of all other men. His humanity consists in a body derived from Adam through the virgin Mary, His human mother. His deity consists in a vivifying spirit directly from God. These two fuse freely to make a Man unique (1 Tim.2:5) and a God unparalleled—the peerless Man and the only begotten God (John 1:18)."[11]

"THERE IS ONE GOD . . . AND ONE LORD"

It is revealed that "There is one God, the Father, out of Whom all is . . . and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through Whom all is" (1 Cor.8:6). The appositive, "the Father," identifies Who the one God is. The only true God, then, is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (cf John 17:1-3). Hence we are "to be slaving for the living and true God, and to be waiting for His Son out of the heavens, Whom He rouses from among the dead, Jesus, our Rescuer out of the coming indignation" (1 Thess.1:9,10).

11. A. E. Knoch, Unsearchable Riches, vol.21, p.222.

Yet the teaching of Modalism affirms that Jesus Himself in an ultimate sense is not the Son of the living and true God but is the living and true God Himself. In support of this teaching, it is claimed that the Greek word kai has two significations, in most cases, simply that of conjointness (i.e., "and"), but in some cases, that of identification (i.e., "even," in the sense of "that is," or "which is the same as"). Accordingly, Modalists claim that 1 Corinthians 8:6 should be translated, "There is one God . . . even one Lord, Jesus Christ."

The claim is that sometimes when kai stands between a noun and a preceeding noun it identifies the latter expression as being essentially the same as the former. Since Modalists already believe that Christ is one and the same Being as God, they suppose that this notion that kai sometimes means "the same as" gives support to their basic claim.

The fact that in certain passages which speak of God and Christ together, the Authorized Version sometimes renders kai as "even," further confuses the issue while, at least to some, seeming to give credence to Modalism. It should be noted, however, that even in such cases the AV only renders kai as "even" in reference to God as "Father"; it does not translate kai in such a way so as to identify God as actually being Christ Jesus (e.g., 2 Corinthians 1:3, "God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ"; where the CV is "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," cp Eph.1:3; 1 Pet.1:3).

It does not follow that because a prima facie-reasonable translation can be made by saying, as in 2 Corinthians 1:3, "God, even [kai] the Father . . ." that the purpose of kai in such a passage is to identify God as being the same Being as the Father.[12] While it is true that God is the same Being as the Father, the fact that these two expressions often appear together, joined by kai ("and"), is no proof that this is so. The point of the kai is that the Deity is both our Placer and our Father. Similarly, He is both our Saviour and our Lord, even as, under God, Christ is both of these to us as well.

Even so, many Modalists imagine that the various greetings in Paul's epistles should be translated along these lines: "Grace to you and peace from God, our Father, even the Lord Jesus Christ" (e.g., 2 Cor.1:2), the sense being that "God, our Father" is one and the same Being as "the Lord Jesus Christ." It should be noted that Modalists do not claim that the phrase "grace and peace" should be rendered "grace, even peace," as if grace and peace were the same, yet they turn about and claim that the phrase "God, our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ" should read "God, our Father, even the Lord Jesus Christ," as if these Two were the same Being.

It simply is not true that the reason why Paul conjoins "God, our Father" with "the Lord Jesus Christ" is for the purpose of identifying the former Being as one and the same as the latter. Indeed, since God is the God and Father of Christ, it is simply impossible for Him to also be Christ Himself. This consideration alone debars any claim that kai may be rendered "even" in the various greetings found in Paul's epistles from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

12. Additional texts in which the AV translates kai as "even" in reference to God as "Father" are 1 Corinthians 15:24, James 3:9, and 1 Thessalonians 3:13.

The simple fact is that kai corresponds to our "and," and does not mean "even." Indeed, in cases where one word or phrase is to be identified with another, the Greek particle per—which does correspond to the English identificational "even"—is used, not the connective kai. For example, "Now at the festival he released to them one prisoner, even whom they requested" (Mark 15:6). Similarly, "Thou dost give them blood to drink, even what they are deserving!" (Rev.16:6).

THE GREAT GOD AND OUR SAVIOUR

While in the Concordant Version, "even" is used in a number of passages to translate kai (i.e., AND), almost none of these are the "and" of parallelization, but that of ascendency (e.g., Jude 23) or of argument (2 Cor.4:16). Further, it is not that a certain word or phrase preceded by another word or phrase and joined by kai could not possibly be set in parallel, but that such a usage is exceedingly rare. In fact, we know of only one such passage, Titus 2:13, "anticipating that happy expectation, even [kai] the advent of the glory of the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ."

It is not that kai itself ever signifies the idea of "even." It is rather, as in Titus 2:13, that when two clauses joined by kai are used as parallels (as sometimes in Hebrew poetry, where one idea is expressed in two different ways), idiomatic translation requires the use of "even."

The parallel in view here in Titus 2:13 is between, clause one, "that happy expectation," and, clause two, "and the advent of the glory of the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ . . . ." Thus, the evident elliptical phrase in clause two is supplied by clause one itself, the sense of the whole being as follows: "and the advent of the glory of the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ [is that happy expectation]."

Modalists, however, reasoning that if it is proper thus to set "that happy expectation" in parallel to the advent of the glory of Christ, it is proper as well within this same verse, to identify the phrase "the great God" with the following phrase, "our Saviour, Jesus Christ." Thus Modalists claim that this verse in its entirety should read, "anticipating that happy expectation, even the advent of the glory of the great God, even our Saviour, Jesus Christ."

It is true that "the great God," here, is indeed "our Saviour, Jesus Christ." But it is not true that Jesus Christ is herein "identified as God," in the ordinary sense of this expression, whether by means of the conjunction kai or otherwise. That Christ is the great God referred to here, does not make Him the supreme God, the Deity Himself.

Modalists reason as if it follows, since through the use of the word kai our happy expectation is declared to be the advent of Christ's glory, that through the use of the word kai here as well, then, the words "the great Placer" may somehow be construed to be in reference to "the supreme Placer," and, that the supreme Placer or God thus contemplated is Jesus Christ! The fact, however, that the kai of parallelization, however rare, is itself a legitimate usage, is no indication that it is present in any certain construction.

Since, for the many reasons we have presented, we may be certain that Christ is not God and God is not Christ, we may be certain as well that it is only an empty claim that any such usage of kai is present either in Titus 2:13 in the phrase "the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ," or in any of the various phrases within the Pauline greetings in which "God" is conjoined with "Christ."

GOD AND CHRIST

In Titus 1:4, the Concordant Version, as is ordinarily the case, translates kai as "and" ("Grace and peace from God, the Father, and Christ Jesus, our Saviour"). One would suppose that such a rendering is hardly to be faulted. Nonetheless, some adamantly claim that this translation is "inconsistent" and "wrong." Such ones insist that this verse should read, "Grace and peace from God, the Father, even Christ Jesus, our Saviour."

In Titus 1:4, however, there is no reason to suppose Paul wants to explain in different words what he says in the first clause. In this case, he adds a new thought by saying grace and peace also come from Christ Jesus our Saviour.

It is true that Paul heralded according to the injunction of God, "our Saviour" (Titus 1:3), and, that in his introduction to this epistle, he includes a word of grace and peace from Christ Jesus "our Saviour" (Titus 1:4). It is true as well that, in an ultimate sense, there is only one Saviour, God (termed Yahweh Elohim in the Hebrew Scriptures), even as that there is a sense in which Christ is the true God, Yahweh Elohim. It hardly follows from these facts, however, that Christ is identificationally God. Nor does it follow that Titus 1:3,4 proves such a proposition to be so, or that verse 4 should be rendered, "Grace and peace from God, the Father, even Christ Jesus, our Saviour."

It would certainly accord more with the rest of Scripture, as well as with Titus 3:4-6 where our God and Saviour is said to pour out His blessings through Jesus Christ our Saviour, to see God our Saviour as the Source of our salvation and Jesus Christ our Saviour as the Channel. While Christ, then, relatively speaking, is our God (our "Placer") and Saviour, absolutely speaking, He is not our God and Saviour.

COMMON MODALIST FALLACIES

Modalism, besides claiming that the Father is not God Himself but only a divine role, goes on to claim that, conversely, "Jesus is God." Indeed, this latter claim is Modalism's primary contention. Modalists, accordingly, even go so far as to claim that where we read of "the Father," even "the God and Father of Christ," this is actually Jesus presenting Himself in such a role. Similar claims are made as well concerning the Son, and, by many, concerning the Holy Spirit as well. The idea is that since it is Jesus Who is actually God Himself, and since by "Father," "Son," and "Holy Spirit," we are to understand merely divine roles, inasmuch as these roles are roles of God and Jesus is God, they are therefore roles of Jesus!

This claim, however, is based upon the false premises that the Father is not God Himself but only a divine role, and that Jesus is God Himself. Since the premises are mistaken, the conclusion is wrong.

In order to cover a few remaining points, I wish to present the following dialog between a hypothetical (yet quite typical) Modalist and myself:

Modalist's Claim: God dwells within Christ, Who is God Himself. Christ is God robed in a body of flesh.

My Reply: It is gloriously true that God "dwells" within Christ, which speaks of His special and abiding presence within His Anointed. But it does not follow from this, nor is it true on other grounds, that Christ is God Himself, or is God Himself in a particular form ("robed in a body of flesh"). Indeed, if "Christ" is a Being within Whom God dwells, then Christ cannot be God, since if He were there would be two Beings Who are God. But if by "Christ" you mean simply a body of flesh, physical substance, then "Christ" is not a being but a Thing. Yet if "Christ" is a Thing (simply a body, not a Person) within Which God dwells, then He (or rather, It), is not a Being. This, however, cannot be so, for since Christ (not merely Christ's body) has the characteristics of a Being, He therefore is a Being.

Modalist's Claim: God generated Himself within Christ.

My Reply: If Christ Himself, as I affirm, in opposition to Modalism, is a Being Who is begotten of (or generated by) another Being, God, a Being Who, as a result of generating Christ did not Himself cease to exist, then Christ is not God but is, as the Scriptures plainly declare, God's Son. Yet if, as is claimed by Modalism, you wish to affirm that in generating Christ, God also "generated Himself" within Christ, where He now dwells, this is simply to claim anew your previous claim, which I have already proved to be false.

Modalist's Claim: Christ has two natures; He is fully man and fully God.

My Reply: To say that Christ has two "natures" or is a Being comprised of both God and man, is to say that Christ is a Being comprised of two Beings. Such an assertion cannot be true, since the "nature" of one's "being" is a singular concept. A being's nature may be comprised of many particulars or entities essential to itself, but together they comprise only one nature. One being cannot consist of two beings, for one being, is one being, not two. It cannot consist of more than it is. It is as mistaken to say that even if other beings cannot have two natures Christ can have two natures, as it would be to say that if God should make a triangle it can have four sides.
